THE GETTY CENTER LIBRARY

WHEN a Preface is indited to a work it is generally so called, lucus a non lucendo, because it is no Preface at all. Byron when asserting that most epic poets plunged in medias res insinuated that his way was to "begin with the beginning:"—this is not the way of a Preface, a Preface begins with the end. It seeks to instal the book into the good graces of the reader after the virtues and faults are all bottled up, and the phial only wants the label of congratulation or apology. There is in this a sort of advantage both to author and reader, but in no ordinary case can such an advantage tell with so much palpable benefit to all parties, as in the uncommon example of a bound newspaper, and the unique example of a NEWSPAPER, illustrated as well as bound. We therefore rather rejoice in that sort of prefatory inconsistency which enables us to say something at the beginning of a volume which we have just brought to an end. And with the American's mixture of conceit, heartiness, and energy, "We guess we can say SOMETHING!"

Seriously, it will scarcely be denied that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has been the most remarkable and successful novelty of the year which gave it birth. Conceived in a liberal spirit of enterprize—conducted with a view to the promotion of National Intelligence, and the more ennobling principles of moral philosophy—presenting a new, beautiful, and hitherto un-tilled field to the Novelist and Historian—dedicated to Justice and the good of Society, and above all, clasping Literature and Art together in the firm embrace of Mind,—it appeared with a new and comely aspect—commanded admiration almost as fast as notice, and won its way into the popular heart with a rapidity and success commensurate with the far-spread and kind enthusiasm which it had so suddenly called up.

We know there is an egotism in this, but it is an egotism as much due to the public as to ourselves, and therefore the boasting is not vain. You discover a new world and you seek to people it. We discovered and opened up the world of Illustration as connected with News, and the quicksighted and sound-judging British public peopled it at once. If we may throw away paltry considerations of the mere etiquette of modesty without its spirit, and take a fair and enlarged view of such an undertaking as we have prosperously begun to achieve, we may fairly claim a credit that shall not have about it the shame of that common-sort of self-praise which our proverb tells us is no recommendation. The truth is that our self-gratulation lies rather in the good we do and hope to continue, than in any glory of doing it. We are proud for the public. We know that the advent of an Illustrated Newspaper in this country must mark an epoch—give wealth to Literature and stores to History, and put, as it were mile-stones upon the travelled road of time. Here is alone one fine subject of contemplation in such a work—What will it do for the future? Judge by comparison with the past. What would Sir Walter Scott or any of the great writers of modern time have given—whether for the purposes of fiction or history, or political example and disquisition—for any museum-preserved volume such as we have here enshrined. The life of the times—the signs of its taste and intelligence—its public monuments and public men—its festivals—institutions—amusements—discoveries—and the very reflection of its living manners and costumes—the varie-gated dresses of its mind and body—what are—what must be all these but treasures of truth that would have lain hid in Time's tomb, or perished amid the sand of his hour-glass but for the enduring and resuscitating powers of art—the eternal register of the pencil giving life and vigour and palpability to the confirming details of the pen. Could the days of Elizabeth or others as bright and earlier still be unfolded to us through such a mirror, what a mint of wisdom might we gather in from such dazzling periods of the past. Of just as much captivating value then is such a book to the future. It will pour the lore of the Antiquarian into the scholar's yearning soul, and teach him truth about those who have gone before him, as it were, with the Pictorial Alphabet of Art! It is in this sense that we regard the greatness of our design, and are proud of its envied and unexampled success; and it is for this end that we shall strain every nerve to perfect it into order and completeness that may accord with the beauty and brilliancy which many episodes of its execution have already been fortunate to display. Scott might carry Elizabeth to Kenilworth through the regions of his fine imagination, backed and supported by books, and we may take cum grano salis the Antiquarian's and the Poet's word, but the year two thousand will be ten times better assured of all the splendid realities of our own Victoria's visit to the native land of the Northern Magician who enshrined in fiction the glories of Queen Bess. This volume is a work that history must keep.

For the present interest of a Journal combining Art-illustrations with its News, we need say no word here. The public have been greedy for it and have devoured it eagerly. Every point as it presented itself has been recognised and caught at as fast as we could mould it into shape, and while all the pictorial materials are here collected, may we not reasonably ask,—can the old year produce for the drawing-room, the portfolio, or the library, such another collection of beautiful and attractive subjects of present and permanent interest—such another Scrap-book—such another Annual—such another Magazine?

In presenting the first volume thus complete to our readers, we have only to say that, while all its best features are preserved many new ones will be added, particularly for instance the publication of a series of subjects of the event-anniversaries of history, and that the utmost care and spirit will be bestowed upon the keeping up, unflagged and exhaustless, the stirring interest of each progressing paper and part. Some new boon too will occasionally tempt our subscribers, and it is probable that the Magnificent Print which frontispieces our present volume, may only be the fore-runner of other similar returns of gratitude for the approval and confidence with which the British public have stamped the early prosperity of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

DEDICATORY SONNET.

All hands on board the former vessel were saved; but out of 330 persons on board the latter, 189, principally convicts, were drowned.

29.—Her Majesty embarks at Woolwich, on board the Royal George yacht, for Scotland.—A treaty of peace is signed at Nankin, between Sir Henry Pottinger and the Chinese High Commissioners; the Chinese agreeing to pay 21,000,000 dollars in the course of three years, to throw open the ports of Canton, Amoy, Foo-chow-foo, Ningpo, and Shanghai; to cede Hong-Kong to England in perpetuity, to release all prisoners, and henceforth to conduct the intercourse between both nations on terms of perfect equality.

30.—General Nott, with one-third of his force, attacks and defeats Shumsooden, governor, of Ghuznee, who had come out with all his army, capturing two guns, and the whole of his ammunition, tents, &c.

31.—The treaty between this country and the United States of America, agreed upon, on the part of England by Lord Ashburton.

SEPTEMBER.

1.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert land at the Granton pier, Edinburgh, from the Royal George yacht, and proceed immediately to Dalkeith Palace, the seat of the Duke of Buccleuch.

5.—The British expedition anchors off Nankin.—The Queen holds a court in Scotland, at Dalkeith Palace, which is attended by the principal nobility and gentry of that country.

9.—Wreck of the Russian line-of-battle-ship, Ingemanland, two miles of Christiansand, with loss of 400 of the crew.

10.—The Archduke Frederick of Austria, nephew of the Emperor, arrives in England on a visit to her Majesty.

13.—Major-General Pollock completely defeats Akbbar Khan, at the head of 16,000 men, at Tezeen, and on the Huft Kotul.

14.—General Nott defeats the Affghans under Shumsoodeen, Sultan Jan, and others.

15.—Her Majesty leaves Dalkeith Palace, and embarks at Granton pier, on board the Trident steamer on her return to England.

21.—The whole of the prisoners, who were in the power of Akbbar Khan in Affghanistan, amounting to 115 persons, arrive at the British camp at Cabool.

24.—Her Majesty orders a special commission for the counties of Lancaster and Stafford, to try the persons engaged in the late riots.

26. The Marquis of Wellesley, one of the most celebrated statesmen of his age, died at his residence, Kingston House, Brompton, in his 83rd year.

29.—Alderman T. Wood, and Humphrey having been returned by the Common Hall to the Court of Aldermen, to serve the office of Lord Mayor, the choice of the court, falls upon Alderman Humphrey, in the room of Alderman T. Wood.—Appointment of new Bishops of Barbadoes, Antigua, Guiana, Gibralter, and Tasmania.

OCTOBER.

1.—The Governor-General of India proclaims the intended evacuation of India.

2 Opening of the special commission at Stafford, to try the persons concerned in the late riots.

8.—The remains of the late Marquis of Wellesly interred in the interior of the Chapel of Eton College

22.—Grace Darling, the heroine of the Fern Islands, dies of consumption, at Bamburgh, in her 25th year.

23. The caisson on the Goodwin Sands, intended for a lighthouse, is destroyed during a storm, in which two ships are wrecked.—An enormous fish, of the whale species, is caught in the Thames, off Deptford pier.

29.—Died of apoplexy, Allan Cunningham. His last literary work, the life of the late Sir David Wilkie, the artist, was completed only two days before his death.

NOVEMBER.

2.—Her Majesty held a Privy Council at Windsor Castle, at which Parliament was further prorogued to the 13th of December.—Violent storm in Maderia.

4.—Destructive fire at Mr. Charles Pooley's cotton-mill, Ancoats, Manchester, and loss of six lives.

6.—Died, aged 63 years, William Hone, the well-known author of the "Every Day Book," and other works.

7.—Mr. Pritchard is elected bailiff of the borough of Southwark, in the room of the late Mr. Holmes.

9.—Earthquake at Montreal and other places in Canada.

10.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived at Walmer Castle, which is given up to their use by the Duke of Wellington.

13.—Insurrection at Barcelona, occasioned by the attempt to introduce a cart laden with wine into the city, without payment of duty, and the dispersion, by the troops, of a mob who had overpowered the guard at the gate. The National Guards join the rioters.—Wreck of the Reliance, East Indiamen, from China to London, off Mersemont, 22 miles south of Boulogne. Of 116 persons on board, seventy-two escaped with their lives.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert visit Dover.

15.—After three hours' fighting in the streets of Barcelona, between the troops and the National Guard, the captain-general, seeing the houses in the possession of his opponents, and having lost 500 of his men, killed or wounded, retreats to the citadel with his staff and two regiments.

13.—John C. Colt anticipates his execution this day at New York for the murder of Samuel Adams, by stabbing himself with a dirk knife in his prison cell, a few hours after his marriage to Caroline Henshaw.

19.—Death of Frances Bennet in Gloucester gaol, to which place she had been committed on a charge, on her own confession, of having murdered her six children.

20.—Re-opening of the Temple Church for Divine service, after the restoration of that edifice to its original state.

22.—Meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League at Manchester to raise £50,000 for furthering the objects of the league.

24 The news of the victories in Affghanistan, and the treaty of peace with China, is announced by the firing of the Park and Tower guns.

24.—The Queen and Prince Albert honour Ramsgate with a visit, and are received with every demonstration of respect.

26.—The Formidable, 80-gun ship, grounds 14 miles to the westward of Barcelona, and is got off the next day after sustaining considerable damage.

DECEMBER.

7.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Princess Royal, and the Prince of Wales, &c., returned from Walmer to Windsor Castle.

8.—Death of the Countess of Munster.—The inhabitants of Barcelona having refused to surrender at discretion, according to the terms dictated by Espartero, the bombardment of the town commences.

9.—Barcelona capitulates to General Van Halen, who issues a proclamation requiring the inhabitants to give up arms of all descriptions.—An overland express from China and India states that the Emperor of China has accepted the treaty with this country of the 29th of August. Affghanistan has been evacuated, and all the prisoners released.

8.—Accident on the London and Birmingham Railway, by the breaking of the axletree of the engine of the Aylesbury up train, by which three persons are much injured, and one killed.

10.—Parliament further prorogued to Thursday the 2nd of February, then to meet for the dispatch of business.—Lord Hill expired at his seat Hardwick Grange, near Shrewsbury. His Lordship was born on the 11th of August, 1772.—The Town Council of Edinburgh, by a majority of 18 to 3, resolve to erect a monument to the memory of the Scotch Reformers of 1792.

14.—A disastrous fire happens at a house in Little Prescott-street, Goodman's-yard, Minories, inhabited by lodgers, which causes the death of eight persons, the fire broke out at ten o'clock in the evening, and was occasioned by a person preparing Dutch drops, which ignited.

16.—Died, of a brain-fever, at her Ladyship's residence, Euston-street, the Countess of Denbigh.

18.—A war contribution of 12,000,000 reals is imposed by the Captain-General, on the inhabitants of Barcelona. The inhabitants protest against it, and are informed that those who refuse to pay will be sent to the galleys.

25.—During the celebration of mass at a Roman Catholic chapel in Galway, a cry having arisen that the gallery was giving way, 30 persons were killed in attempting to escape.—The New York packet-ship, Independence, arrives at Liverpool with the message of the President of the United States, announcing, amongst other matters, the settlement of the differences between England and that country.

28.—The parishioners of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, resolve, at a public meeting, that the dietary allowed to the poor of the parish by the Poor Law Commissioners, and which, on application, they had refused to increase, is insufficient, and that application be made to Parliament on the subject.

31.—The great seal of England is affixed to the treaty recently ratified between Great Britain and China, and forwarded to the War Office for transmission to the "Celestial" Empire.

IMPORTANT INVENTIONS DURING THE PAST YEAR.

The following are among the most valuable and important inventions patented in 1842, in some of which the specifications have not yet been enrolled:—

NEW MOTIVE POWER (by means of carbonic acid, and also by a peculiar application of this invention is to construct machinery and apparatus in a suitable manner (location of heated air.) Isham Baggs, chemist, King's Square, London. The object for the employment of certain chemical matters to evoke carbonic acid gas, the pressure of which acted against a piston produces motive power; the gas then passes from the cylinder into a vessel containing chemical substances which absorb the carbonic acid, and thus for a time destroy its force. By a repetition of these changes, using the same matters over and over again, an engine may be constructed occupying small space, and possessing immense power, derivable from the carbonic acid when in the form of gas.

SIGNALS ON RAILWAYS.—John Edwards, of Shoreditch, warehouseman. This is an improvement effected in communicating signals from a train to a station, or from one train to another, by means of various combinations of lamps by night, and of thin plates placed in different positions during the day.

SHIP BUILDING.—Alfred Jeffrey, of Lloyd Street, Pentonville, gentleman. This invention consists in a new method of preparing masts, spars, and other wood for ship building and various other purposes by the use of a vegetable glue which is insoluble in water, and more elastic than that in ordinary use, made with a proportion of caoutchouc, according as it is more or less exposed to atmospheric action, mixed with naptha and gum-lac. The composition is used to join together the several parts of masts, spars, or other pieces of wood, and also to remedy defects in wood are called "shaky pieces."

BREATHING SHIPS.—John Norton, of 33, Upper Berkeley Street. This is a mode of sheathing the bottoms of ships by means of electrical action. The bottom of the vessel is covered with a varnish or coating of resin, the vessel is then placed in a solution of copper and other suitable metals, upon which a powerful galvanic action is produced, causing the metallic particles to be deposited upon the bottom and sides of the vessel, thereby forming a sheating of any thickness that may be desired.

COVERING METALS.—W. H. Talbot, Esq., of Lacock Abbey, Wilts. This is a mode of using the electrical principle for the covering of inferior with the more precious metals; secondly, for colouring metallic surfaces by the addition of gallic acid (in water, ether, or alcohol) to the metallic solution intended to be precipitated, and also a method of colouring polished surfaces of copper by exposing them to the vapour of sulphurated hydrogen; by which means various and very brilliant colours in ornamental patterns are obtained upon the copper. It is also used for the purpose of obtaining metallic specula or mirrors, by taking an electrotype cast from a polished spherical metallic surface, and exposing it to sulphuretted hydrogen, until it is perfectly whitened, producing a speculum less liable than others to tarnish or corrode by any subsequent exposure to the atmosphere

COLOURED PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTRAITS.—H. Beard, coal merchant, Earl Street, Blackfriars. This is a mode of colouring the ordinary photographic portraits, by depositing certain different colours in a finely powdered state A piece of glass is placed over the portrait, and the parts requiring to be coloured are carefully traced upon it with a fine brush and suitable colouring matter. Upon this glass tracing paper is laid, drawing through it the term traced; this part is then cut out, the glass removed, and the paper placed upon the portrait itself, leaving only those parts exposed which are required to be tinted, upon which the prepared colours are deposited, and in a few moments the tint becomes firmly fixed. Drapery and other matters are also tinted by the same process.

PRINTING AND EMBOSSING.—Edward Palmer, of Newgate Street, philosophical instrument maker. This is the first plate for obtaining surfaces for relief printing, by means of the electrotype process, by etching the subject through a light coloured composition on a darkened metal surface. Secondly, for obtaining surfaces for printing from, by means of the ordinary manner of line or zinc engravings. Thirdly, a similar surface by engraving on the metal the desired object, by the application of a composition in a similar manner, the and ordinary inking process to build up impressions; and lastly, for obtaining embossing surfaces by the electrotype process or by a cast in plaster of Paris.

PURIFYING SEWERS, DRAINS, AND NOXIOUS VAPOURS.—J. Headley, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, gent. This is an apparatus for consuming smoke, previously charged, with unconsumed carbon, or other chemical matters of a noxious character, by which means the draft of the chimney becomes improved, the smoke effectually purified, and the matter deposited thereby rendered valuable. This improvement is effected by combining two or more ascending flues with descending flues, by inclined or sloping passages at their upper ends, showers of water falling down the descending flues into suitable reservoirs below, leaving a space above the water for the gas or smoke to pass into the next ascending flue, and also the combining the descending and ascending flues by a short inclined passage, where the water is continually dripping down, and thus purifying the smoke in certain furnaces.

CLEANSING CHIMNEYS AND EXTINGUISHING FIRES THEREIN.—Sir S. Desanges, Kt. K B., of Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square. This apparatus consists of a jointed rod formed so as to bend in any direction the chimney may require, having at one part a universal joint with a concave socket, and also a plate resting on a spring the peculiar tendency of which keeps it straight, and to the upper part being inclined it moves in any direction required. There are two methods to facilitate the ascent of the sweep up and down the flue. The apparatus for extinguishing fires in chimneys is an expanding brush, made of wire with a coned spring, having a constant tendency to force out certain smaller tubes by this means the draft of air is effectually checked and the fire extinguished.

MANUFACTURE OF BRICKS AND TILES.—R Irving, gentleman of Princes Street Rotherhithe. This is an ingenious mode of making bricks and tiles, by moulding the brick earth in a certain manner and one half a series of cutters. The moulding tool in this invention would require a lengthened description in order to be clearly understood

MANUFACTURE OF STARCH FROM RICE.—W. T. Berger, gentleman, of Upper Homerton, Middlesex. This is an applieation of alkaline salt to rice, whereby the gluten or starch is separated therefrom. Secondly, the manufacture of starch, by submitting rice to a fermenting process. Thirdly, the combination of alkaline salt with the process of fermentation; and fourthly, a made of colouring starch, by the application of artificial ultra marine

SOAP.—E. E. Perkins, of Norwood, Surrey, gentleman. This is a mode of obtaining soap from soap-suds, by means of precipitation. The "suds" are run into an open tank, and kept in a covered building secure from the weather. In the course of a few days the supernatural liquor is drawn off, and afterwards the precipitated matter also, to which a proportion of lime is added to disengage the ammonia; it is then mixed with caustic soda, the result being a soap like that generally used for scouring purposes. The process is slightly varied according to the nature of the manufacture from which the soapy matter is obtained. By an alternate materials a finer soap may be made.

FIREARMS.—Alexander Rossean, manufacturer, Strand. (A communication from abroad). This is a mode of applying an apparatus to firearms, containing a number of detonating materials successively brought on to the nipple of the gun by the act of cooking, in such manner that it may be repeatedly discharged according to the supply contained in the apparatus. The caps are so arranged in the chamber, that they cannot be improperly put on.—By this invention, the time and trouble of placing the caps on the nipple by hand is saved, and they are also secured from the dampness of the atmosphere.

RIBBS AND BEDDING.—J. Hall, Regent street, machinist. This invention relates to a mode of making ribs and bodies in such a manner as to act on two powers of leverage at the same time, whereby a single rein will be equal to that under the old process

HORSE-SHOES.—H. K. Rodway, of Birmingham, Wine-merchant. These horse-shoes are made tubular-iron, rolled, with a groove therein, at least three-eighths of an inch wide. Such is the detail of the groove, that the pressure of the foot is principally sustained by the outer and inner edges; the horse being thus enabled to take a more hold of the ground, and the accidents occasioned by slipping, arising from the ordinary construction of shoes, thereby to a great measure prevented

CUTTING CORKS.—T. Lachaun, of Titchfield-street, Soho, mechanic. This is a machine for cutting and squaring corks for bottles, by means of a revolving wheel, and other parts acting therewith, by which immense saving of labour will be effected

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF PLAITED FABRICS.—Christopher Nicholls, of York Road, gentleman. The object of this invention is to manufacture plaited fabrics by weaving in a loom This is effected by dividing the warp into separate sets, and causing the various parts to be delivered at different speeds, as the weaving of the warp proceeds.

LAMPS.—J. Taylor, of Birmingham, brass-founder. This is a lamp for burning fatty matters which are not in a fluid state. A chamber is formed for this fatty matter to be deposited in, and it is melted by means of hot water, contained in another vessel, just previous to lighting the lamp.

CONSUMPTION OF GAS.—G. Bowman, of New-road, Shepherd's Bush, gentleman. This improvement consists in applying, above the jet-holes, two or more concentric cylinders, in addition to, and within the usual chimney of glass, according to a certain arrangements of parts.

MANURE.—J. C. Daniell, Tiverton Mills, near Bath. This patent is for preparing and applying certain substances called ligneous matter, or manure, including all descriptions of wood, peat, turf, &c., reducing them to powder by machinery, assisted by dry quick lime, and intermixing them together

FOOD FOR CATTLE.—J. C. Daniell, of Tiverton. This is a patent for rendering all kinds of wood, brambles, furze, and gorse, into food for cattle, by grinding and reducing them to powder. Also for preparing grass, straw, or haulm for cattle, by placing it in a vat, mixed with double its weight of newly-cut grass, and then surrounding the vat by steam for 24 hours thus saturating the straw with the moisture arising from the grass.

LIVING UNDER WATER.—Vigors, Russel-square, gentleman. The object of this extraordinary invention is to enable persons to live under water without any communication with the surface but as the specification is not yet enrolled the process cannot, at present, be described.

INSTRUMENT FOR INDICATING THE APPROACH OF ROCKS, &c.—J. L. Clement, of St. Martin's-lane. This instrument is constructed on the ascertained fact that the temperature of water varies according to the proximity of rocks, shoals, &c. A bolt is proposed to be perforated in the ship's bottom, and a thermometer placed in such a position as to be acted upon by the water; thus giving timely notice of the approach of danger.

The total number of English patents which have passed the great seal during the last twelve months, amounts to 368, exclusive of a very large number for Scotland and Ireland

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE, IN 1842.

JANUARY 15.—By special licence, Major E. Bagot, 60th Royal Rifles, son and heir of the Lord Bishop of Oxford, and nephew of the Earl of Jersey, to Matilda, relict of the late Oswald Perkins, Esq.

18.—George Drummond Greene, Esq., Major in the Hanoverian Service, to the Hon. Marianne Drummond, only daughter of the Viscount and Viscountess Strathallan

20.—The Hon. and Rev. P. Y. Savile, third son of the Earl of Mexborough, to Emily Brand Hale, eldest daughter of W. Hale, Esq., of Walden Park.

FEBRUARY 3.—The Right Hon. Lord Rayleigh, to Clara Latouche Vicars, eldest daughter of the late Cayman Vicars, Royal Engineers.

24.—By special licence, the Viscount Pollington, eldest son of the Earl of Mexborough, to the Lady Rachel Catherine Walpole, eldest daughter of the Earl and Countess of Orford.

MARCH 1.—By special licence, the Earl of Morley, to Harriet Sophia, relict of the late W. Coryton, Esq., of Pentille Castle, Cornwall.

8.—D. S. Kr, Esq. M.P., to the Hon. Anna Dorothea Blackwood, youngest daughter of Hans Lord Dufferin and Clanehoye

10.—Captain Hamner, brother to Sir John Hamner, Bart., to Victoria Conroy, youngest daughter of Sir John Conroy, Bart.

10.—Captain Douglas, Prince Albert's Hussars, to Rose, daughter of the late Right Hon. Sir A. Paget, G.C.B.

20.—By special licence, Sir R. Wilmot, Bart., to Margaret, widow of the late Robert Alges, Esq.

22.—The Rev. E. Moore to the Lady Harriet Montague Scott, youngest sister of the Duke of Buccleuch

31.—The Hon. Octavius Dunsombe, M.P., to the Lady Emily Caroline Campbell, eldest daughter of the Earl and Countess of Cawdor.

APRIL 6.—Baron Charles de Rothschild, of Vienna, youngest daughter of the late H. M. D Rothschild.

MAY 1.—The Hon. Capt. George W. F. Liddell, Scots Fusilier Guards, son of Lord Ravensworth, to Miss Cecil Elizabeth Wellesley, youngest daughter of the Hon. and Rev. G. V. Wellesley, D.D.

8.—The Hon. Henry Legge, brother of the Earl of Dartmouth, to Miss Rogers

17.—Lieut.-General Sir John Hanbury to Charlotte, eldest daughter of the late Sir Nelson Rycroft, Bart.

23.—The Hon. George Liddell, third son of Lord Ravensworth, to Louisa, second daughter of the Hon. General Meade

28.—H. B. Jones, Esq., M.D., to the Lady Mildred Acheson, daughter of the Right Hon. the Earl of Gosford

JUNE 14.—The Rev. T. Legh Claughton, to the Hon Julia Susanna, sister of the present Lord Ward.

15.—The Marquis of Waterford to the Hon. Louisa Stuart, only unmarried daughter of Lord Stuart de Rothesay, Ambassador to the court of St. Petersburgh.

15.—The Hon. and Rev. Edward Harbottle Grimston, second son of the Earl of Verulam, to Frances, eldest daughter of John Morier, Esq

16 —The Hon. Miss Preston, only daughter of Lord Viscount Gormanstown, to M. E. Corbally, Esq., M.P. for Meath.

22.—Sir T. Edward Winnington, Bart., M.P. for Bewdley, to Anna Heli ..., eldest daughter of Sir Compton Domvile, Bart.

28.—Viscount Emlyn, eldest son of the Earl and Countess of Cawdor, to Sarah Mary, daughter of the Hon. Colonel Cavendish.

28. The Earl of Desart, M.P., to Lady Elizabeth Campbell, third daughter of the Earl and Countess of Cawdor.

JULY 7.—By special licence, the Rev. Edward Butler, Esq., fourth son of the late Hon. A. Danvers, to Cecilia Agnes, second daughter of Lieutenant-General Sir John Taylor, K.C.B.

30.—The Hon. F. W. C Villiers, third son of the Earl of Jersey, to the Right Hon. Lady Elizabeth de Reede Gisborne, sister of the Earl of Athlone.

JULY 7.—By special licence, A. J. B Hope, Esq., M.P., to the Lady Mildred Cecil, eldest daughter of the Marquis of Salisbury.

12.—Sir R. Hervey Bruce, Bart., to Mary Ann, only daughter of Sir J. Clifton, Bart., of Clifton Hall, Nottingham.

14.—By special licence, Captain Campbell, K C T S., to Harriet, widow of Sir A. Dickson, K.C.B

28.—C. B. Adderley, Esq., M.P., to the Hon. Julia, eldest daughter of the Right Hon. Lord Leigh

9.—H. Murrvatt, Esq., to Matilda, daughter of the Right Hon. General Lord E. ... ...

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 1.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

[FIFTH REPRINT.]

OUR ADDRESS.

In presenting the first number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to the British Public, we would fain make a graceful entree into the wide and grand arena, which will henceforth contain so many actors for our benefit, and so many spectators of our career. In plain language, we do not produce this illustrated newspaper without some vanity, much ambition, and a fond belief that we shall be pardoned the presumption of the first quality by realizing the aspirations of the last. For the past ten years we have watched with admiration and enthusiasm the progress of illustrative art, and the vast revolution which it has wrought in the world of publication, through all the length and breadth of this mighty empire. To the wonderful march of periodical literature it has given an impetus and rapidity almost coequal with the gigantic power of steam. It has converted blocks into wisdom, and given wings and spirit to ponderous and senseless wood. It has in its turn adorned, gilded, reflected, and interpreted nearly every form of thought. It has given to fancy a new dwelling-place—to imagination a more permanent throne. It has set up fresh land-marks of poetry, given sterner pungency to satire, and mapped out the geography of mind with clearer boundaries and more distinct and familiar intelligence than it ever bore alone. Art—as now fostered, and redundant in the peculiar and facile department of wood engraving—has, in fact, become the bride of literature; genius has taken her as its handmaid; and popularity has crowned her with laurels that only seem to grow the greener the longer they are worn.

And there is now no staying the advance of this art into all the departments of our social system. It began in a few isolated volumes—stretched itself next over fields of natural history and science—penetrated the arcanæ of our own general literature—and made companionship with our household books. At one plunge it was in the depth of the stream of poetry—working with its every current—partaking of the glow, and adding to the sparkles of the glorious waters—and so refreshing the very soul of genius, that even Shakspere came to us clothed with a new beauty, while other kindred poets of our language seemed as it were to have put on festive garments to crown the marriage of their muses to the arts. Then it walked abroad among the people, went into the poorer cottages, and visited the humblest homes in cheap guises, and perhaps, in roughish forms; but still with the illustrative and the instructive principle strongly worked upon, and admirably developed for the general improvement of the human race. Lastly, it took the merry aspect of fun, frolic, satire, and badinage; and the school of Charivari began to blend itself with the graver pabulum of Penny Cyclopædias and Saturday Magazines.

And now, when we find the art accepted in all its elements, and welcomed by every branch of reading into which it has diverged; now, when we see the spirit of the times everywhere associating with it, and heralding or recording its success; we do hold it as of somewhat triumphant omen, that we are, by the publication of this very newspaper, launching the giant vessel of illustration into a channel the broadest and the widest that it has ever dared to stem. We bound at once over the billows of new ocean—we sail into the very heart and focus of public life we take the world of newspapers by storm, and flaunt a banner on which the words "ILLUSTRATED NEWS" become symbols of a fresher purpose, and a more enlarged design, than was ever measured in that hemisphere till now.

The public will have henceforth under their glance, and within their grasp, the very form and presence of events as they transpire, in all their substantial reality, and with evidence visible as well as circumstantial. And whatever the broad and palpable delineations of wood engraving can be taught to achieve, will now be brought to bear upon every subject which attracts the attention of mankind, with a spirit in unison with the character of such subject, whether it be serious or satirical, trivial or of purpose grave.

And, reader, let us open something of the detail of this great intention to your view. Begin, par exemple, with the highest region of newspaper literature—The Political. Why, what a field! If we are strong in the creed that we adopt—if we are honest, as we pledge ourselves to be, in the purpose that we maintain—how may we lend muscle, bone, and sinew to the tone taken and the cause espoused, by bringing to bear upon our opinions, a whole battery of vigorous illustration. What "H. B." does amid the vacillations of parties, without any prominent opinions of his own, we can do with double regularity and consistency, and therefore with more valuable effect. Moreover, regard the homely illustration which nearly every public measure will afford: your Poor-laws—your Corn-laws—your Factory-bills—your Income-taxes! Look at the field of public portraiture presented in your Houses of Legislature alone, and interesting to every constituency in the land. Open your police-offices, your courts of law, your criminal tribunals—all the pith and marrow of the administration of justice—you can have it broadly before you, with points of force, of ridicule, of character, or of crime; and if the pen be ever led into fallacious argument, the pencil must at least be oracular with the spirit of truth.

In the world of diplomacy, in the architecture of foreign policy, we can give you every trick of the great Babel that other empires are seeking to level or to raise. Is there peace? then shall its arts, implements, and manufactures be spread upon our page. The literature—the customs—the dress—nay, the institutions and localities of other lands, shall be brought home to you with spirit, with fidelity, and, we hope, with discretion and taste. Is there war? then shall its seat and actions be laid naked before the eye. No estaffette—no telegraph—no steam-winged vessel—no overland mail, shall bring intelligence to our shores that shall not be sifted with industry, and illustrated with skill in the columns of this journal; and whether the cowardice of China or the treachery of Affghanistan be the theme of your abhorrence or resentment, you shall at least have as much historical detail of both as, while it gratifies general curiosity, shall minister to the natural anxieties at home of those who have friends and relations amid the scenes delineated and the events described.

Take another fruitful branch of illustration, the pleasures of the people!—their theatres, their concerts, their galas, their races, and their fairs! Again, the pleasures of the aristocracy—their court festivals, their bals masques, their levees, their drawing-rooms—the complection of their grandeur and the circumstance of all their pomp!

In literature, a truly beautiful arena will be entered upon; for we shall not only, in most instances, have the opportunity of illustrating our own reviews, but of borrowing selections from the illustrations of the numerous works which the press is daily pouring forth, so elaborately embellished with woodcuts in the highest style of art.

In the field of fine arts——but let the future speak, and let us clip promise in the wing. We have perhaps said enough, without condescending to the littleness of too much detail, to mark the general outline of our design; and we trust to the kindness and intelligence of our readers to imagine for us a great deal more than we have been able to crowd into the compass of an introductory leader. Moreover, we would strongly premise an expression of gratitude for all suggestions that may hereafter reach us, and assure our volunteers of these, that wherever there seems a possibility of acting upon them creditably, that course shall be taken with promptitude, vigour, and effect.

Here we make our bow, determined to pursue our great experiment with boldness; to associate its principle with a purity of tone that may secure and hold fast for our journal the fearless patronage of families; to seek in all things to uphold the great cause of public morality; to keep continually before the eye of the world a living and moving panorama of all its actions and influences; and to withhold from society no point that its literature can furnish or its art adorn, so long as the genius of that literature, and the spirit of that art, can be brought within the reach and compass of the Editors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS!

DESTRUCTION OF THE CITY OF HAMBURGH BY FIRE.

By the arrival of the General Steam Navigation Company's boat Saladonia, off the Tower, on Tuesday evening, news has been brought of an immense conflagration which took place on Thursday morning, the 5th instant, at one o'clock, in that city. The district in which the fire broke out consists entirely of wood tenements, chiefly of five and six stories high, and covering an area of ground of about thirty to forty acres. The whole of the buildings on this large space have been totally consumed to the number of more than 1000. The fire was by some thought to have originated in the street known by the name of the Stein Twite, in the warehouse of a Jew, named Cohen, a cigar manufacturer, and who, upon good grounds, has been taken up on suspicion as the incendiary. The wind at the time blew a stout north-wester, causing the flames rapidly to spread; and proceeding in the direction of Roding's-market, and from thence to Deich-street, entirely consuming the whole of the following streets, among which is the Hoppen-market, and St. Nicholas Church, a fine stone fabric, and the handsomest in Hamburgh. Grutz Twite, Cressnon (back and end), Grosser Burstah, Muhlen Brucke, Alte Borse, Bohnen Strasse, Monke-dam Twite, Altewalle Strasse, Grosse and Klaire, Johannes Strasse, Cassewall (partially), Alter and Neur Jungfernstieg Berg, New Berg Strasse, St. Petrie Tiechie, Kunigs Strasse, Greenhoof a Grasskiller, (partially), Rathaus, Borsenhalle, Zuicchaus, Spinhauss, and Detenwinshaus, Schmidt, Wassenkunst, (Nue Bose), Zuchstrausse Strases, Kunst, Caulstrauses, Kobdam, Dullhaus, Sperort, and Steinstrauses.

A body of one thousand Prussians were immediately marched into the town, and waggons and ammunition from the King of Hanover were brought down the Elbe to blow up the houses, and to stop the conflagration.

The principal houses and hotels, among which were the Exchange, Streit's Hotel, St. Peter's Church, the Post-office, the Bank, Spinnhause's Hotel, and several others, with their costly property, have not a wreck left. The whole presents a mass of ruins fallen into the dykes which intersected the streets. Upwards of 100 lives have fallen a prey. Owing to the inadequacy of the engines, little could be effected, and the strenuous efforts of the people themselves were of no avail. At the time of its occurrence no water was procurable, owing to the tide being low, so that the street canals were dry. The following details by eye-witnesses of this awful devastation will enable our readers to form some idea of its progress. A correspondent of the Times, dated Thursday noon, writes thus :—

"This morning, at one o'clock, I was awoke by the watchman in my district, the Neuenwall, near the Stadt-haus, springing his rattle and giving the alarm of fire, and at the same time heard the bells of the churches sounding the tocsin. On inquiry, I found the fire to have broken out in the Deichstrasse, in which a great number of warehouses are situated, and in which some of the first merchants of the place have their counting-houses. A number of engines were very soon on the spot, but, from the want of water, the tide having receded about this time, they were unable to stop the flames. Towards four o'clock several houses were burning fiercely, and also several warehouses stocked with articles of the most combustible matter : and so strong was the wind, that the firemen found it impossible to stem the torrent of flames. Since this period up to the present time, nearly fifty houses have been burnt, and there is nothing to be seen but men, women, and children leaving the houses, and endeavouring to save a small portion of their furniture, which is being placed in the celebrated Nicolai Church, one of the oldest and most splendid churches in the city.

"One o'clock.—The flames are rapidly increasing. Fifteen houses in the Deichstrasse are completely burnt down. Among them, the counting-house of the celebrated firm of Parish and Co., whose grandfather transacted his business in it : of C. T. Bahre, Ross, Vidal, and Co. ; L. Behrens and Sons; and many others of great repute in the mercantile line, but which it is impossible to name here. Houses have been pulled down in the Hopfenmarkt to make room for the engines to play, and to prevent further progress, but to no purpose.

"Half-past one o'clock.—The Nicolai Church appears to be heated, and emits a degree of smoke rather alarming on the upper dome—water is being carried up, and the smoke increases.

"Two o'clock.—The dome and spire have caught fire.

"Three o'clock.—The firemen are compelled to leave the platform under the upper dome, which is in full flame.

"Four o'clock.—the fire increases on all sides, and the Hopfenmarkt, the Rodingsmarkt, the Deichstrasse and the Steinstwich, present one complete mass of flame, to stem which the engines and firemen are prevented by the momentary fear of the falling dawn of the spire of the Nicolai Church and the bells.

"Half-past four o'clock.—I believe there never was a more awfully magnificent sight witnessed, than the appearance of this beautiful structure, presenting one complete mass of fire, and surrounded by the houses in fearful flaming array, bidding defiance to human power to assuage.

"Five o'clock.—The most ancient of all the churches in Hamburgh has lost its spire and upper dome, leaving a wreck of its former grandeur still burning.

"Six o'clock, p.m.—The wind has shifted suddenly to the S.W., and the fire is uncontrollable. The Hopfenmarkt, in which is situated three of the principal hotels of the place, and is the principal market for meat of every description, likewise for vegetables—in fact, the Covent Garden of Hamburgh, and somewhat similarly arranged—is in full flames. In the midst of all this is to be seen the burning ruin of the Nicolai Church, pouring forth volumes of fire, and emitting red-hot the flames portions of furniture which people had been permitted to lodge within the building for security only three hours before the church took fire itself. The streets are crowded with carts, waggons, cabs, carriages, conveying people and goods away, and nothing but dreadful suspense is to be observed on all sides.

"Seven o'clock.—The Borsenhalle is nearly burnt down, and the flames spreading in all quarters. People have lost all hopes of seeing the fire got under, and nothing can be seen but people packing up their goods and leaving the city.

"Eight o'clock.—The Senate House on fire, which joins the Bank ; the latter is said to be fire-proof. The Senate are doing all that men can be expected to do under such awful circumstances. They are to be seen on all sides encouraging the firemen, and seeing the poor people (hundreds of whom have now lost their all) placed with their families in security. Two of the senators have themselves been already burnt out, and, after merely seeing their families in security, have returned to their dreadful duty.

"Ten o'clock.—There are now 300 houses burnt down, and fears are entertained for the security of the Post-office and Hotel de Ville. A rumour is now spreading that the insurance companies have intimated they cannot pay the whole amounts insured for, from so fearful a sacrifice having been made

"Twelve o'clock.—People seem frantic, and nothing is to be seen but goods in the public streets. The infirmary for the poor is opposite to the entrance of the court-yard in which I reside, and the master has received orders from the authorities to remove them away.

"Two o'clock.—The Neuenhall presents a picture of despair. My people are packing up whilst the house is covered with large flakes of fire from the opposite building.

"Five o'clock.—The fire has gained the Neuenhall, between which and the Burstah-street there is a very wide canal.

"Six to eight o'clock.—The wind having increased, has caused the whole of the Neuenhall to be cleared of its inhabitants, and the fire rages with furious violence. Up to the present time it is impossible to give any accurate account of the number of houses destroyed, but, on a moderate estimation, I have no doubt there are 500, including the Old and New Exchange, only recently opened. Nor can I say what lives have been sacrificed, but from 40 to 50 is the number mentioned, seven of whom were sacrificed in nobly endeavouring to save the church, nor could they be brought away until it was too late for them to escape, from the immense height of the building, which they had been vainly attempting to preserve. The Nicolai Church was upwards of 370 feet high.

"May 7, eleven o'clock.—The fire pursues the same destructive course, rather worse than better ; and on all the roads leading away from the city are to be seen strings of carriages, waggons, and carts, conveying inhabitants and their furniture away. Houses are being continually blown up ; and in this service there are Englishmen from the Factory of Messrs. Gluehmen and Busse, engaged under the superintendence of Mr. Thompson, their manager. Explosions are continually sounding, yet the fire seems to increase, and where it will end God only knows. The loss that present incalculable, and business of course cannot be thought of nor even entertained for days to come. There is scarcely a family in the place which has not suffered in some way or other."

Another correspondent, who dates up to Sunday last, writes thus—

"God only knows where the fire will end, and to his Divine interposition alone must the termination be left. All human power to control its fury has proved hitherto of no avail, and I may say, Hamburgh has lost in forty-eight hours, already, that value in property which will take upwards of 100 years to replace ; and there is now every appearance of the fire consuming nearly as much again, having taken so sudden a turn towards the Steinthor districts, where the houses are closely built together. On a rough calculation, from 3,000,000*l.* to 4,000,000*l.* sterling worth of property has been sacrificed up to this hour (twelve o'clock), and to describe the appearance of the flames is impossible. The picture of the destruction of Nineveh can alone give a somewhat adequate idea of the awful magnificence of the scene. The wind being from the west, and the night completely dark, and of a stormy appearance, renders the picture dreadful in the extreme ; and that nothing short of Divine interposition can prevent the total destruction of at least one-half of the city, one-fourth of by far the best houses of the place, and many of them princely buildings in appearance, being already sacrificed to the flames. One-half of the population has left the place, and are seated in the surrounding villages and in the fields, and the utmost misery that can be fancied prevails throughout.

"Half-past twelve, May 7.—I and my friend have just returned from a tour throughout the whole scene of devastation. We passed through the Esplanade and Neuer Jungfernsteig again, and found that the wind, having changed from S.S.W. to W., had fortunately turned the direction of the flames towards the Jungfernsteig, and those sheds surrounding the St. Petri's Church. Only one house, therefore, in the line of the Gausemarkt has been burnt, and this has been prevented from communicating with the other houses by a good supply of water from the river Alster, and the blowing up of Solomon Heine's house and Streit's Hotel. At the further end of the Jungfernsteig the fire was all powerful, and we saw the Belvedere Head, which had escaped up to twelve o'clock last night, in full flames, and in a line with it all the houses were burning. On the opposite side of the Neuer Jungfernsteig the Holy Dam is situated, and there the fire was raging to a fearful extent, and communicating with the Pferdenmarkt, and thence through the narrow streets towards the Steinstrasse. The St. Petri's Church is still standing, but with little hope of being saved. The artillerymen are being employed in undermining the building ; and, should it catch fire, it is to be blown up to prevent the influence of the flames from operating on the houses left untouched. The following are the names of the streets destroyed almost totally, and those where the fire is raging at this moment (nine o'clock) ; The Deestrasse, half the houses destroyed ; Rodingsmarkt, about 25 houses ; Hopfenmarkt, totally, alongwith Nicolai churchyard, the dwellings of the clergy, and the beautiful church ; the Grosse and Kleine Burstah, Graskeller, Attewall-strasse, Monkedain, totally ; the Johannes-strasse nearly ; Gross and Kleine Bckerstaff, Muhlendamcke, Bahnenstrasse, Newnburg totally ; Schmeidestrasse burning, and several other minor streets, courts, and alleys, which it is impossible to enumerate. Of the public buildings, the following are completely destroyed : The Senate house, and the Bank of Hamburgh adjoining, the treasury of which, consisting of silver and gold bars in fireproof vaults underneath, is perfectly safe, and the books are removed, so that no obstruction will be caused to the public accounts, and of which a public notice has been given to ease persons' minds as to the Bank's solidity.

"Twenty minutes past nine o'clock.—I have just this moment been called away to view the St. Petri's church in flames. It has one of the finest spires in Europe, being 445 feet high.

"The district that must fall now is inhabited by a class of the poorest people, and all the open spaces around the town are already covered with people having no homes now to go to."

The correspondent, who dates on Friday—we extract the following passages from his letter :—

"It is said that the fire commenced in a tobacconist's shop—by others, in a public-house ; but, be the origin what it may, it quickly spread to the next house, and from thence, by one o'clock, embraced nearly a dozen houses, having penetrated to a square court of large warehouses, forming a cul-de-sac utterly unapproachable from the street, partly in flames ; thus no efforts to extinguish these were possible. Mr. Ross's and Mr. Young's warehouses are named as those which first caught, and were chiefly the means of spreading the fire beyond. Presently an immense warehouse full of spirits was in flames, these rising far above and sweeping far wider in their devastating effect than those of any establishment then reached. It became by this time (between three and four o'clock) quite evident that no effort could circumscribe the fire to its immediate locality, except by the destruction of the neighbouring buildings yet unscathed.

"The Senate had been called together by the terrific account brought to its members from every quarter, to take such measures as were required for the public safety. It is said that it was proposed to blow many individuals to pull down the neighbouring houses in the direction of the fire, but that this was declined as an unnecessary and useless sacrifice of property. The fact, however, is certain, that although the whole fire-engine department, and the entire burgher guard (upwards of 20,000 men), were ordered for service, the value of such a force became utterly unavailable towards the necessities of the emergency from the petty means the really ridiculous attempts, which were ordered to extinguish and arrest the fire. Instead of a wide sweep of houses pulled down in the direction of the fire, but one or two buildings immediately adjoining those actually in flames were ordered for destruction. Ere these were well burnt, the fire gained on them and beyond, whilst by on the same system continued, with as copious a use of water as the wretched engines would allow. This went on till about three o'clock on Thursday afternoon, giving as a result the destruction of nearly a hundred houses, pretty nearly in one consecutive line.

"The rapid progress of the flames was for a time partly arrested here, by the interposition of a wider space—the Hoffenmarkt, when, on a sudden, smoke was seen to proceed from the steeple of the Nicolai Church, upwards of 200 feet high. A spark had flown upwards, and must have been for some time smouldering in the capital above one of the columns, about half-way up the steeple. Before many minutes, a number of firemen were hard at work in attempts to cut out the burning part, and to cool the heated timber with water. They several times succeeded in extinguishing the flame, but the heat from the burning houses below and around was reflected so intensely against the roof with the columned basis of the beautiful spire, that all their efforts proved vain—smoke again became flame, and this fine church speedily became a heap of ruins.

"Adjoining the Nicolai Church were several old buildings ; and another part of the town, yet free from danger, which now became menaced, and soon actually commenced burning with a dreadful and astonishing rapidity. The buildings were, if possible, of more inflammable materials than the others, and there was a freer current of air. The loss of property along this line, which blazed consecutively for nearly a quarter of a mile, is incalculable. The whole of the buildings, consisting of large warehouses, were all loaded with merchandise. These lay on each side of the Catherinen Canal. Let it be borne in mind that the warehousing or bond-system does not exist in this free city ; that on the arrival of an expected cargo, the ship, or a barge laden with its contents, immediately proceeds opposite the merchant's warehouse, where the goods are discharged The warehouse of one merchant alone (whose name I cannot remember at this moment), had British manufactures to the value of 120,000*l.*, which I learn were insured in the London Insurance offices.

"I may as well mention here that it is supposed the loss of property up to this time is so great that the Hamburgh insurance houses cannot meet their liabilities The Panmix and Sun seem to be the chief English houses concerned. A great extent of property is, however, uninsured.

"But to continue. It now became known that Messrs. Thompson and Lindley, the latter gentleman here from London, for the opening of a railway to run eight miles from this, had been by the Senate entrusted as engineers with the direction of the concentrated means of the towns of Hamburgh and Altona, the latter as well as the country having supplied their engines and every disposable means. It was resolved by these gentlemen to abandon the whole of that portion of the town in the direction of the wind to the flames, and to cut off their contact with the other parts of the town, by the destruction of a long line of buildings, adjoining the part given up. This plan then was attempted about six in the afternoon, and announced to the inhabitants by explosion succeeding to explosion, as well as here and there by the sight of hundreds of workmen unroofing bricks upon house ; but the wind changed at about eleven or twelve o'clock at night, and from that hour the town became evidently doomed.

"The conduct of the people is most admirable, most praiseworthy ; quiet, docile, and orderly, but with deep despair and agony on many a countenance, as their whole existence vanishes before them in flame.

"The last two days have witnessed continual departures to the country of carts, carriages, barrows, people loaded with furniture, and all they could save of their property. The whole town is now emptying its population. The fields around Hamburgh are covered with furniture and household ware. Whole families, old and delicate women, little children, and the sick, have no cover but the canopy of heaven. They are sleeping here in the fields ; rain has at length come, but now only to add to their afflictions. There is no lodging now to be had anywhere for love or money. The loss of property may be estimated, at the least, at from 2,000,000*l.* to 2,500,000*l.* of British money.

By the Hull steamer, which left Hamburgh late on Sunday, accounts were received on Thursday, stating that the fire had been got under, and that no new explosions were any longer entertained for what remained of the city. The number of lives lost, it was estimated, exceeded a hundred. Among other edifices of importance that have been destroyed, are the churches of St. Peter, St. Nicholas, and St. Jacob, the old and new exchanges, the latter a splendid building opened about eight months since, the Post-office, and the Borsenhalle, or Lloyd's of Hamburgh.

The Bank is also among the buildings destroyed, but the books, we hear, have been saved, and the bullion in the cellars is not likely to have sustained any injury. It was a public institution, administered by public officers. It was merely a bank of deposit, and never advanced money on discount.

The public schools and the city library are not mentioned in any of the accounts as among the buildings destroyed, but they were close to streets that have been totally burned down ; and in a private letter it is stated, that on Saturday evening it was in contemplation to blow them up to arrest the progress of the fire in that direction.

All the principal booksellers' shops, and indeed all the best shops in town, have been destroyed. Four daily newspapers were published in Hamburgh, and of these the printing offices were those situated in that part of the town which has been laid in ashes.

Almost every hotel of any importance has been destroyed, and very few of the better description of coffee-houses have escaped. Among the private houses that have been burned are those of Senator Jenisch, which contained a fine collection of pictures ; the town-house of Mr. Parish, a merchant of European celebrity ; that of Mr. Solomon Heine, a Jew who had endeared himself to all classes in Hamburgh by his public spirit and comprehensive benevolence.

The great hospital, erected about fifteen years ago, was outside of the city wall, and has, therefore, escaped the general destruction ; but several other charitable establishments have been less fortunate.

Among the public buildings that have probably escaped may be mentioned the Theatre, the Orphan-house, the Observatory, the Prussian Post-office, the Barracks, &c.

Later accounts state that the New Exchange has escaped unhurt, though all the houses round about have been completely destroyed. The Town-house in the Neur Wall has also been saved.

By the Great Western, which arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday, in 15 days, from New York, bringing twenty-eight passengers, we have New York papers to the 30th inclusive. The new Tariff bring is of a cheering character. The negotiations, it is said, with England were making a rapid progress, and everything indicated that all the subjects in dispute would be satisfactorily arranged. The weather was fine, and the season spoken of as remarkably promising. Trade had begun to revive, prices were looking up, and it was the general opinion that the worst was passed.—The disputes in the State of Rhode Island, relative to the formation of a new constitution, continued, and the volunteer corps had been formed to protect persons and property against the revolutionary party. The little State was quite in a turmoil, and excited considerable interest in the other parts of the Union.—The Britannia has arrived out in 14½ days. A Bill had been reported in the Senate to prohibit all such cases as that of Alexander M'Leod. It gives to the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States power to grant writs of habeas in such cases, and to hear the cause, discharging the prisoner if he be entitled to his discharge.

The mission of Lord Ashburton to the United States is already producing a salutary effect. A letter has been received in town from high authority in the United States, stating his confident opinion that the differences between the two countries will be satisfactorily adjusted.—Standard.

Stanfield Jackson, a young man who came of age in 1841, appeared at the Insolvent Debtor's Court on Monday. Among the statements opposed against him was that he had received, since May last, £1114, the whole of which had extravagantly dissipated, and he was now in great poverty. Another sum of £400 he got rid of in less than two months while in the Fleet. His debts in the aggregate were set forth at 12,[illegible]. The court severely remarked on the blameable extravagance of the insolvent, and adjourned the case to serve a creditor.

TURKEY.

MEVLOOD, OR PROPHET'S BIRTH-DAY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, APRIL 27.—Although this ceremony is closely connected with the first source of Mussulman belief, it may be regarded rather as a civil court pageantry than as a general religious festival. With the exception of its being one of the three days upon which the Sultan annually proceeds in state to the Mosque of Achmet, and of salutes being fired at the hours of prayer, it is not distinguished by any public signs of devotion or respect. Business is not suspended, shops are not closed, work is performed as usual, no special prayers are offered up during the day at the ordinary mosques, and it is not regarded as a holiday by the common people, as is the case at Beiram. The preceding night is, however, included among the seven holy nights dedicated to the great mysteries of Islam, during which the mosques are illuminated within and without, and the faithful, summoned by the Muezims, crowd to the temples after dark to perform their devotions, in lieu of saying the prescribed night prayer in their houses or elsewhere. Attendance at the mosque is not enjoined by the canonical code, but orthodox Mussulmans hold it to be more meritorious to obtain the observance. Upon this night, called Leily ul Mevloody, as upon the other six mystic nights, it is also considered praiseworthy to abstain from all sensual gratifications. Thus few true believers, not excepting the Sultan, pass the threshold of their harems from sunset until dawn. Indeed, it is a received opinion, that all children born in consequence of the transgression, will come into the world as blind as bats, and go out of it as hump-backed as camels, and be subjected, moreover, to leprosy, rickets, and divers other bodily afflictions.

Nearly a thousand years elapsed after Mahomet's birth (A.D. 596), without either caliph or sultan having thought proper to institute any peculiar pageant or outward ceremony to commemorate the anniversary. No inquisition or allusions to that effect are to be found in the Koran or sacred writings. Thence, perhaps, the omission. In fact, many ultra-rigid Mussulmans consider the practice not only as a work of supererogation, but as unmanly and unorthodox. It was not until the year 1558, that is, 133 years after the conquest of Constantinople, and in the 996th year of the Hegira, that Sultan Mourad III. first ordained the celebration of special prayers in all the imperial mosques, and a public imperial procession, in order to record and do honour to the Prophet's nativity. This event, so pregnant with important religious and political changes, took place on the 12th of the month Reba-ul-eval, corresponding this year with the 23rd of April. The day is thence called Mevlood (the nativity). Thence also the hymn in Turkish verse, composed by a devout sheik in Sultan Mourad's time, and directed to be chaunted in the privileged mosques, is termed Mevloodich, or song of nativity.

This hymn is far inferior, however, in beauty and solemnity, to the celebrated Borda or Arabic "poem of the mantle," written in praise of the Almighty and of the Prophet's immortal glory, by one of his disciples, Kiab Ibun Shoeir. The Borda was thus designated because Mahomet rewarded the author by bestowing and placing upon his shoulder, a coarse camlet cloak, long worn by himself. This cloak, called Bourdeh Sherif, was, it is asserted, preserved by the descendants of Ibn Shoeir, until it was purchased for an immense sum by one of the early caliphs, and eventually passed into the possession of the Ottoman dynasty, by whom it was removed from Cairo to Constantinople. It is now preserved with rigid care and veneration in an apartment or chapel of the great seraglio, called the "member of the holy month," among other precious relics of the Prophet, such as the holy banner (sandjiak sherif) one of the four teeth lost by Mahomet at the battle of Bedr, a portion of his beard, and the impression of his foot upon a stone. These relics are forbidden to be exhibited to unbelievers who obtain firmans to visit the great seraglio. They are only disclosed to the Sultan and grand functionaries of the empire, upon the 15th day of Ramazan, and this with exceeding caution and ceremony.

It is the Kislar Aghassi also, in the character of Inspector or Treasurer-General of the Holy Cities (Haremain ush sheryfain Nazirty), who is deputed to deliver into the Sultan's hands the reply of the Sherif of Mecca to the complimentary letter annually addressed to the latter by his Imperial Majesty. This letter is entrusted to the chief conductor (Surreh Emini) of the caravan of pilgrims, who invariably leave Constantinople upon the 12th of Regieb, and conveys the Sultan's presents to the holy cities. The time usually required for the pilgrimage is about six months, but as delays and accidents frequently occur, the Sherif's answer is forwarded from Damascus by a special messenger, called Mouhedshi Bashi (Harbinger of Peace), who is required to reach Constantinople in time for the ceremony of the Mevlood, that is within seven lunar months of the caravan's departure from Stamboul.

As the Mussulman day commences with sunset, its last rays had scarcely disappeared behind the heights of Daoud Pacha, now crowned with the green tents of the numerous battalions encamped around the barracks, ere a salute from all the ships and batteries announced the approaching holy night. Shortly also, the clusters of lamps that entwine the circular galleries of the minarets on both sides of the harbour and Bosphorus, were gradually lighted and sparkled like groups of stars in the darkness; the imperial mosques of St. Sofia, Achmet, Mahomet, Soliman, Osman, the Princes, the Sultan Mother, and others, being distinguished from the rest not only by their commanding positions, but by their double and treble illuminated galleries, whence the Muezim chant forth the call to prayer. The front of the Imperial Cannon-gate, at Seraglio Point, those of the Arsenal and Custom-house, those of Sultana's and Pacha's palaces, and of all public buildings, being likewise adorned with illuminated festoons and devices, surrounded with transparencies, formed a scatter'd but pleasing spectacle when seen from the water, or from the summit of the adjacent eminences. During the Beiram and Ramazan, it is customary to connect the minaret galleries of the imperial mosques with festoons of lamps suspended to ropes, which, from their hanging in the shape of half-moons, the points upwards, are called Mahizeh (moon crescents), but this extraordinary illumination is omitted at Mevlood.

The dawn of the festival was ushered in with salutes similar to those that announced the close of the previous day. Then all was bustle and movement throughout the vast city and its suburbs. The drums and trumpets of the immense garrison and numerous fleet, mingling with the voices of the Muezims, summoned the soldiers to arms and the pious to their devotions. Kaiks belonging to Pachas and public persons, and heavier boats laden with troops of all arms, glided across the harbour and Bosphorus from Scutari and other adjacent villages. Led horses, clothed with rich housings, thronged the streets, and the population, especially the female portion, thronged towards the points through which the procession usually passes on its way from the Imperial Seraglio gate, near St. Sofia, to the square of the Al Maidan. This crowd, augmented by the double line of guards, formed upon either side of the narrow streets, resembled a sea of heads, and the portions allotted to, or taken possession of by, the women, might be compared to the white foam upon the waters, from the waving to and fro of their snow-white veils. Right bravely do those ladies cause themselves and their places to be respected. Woe to the individual, Moslem or Ghiaur, that attempts to encroach upon their places, or impede their sight Tongues and even hands are not wanting there to punish offenders. This was exemplified, in one instance, by two or three elderly dames unmercifully buffeting some marine soldiers, who attempted to force a passage through their party, and in another by a Frank gentleman and his wife receiving most unpleasant hints of sola me tangere from some younger ladies. Both had the satisfaction to "taste" a most indigestible dose of thumps and pinches for a similar offence. In London, they would most probably have met with harsher treatment than this, and with the loss of watch and purse as a compensation. But these samples of female rigour were not limited to intruders. In a corner near the Al Maidan, a feud arose between two ladies of "colour," sturdy damsels, whose white yashmaks formed a striking contrast to the jet black cheeks and noses that peered through the folds. After causing each other to devour an abundance of filth, they threw off their ferejees (mantles), and fell to work with both hands, after such a fashion as would have done honour to the great Mendoza. The combat of these two black tigresses seemed to afford so much amusement to the spectators of both sexes, that no one interfered; until at last a kavass (a police sergiant) stepped forward, and interposed an olive branch, under the shape of a buffalo's hide courbash. This he administered upon their shoulders in a most unsparing manner, and at last succeeded in producing a truce.

At Beiram it is customary for the Sultan to proceed to the mosque in time for first or dawn prayer; but the festival of the Mevlood being of human and not of divine institution, regular prayers are not performed. The propitious moment for the ceremony is selected between the morning and mid-day prayers, the one said to have been first practised by Adam, and the other by Abraham. The Sultan therefore quitted his palace of Beshiktash, after performing his devotions privately, and then proceeded incognito in his small fourteen-oared kaik to the gate at Seraglio Point, whence he ascended to the hall of audience. Here his Imperial Majesty held a levee, to which were admitted the vizier, mufti, grand dignitaries of state, and all persons entitled to the privilege of the rikhiah, kissing hands, or more properly speaking slippers, the same honour being paid to the Sultan's foot by Moslems, as to that of his Holiness of Rome by Catholics. Each individual having made his obeisance in the prescribed form, by doing homage on both knees, and touching the imperial slipper with his forehead, they withdrew, and mounting their horses, left in the outer court, placed themselves in their proper places in the procession. Those of inferior rank in front, and those of higher grade nearest the imperial person, which is always immediately preceded by the Vizier, Shiek-ul-Islam, and Capitan Pacha, and followed by the Master of the Horse and Kislar Aghassi. The grand marshal, Reza Pacha, having announced that all was prepared, the Sultan descended into the first court, and being assisted to mount his charger by the master of the horse, the bands struck up the imperial march, composed for the late Sultan by the brother of the celebrated Donizetti, who is director of the Padischa's music. The procession then commenced to file through the different courts, and thence under the great gate of the old Seraglio, contiguous to Santa Sofia.

The procession of the Mevlood differs in so few respects from that of the Beiram, that a repetition would be superfluous. It is necessary, to observe, however, that according to the injunctions of Sultan Mourad, the founder, it was directed that the dresses worn by all persons should be less brilliant than those exhibited at Beiram. Consequently, although the Pachas and others appeared in their full-dress coats, and with trappings and housings not to be surpassed in splendour, the attire of the Sultan was less gorgeous than that worn by him at Beiram. Thus, in lieu of the dolman braided with diamonds, his Imperial Majesty wore a blue and military coat, richly embroidered with gold sprigs. But the same invaluable nishan was suspended from his neck; diamonds of equal lustre adorned the collar of the imperial mantle, and the housings of his dark bay horse were equally resplendent with pearls and precious gems. The Sultan appeared to be in good health, and the lustre of his dark full eye was no less piercing than upon the last occasion, when it attracted the admiration of his female subjects and the pride of his male population. It is not considered etiquette for the Sovereign to bow or return salutes. The only permitted mode of recognition, and this generally towards Franks, is by gazing at them as he passes, and keeping his eyes fixed upon their faces, without turning his own head. This produced a very singular effect, and is not easily forgotten by those who have encountered this gaze—full, piercing, and commanding, yet gentle and complacent in the extrem

We will pass over the procession, therefore, which only differed from that of Beiram in the above respect, and from the royal escort being composed of infantry and cavalry, and proceed to the mosque, where the ceremonies appointed for the day are of a civil and religious character. Upon reaching the gate leading into the square enclosed court opposite the grand entrance, all present dismount, and entering, take the places assigned to them by the master of the ceremonies, under the superintendence of the kislar aghassi, whose place is upon a raised cushion near a small stair which conducts to the Sultan's gallery. The positions occupied by some of the higher functionaries is nearly as follows:—In front of the altar or niche in the wall, showing the direction of Mecca, are two elevated stools or cushions of the Grand Vizier and Sheik-ul-Islam; and to the right of these the cadi-leskiers somewhat farther back, for the Capitan Pacha, Minister of Finance, and Scraskier, who sit in a place formerly occupied by the Aga of the Janissaries. Behind the Minister of Finance, and directly under the Sultan's gallery, are seated the whole body of scribes and principal civil clerks, named "khodjekian," each placed from left to right, according to his rank, upon small praying carpets called thramlek. On the upper or left side of the Sheik-ul-Islam, carpets are also spread for the ullemahs of the first rank; such, for instance, as the hekim bashi (chief physician), the kade asker (grand judges) of Roumelia and Anatolia, the Stamboul effendessi (mayor of Constantinople), the chief magistrates of Galata and Tophana, and some others. This first row is immediately under the pulpit of the preachers, privileged to recite certain prayers in the bath. Behind this line runs that of the several classes of the ullemahs. Behind these, again, are placed the teachers of colleges and lawyers of different grades, all designated by the title of muderis.

Between the first and second lines of ullemahs, opposite the imperial gallery, carpets are placed for the reis effendi, and several musselim (marshal of the palace); and to the right of these are also seated the members of the grand council of state, amongst whom are the Sultan's two brothers-in-law, Halil and Felsh Achmet Pacha, both destined, ere long, most probably, to rise to higher functions. The former is remarkable for his handsome features, a gift of nature for which he was indebted to the favours showered upon him by Sultan Mahmoud, and his consequent elevation from a common Circassian slave, to be the husband of the Sultan's beautiful daughter, Sadeheh Sultana.

Upon this occasion the chief of the emirs, or Prophet's kin, and who is one of the highest ullemahs, receives distinguished honours. He is seated upon a green cushion of state, under a species of green canopy, close to the pulpit of the sheiks, or first preachers, the deans of the cathedral. He is attired in his green caftan and head shawl, and is guarded by a body of officers, all Prophet's kin, and likewise distinguished by green ornaments and shawls twisted round their fez. It would occupy too much space to describe the remainder of the immense number of civil, military, and ecclesiastical personages who fill the body of this vast edifice, and who are divided from the multitude of spectators by two lines of hademeh (body guards), and by the tchaouah (sergeants) of the imperial police.

Before the Sultan reaches the mosque each person assembled therefore, immediately upon his Imperial Majesty ascending the private back stairs conducting to his gallery, the lattices are thrown open, and the whole assembly rise. The Grand Vizier and Sheik-ul-Islam step forward and bow to the Sovereign. The whole assembly make a similar obeisance, and the latter being again closed, all re-seat themselves, and the ceremony commences. This consists, firstly, of an oration or eulogium of the Prophet, divided into three parts. The first portion upon this occasion was delivered from the pulpit called Kursee, by the Sheik of St. Sofia, who takes precedence of all others, and is to be considered as the metropolitan; the second was recited by the Sheik of Achmet; and the third by the Sheik of Nour Osmanich (the light of Osmar), whose turn it was to perform this duty. In the middle of this portion of this panegyrical discourse, and not between the intervals, the two senior capidjibasshi (chamberlains of the household) present to the Sultan a vase and ewer filled with rosewater, which the one pours over his hands, whilst the other offers a richly embroidered towel. Then the two other chamberlains waive before him two censers of silver filled also with burning aloe wood. At the same time a number of tchokadar basshi (grooms of the chamber) step forward with similar ewers and cassolets, and offer rose water and perfumes to the vizier and all the ullemahs and dignitaries. When each sheik has terminated his portion of the oration he descends from the kursee, and is met by officers who attended the kislar aghassi, who compliment him, and present him with a pelisse of honour lined with rich furs and trimmed with gold.

This being ended, the muezims of the mosque, who occupy the lofty gallery allotted to them on the southern side of the great dome, chaunt forth a hymn of praise to the Prophet. When they have finished, a body of other singers, stationed in a species of moveable pulpit, recite in chorus the psalms or prayers selected for the occasion, and this being ended, the Mevlood-Khanambir ascend this pulpit, and recite the Mevloodich. In the midst of this the Hademeh, who perform the duties of the ancient battle-axe guard, attired in their green and gold uniforms and state caps, surmounted with immense plumes, set aside their axes and advance with a number of trays, some covered with a variety of sweetmeats and preserves of the rarest kinds in baskets and crystal vases, and others laden with bowls of the finest sherbets in season. Two of these trays are then placed before each of the grand dignitaries and first rank of ullemahs. These trays are afterwards carried with their contents by the servants of the mosque to the respective abodes of those to whom they are presented. Similar trays of exquisite form and immense size are likewise offered by the kislar aghassi to the Sultan, to whom they are presented by the first officer of the seraglio. The latter are then conveyed to the palace, and are destined to be distributed to the sevral kadins (or wives), or to such favourites as the Sultan may choose to distinguish. Those gifts are said to excite nearly as much jealousy and satisfaction as the portions of lamb or mutton distributed at Beiram.

It is during the chaunting of the Mevloodich, at the moment when the Prophet's name is first pronounced, that the "Harbinger of Peace," who holds himself in readiness near the foot of the imperial gallery, steps forward with the sheriff's letter which he holds up in its embroidered green cover above his head. At this signal the whole assembly arise in silence—not a breath is heard but the deep-toned voice of the officiating Mevlood Khanan. The first secretary of the Grand Vizier then advances towards the bearer of the letter, and beckons him to approach. The latter obeys, and passing to the side of the Vizier, delivers his all-precious charge into his hands, which the Vizier respectfully receives, and then hands it over to the Reis Effendi. A pause then ensues, during which the Grand Marshal and Master of Ceremonies, the Mess [illegible] first Chamberlain silently step forward, and proceed with the Reis Effendi to the seat of the Kislar Aghassi. The latter then takes the letter from the hands of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and ascending the stairs of the Sultan's gallery, presents it to the Sovereign, who breaks the seal, and reads the contents. Having done so, his Imperial Majesty returns it to the Kislar Aghassi, who re-delivers it to the Reis Effendi, by whom it is placed in the archives of his department, or rather in that of the State Paper-office. At this moment dresses of honour, or equivalent presents of great value, are given by the Sultan to the Chief of the Eunuchs, who, in his turn, presents similar gifts to the bearer of the letter, to the singers of the Mevloodich, to the Reis Effendi, and other persons who assisted in bearing the letter to the foot of the Royal gallery. This being done, and the Mevloodich being terminated, the whole assembly resume their seats, and following the voice of one of the Imauns, recite a short prayer, with which the church ceremony closes.

The whole of the vast multitude then retire in silence, and resume their places in the procession. The Sultan, when remounted, descends from his gallery, and in a short time the [illegible] geous cavalcade returns to the seraglio nearly in the same order as that pointed out for its passage to the Mosque.

The Polish Literary Society celebrated on Tuesday the [illegible] anniversary of the Polish Constitution of 1791. All the Poles in Paris, and a great many foreigners, were present. Prince Czartoriski presided, and delivered a speech, in which he expressed the gratitude of himself and his countrymen for the asylum granted to the refugees by both France and England. Several other Poles of distinction also expressed the same sentiments.

We regret to state that Mr. Healey, the popular composer and leader, was discovered dead in his bed on Tuesday morning, at his residence, Shepherd's Cottage, Vine-terrace, Waterloo-road. It appeared that Mr. Healey, who had been sitting up all Monday night, composing and arranging the music of the new pieces to be produced on Whit Monday at the Strand Theatre, and feeling fatigued and somewhat indisposed, retired to his chamber at about half-past one o'clock in the morning, to lay down on his bed for a short time, observing to Mrs. Healey that he intended only to take a nap, and that afterwards he should resume his labour. Mrs. Healey, at the expiration of the stated time, finding that her husband had not risen, went into the room for the purpose of rousing him, when she found him insensible. Medical aid was instantly called in, but the efforts of the surgeons to restore animation were fruitless. Mr. Healey was the leader at the Adelphi and New Strand Theatres, and formerly occupied the same situation at Astley's Amphitheatre. He was considered a first-rate musician, and was the composer of a number of popular airs and melodies.

YEOVIL.—The privations of the 20,000 individuals who were thrown out of employ by the stopping for a month of all business by the manufacturers of this town, we hear, have been borne with the greatest and almost unexampled patience; thus affording a gratifying contrast to the more turbulent spirits of the north.—Western Times.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The King, Queen, and the Royal Family removed from the Tuileries on Saturday, to their summer palace at Neuilly.

The Commerce states that a number of domiciliary visits were made throughout Paris on Saturday, particularly in the neighbourhood of the Faubourgs St. Antoine, of St. Denis, and of the Temple. The keeper of a wine-shop in the Rue des Marias du Temple was arrested. It is added that Quennisset still remains at the Conciergerie, and that the late captures were made in consequence of information furnished by him. Others pretend that the information was given to the Prefect of Police by the chere amie of one of the parties, who had since disappeared, and was said to have been killed and thrown into the river by the conspirators. Private letters state that the projectiles seized were of glass, and in the nature of hand-grenades, intended for the destruction of the King, by being thrown into and exploding in his carriage.

The Chamber of Deputies on Saturday night passed the ensemble of article one, classing the railroad lines:—1. From Paris to the Belgian frontiers. 2. From Paris to the Channel. 3. From Paris to the frontiers of Germany, by Nancy and Strasbourg. 4. From Paris to the Mediterranean by Lyons, Marseilles, and Cette. 5. From Paris to the frontiers of Spain, by Tours, Bordeaux, and Bayonne. 6. From Paris to the Ocean, by Tours and Nantes. 7. From Paris to the centre of France, by Bourges 8. From the Mediterranean to the Rhine, by Lyons, Dijon, and Mulhausen. 9. And lastly, from the Mediterranean to the Ocean, by Toulouse and Bordeaux.

Article two, as to the means of execution of all these lines, it is expected, will be modified, so as to extend the facilities to private enterprise; but it is not anticipated that the Chamber, out of all the above grand projects, will vote this session credits for more than one specific line, which is expected to be the one from the Mediterranean to the British Channel.

The Vigie de l'Ouest (St. Malo) states, that the French cruisers on the Granville station, had captured several English fishing boats engaged in dredging oysters on the coast, and that their cargoes were sold at Granville for 4000 francs, which were distributed amongst the hospitals of that town.

DREADFUL RAILROAD ACCIDENT NEAR PARIS.—Sunday last being appointed for the celebration of the king's fete at Versailles, by a grand display of the celebrated jets d'eau, fire-works, &c., the place was crowded by an astonishing number of the residents of Paris and its vicinity. The waterworks were over at half-past five o'clock. An immense number of persons immediately repaired to the terminus of each line of railroad, and took their departure for town. The train of the left bank was unusually long; it consisted of seventeen carriages, impelled by three engines, and conveyed about 1500 passengers. On arriving between Meudon and Bellevue the axletree of the first engine broke. The body of it, the fire, &c., fell to the ground. The second engine, so great was the impetus, smashed it in pieces, and passed over it, and the boiler burst, throwing the unfortunate stoker fifty feet into the air. The carriages arrived of course, and passed over the wreck, when six of them were instantly set in flames by the fire, being newly painted, they instantly ignited. Three were totally consumed, and three others partially, without the possibility of escape to their unhappy inmates, who were locked up according to the dreadful practice of such establishments.

Thirty-eight of the wounded were brought to the Hospital Necker, seven of whom expired in the course of Monday.

At six o'clock on Monday morning, the mutilated remains of thirty-two persons, men, women, and children, were removed from the station to the adjoining cemetery of Mount Parnasse, where they continued exposed under a shed, and covered with a coarse cloth, during the entire day. But they were so mangled and disfigured, that it was impossible so discover a vestige of human features, except in a young girl of eighteen, the lower part of whose body was entirely consumed. The names of the sufferers could only be ascertained by that of the limbs or portions of limbs found. Five others, who still retained some human shape, and whose faces could lead to their recognition, were transported to the Morgue, where thousands of persons were drawn up in a queue, at three o'clock, waiting to be admitted to view the bodies. There was among them a lady, whose body was partly burned, but whose face was intact. She was richly attired, and still wore her bracelets.

The number of killed is variously estimated. The Prefect of Police sent a return to the Minister of the Interior, in the course of Monday, in which it was set down at forty-two. Another report stated it to be seventy-seven; and the parish priest of Sevres, who repaired to the spot immediately after the fatal occurrence, and stopped there during the whole night, administering the consolations of religion to the dying and wounded, computed the dead at no fewer than eighty. Among these are said to be several persons of distinction, including two deputies.

"The Rive gauche Versailles Railway was yesterday evening the scene of a deplorably fatal accident, by which many lives have been lost, and a great number of persons dreadfully maimed. This sad catastrophe took place near Meudon, the train which experienced the accident being that which started at half-past five o'clock from Versailles, and which, being crowded to excess with persons returning to town from the fete, rendered the event more calamitous than it would have been at any ordinary period. Our informant is a gentleman who was a passenger by the train, and who was happily in one of the carriages which escaped the collision. He describes the velocity with which the train was proceeding some minutes previous to the accident as extreme, so great as to have suggested in his mind the idea that the slightest obstacle on the road encountered by the wheels of the engine at such a moment as dangerous to excess. The thought had scarcely occurred to him, when a frightful shock to the entire train, a fearful crash, mingled with horrible shrieks from all the carriages in advance of that in which he sat, showed that some dreadful accident had occurred, but the doors of the carriages being locked at the exterior, it was not until our informant and the other passengers in the carriage, and in those which were placed behind it, were able to make their egress by the windows, that the frightful extent of the accident they had so providentially escaped became known to them. The scene which presented itself was truly appalling. It appeared that the engine had by some fatality got off the line and ran up against the embankment, when, from the alarming rapidity with which the heavy-laden train was then running, six or seven of the carriages were literally dashed to pieces, and were lying in a mass of fragments piled upon the engine. Numbers of the outside passengers had been thrown off by the shock; but of the unhappy sufferers who had taken their places in the interior, and who still survived, the fate was even more dreadful than those who had been killed; for to make the calamity still more horrible, the fire of the engine almost instantly extended to the broken mass which was above it, and several of the sufferers were actually burnt to death on the spot. Our informant describes the shrieks of the victims (whom it was impossible to aid, and more particularly of two unfortunate ladies, who were vainly calling to the last for water) as inexpressibly dreadful."—Galignani.

"It was at the passage over the paved road, called the Chemin des Gardes, that the dreadful accident occurred. The train was drawn by three locomotives, and the rapidity with which they moved was such, that a few seconds before the catastrophe the persons who saw the train pass expressed their fears that an accident would happen.

"It is believed that the first engine in crossing the paved road was driven off the rails, and the shock was so violent, that the three first waggons were broken to pieces and consumed by the fire of the locomotive. The column of fire was more than twenty yards high, and consumed all the unfortunate travellers who came within its focus.

"The excess of precaution taken by the directors to confine the travellers to their carriages was fatal on this occasion. Many of the victims would have been saved if they could only have opened the doors of the carriages."—The Commerce.

"On going to examine into the cause of the accident, the two engines were found one resting upon the other; the tender of one of them had been completely turned round, and in the directly opposite position; a little on one side was a waggon overturned, and half burnt; at a short distance some of the rails were cut asunder, and others driven deep into the earth. The noise which preceded the accident was not that of the explosion of a bursting boiler, nor were there any traces of violent rupture in the bodies of the engines; but it was astonishing to find that the sentry-box of one of the watchmen near at hand showed all the appearance of having been blown up."—The National.

"Within half an hour the news spread like wildfire through the capital, that upwards of 200 persons had been hurried into eternity by the bursting of a boiler of the engine. Upon inquiries at the terminus it was indeed difficult to gather information, even from those who had providentially escaped. The scene on the line as far as Meudon beggared all description. According to some persons an explosion was heard, and then a dreadful shock was felt in the diligences as from an earthquake. According to others no explosion was heard, but a dreadful vibration was experienced, and then the air rung with shrieks and cries for assistance. A dense volume of smoke and large flames first met the view of my informants, who escaped out of the windows of the diligences. Waggons were rolling over the rails, and the most fearful lamentations were heard to pierce the air. From five to six hundred voices resounded, and from the villages and from the valleys the population poured forth dismayed, not knowing where to render assistance, and fearful that the exhausted steam might yet further endanger the lives of the survivors of the catastrophe. It appeared that three engines were attached to about eighteen carriages. These carriages are divided into waggons, with inside and outside places, diligences with coupes. The waggons are next to the engine and tender, and the diligences are inclosed between the waggons. The accident, therefore, affected the first half-dozen waggons. The cause was attributed by some to the breaking of the axletrees of the first engine, the Mathieu Murray. The second coming upon the first, broke it to pieces, and the fire escaping, communicated underneath the three first waggons, which being thus set on fire, and being newly painted, burnt most rapidly, before the persons sitting inside could escape by the windows, the doors being fast closed by springs, the keys of which were in the hands only of the conductors. The flames were 30 yards high, and as a smart wind was blowing, the waggons and their living contents were instantly consumed, amidst heart-rending screams for aid. 'In the name of God,' cried one female, 'give me water.' Her voice died away, and a kind of delirium seized some bystanders at their incapability to save the unhappy woman. The very precautionary measures adopted by the railroad directors to shut up the carriages to prevent accidents, turned out most fatally, for if the doors could have been opened, many might have been saved. All the people of the neighbouring villages, as soon as it was practicable, rendered assistance. The authorities were on the alert, and many of the wounded were removed to the chateau of Meudon on litters. It was like a field after a battle. The groans of the wounded were awfully mixed with the hysteric sobs of the sympathising witnesses of the catastrophe. Never was there a more horrid spectacle than the one exhibited in the avenue of Meudon, with the disfigured, mutilated, blackened, and still bleeding bodies were stretched out. The Hospital Necker also received many wounded. The dead bodies were removed to the waiting-room of the Paris terminus, which was instantly closed. The Paris line of six o'clock was stopped. The service for the day was closed. About thirty to forty are killed and one hundred and fifty wounded. Regiments of troops were immediately put on the line to keep off the populace, which after their first stupefaction, exhibited such signs of resentment as to cause fears that their rage might be vented on the destruction of the whole line of railroad. The number of waggons burned was said last night to be seven, and each waggon contained forty persons; but, of course, a great number escaped out of the windows. One touching instance of maternal devotion has been related to me this morning by a person who escaped. After jumping out of one of the windows of a waggon, he saw in the midst of the flames a child thrown out of the same window on the grass by a female, who with her husband, were passengers with him. The parents, alas! fell victims, after saving their child, who escaped miraculously with a few slight bruises."

"PARIS, Monday, Five o'clock.—It is now official that fifty are killed. Heaven knows the number of wounded, but it cannot be less than one hundred and fifty. An attempt was made this morning by the populace to destroy the terminus, but the buildings were saved by the police and military, who were in great force. M. Taugat, Deputy for Avignon, was severely burned, as well as his wife. Six employes on the railroad have perished, and two pupils of the Polytechnic School have also been recognised. There are nine bodies at the Morgue to be claimed, and thirty-one at the Cemetery of the Sainte. Steamers were plying all day on the Seine to remove the wounded from Meudon to Paris. The engineer, George, who was killed, was an Englishman. It is now positive that the accident arose from the breaking of the axletrees of the first engine. The body of an infantry officer has been identified, as also that of M. Rebel, a Paris advocate. The first and second waggons were entirely burned.

Railroad shares have fallen 20f. in consequence of the accident.—The Siecle also publishes a letter from M. Aubouf, mayor of Meudon, dated at eight o'clock on Tuesday morning, in which, after relating the general features of the accident as given above, and by our other accounts, adds:—"The spectacle was most horrible when the burning away of the panels of the vehicles exposed the results of the fire inside. Masses of disfigured bodies, some still palpitating, trunks without members, and members reduced to cinders. One woman escaped as by a miracle, after seeing her mother and two children consumed by her side. Another mother was snatching her child from the flames, but clasped only a headless body. In a few minutes all the houses in the neighbourhood were spontaneously converted into hospitals, and their inhabitants, with laudable zeal, made every exertion for the relief of the sufferers. Litters and conveyances of all kinds were quickly brought down. A company of engineer soldiers hurried to the spot with fire-engines, but water was wanting. At every instant bodies were rescued from the burning heap, but they were for the most part so much burnt as for it to be impossible to identify them. The ground was strewed with watches and money. As the wind blew with great force, the fire could not be got under till about ten o'clock, and then it was found that at least sixty persons were either dead or in imminent danger, besides uncountable numbers more or less seriously injured. The directors of the railroad displayed an activity worthy of all praise, having sent several carriages from Paris to convey back the victims. While I am writing, the authorities of Versailles and the directors are on the spot clearing away all the remains, and sending them in carriages either to Versailles or Paris."

SPAIN.—Private correspondence from Madrid, of the 2nd inst., states that the grand procession in commemoration of the 2nd May, 1808, was conducted with the most perfect decorum. The Regent acted as chief mourner, having the political chief on his right, and the first constitutional alcalde on his left. The Excellency's aides-de-camp followed. At two o'clock all was concluded, and the National Guard had returned home. The amount of subscription on the monument erected to the victims was replaced by the following:—"The grateful nation to the martyrs of Spanish independence." Added by the municipality of Madrid in 1840, "the ashes of the victims of the 2nd May, 1808, repose in the field of honour moistened with their blood. Eternal honour to their patriotism."

The Gazette of Upper Germany, of the 4th inst., states, that when a certain diplomatist applied some time since to Prince Metternich, to enter into an arrangement relative to the Queen of Spain's marriage, the Prince replied, that during thirty-three years he had succeeded in every plan he formed under the most critical circumstances, by constantly stifling every political movement which it was attempted to excite without necessity. He moreover declared to M. Pageot,—1st, that the northern powers would not interfere with respect to the Queen of Spain's marriage until the favourable moment should arrive; 2ndly, that they would not interfere in the internal affairs of Spain, nor would they acknowledge the existing Government; 3rdly, that neither the French nor English Governments could induce them to alter their determination.

ITALY.—"We have been assured," says the Semaphore de Marseilles of the 4th inst., that Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, has lately adopted a measure worthy of the worst times of the middle ages. He has ordered the expulsion of the Israelites from the town of Savona within three days, and the reunion in one of the filthiest streets in Genoa (which will thus have its Ghetto) of the Jewish population of that city."

POLAND.—The Presse announces that an amnesty would be granted by the Emperor of Russia to the Polish political offenders in the month of July next.

The Bishop of London has forwarded the donation of £50 to the fund now in the course of being raised for the restoration of Hereford Cathedral.

Mr. Charles Pearson has resigned all pretensions to the office of City of London Town Clerk, in favour of Mr. Serjeant Merewether, who is now opposed only by Mr. Pritchard.

INDIA.—A letter was received in town on the 9th inst., from Captain J. Hoppe, of the 16th Bengal Native Infantry, and Adjutant of the 2nd regiment of infantry of Shah Soojah.—Captain Hoppe led the storming party, and was wounded in the attack of Kelat Ghilzie. His letter is dated Candahar, February 11, the gallant officer writes to his father thus:—"We are, thank God, all safe at this place, although in the daily expectation of the people in the town rising against us, and the enemy only twenty-five miles off, are threatening to attack us. Our communication with Cabul and the provinces is cut off, and report says that Sir W. M'Naughten, the envoy and minister, is murdered with several other officers. It is to be hoped, in the spring, troops will be pushed up from India—for we can do nothing at this season—when, please God, we will give them a lesson they little think of. General Nott, with a large force, went against the rebels, collected only eight miles from Candahar, and killed and wounded 700 or 800 of them, but they are increasing in numbers every day, and one of Shah Soojah's sons (Sutter Jung) at their head. It is said they dined in their shrouds the other day, and swore upon the Koran that they would either murder us all, or be killed in the attempt. At present we are all safe and well."

A correspondent of the Times, who appears quite satisfied with the last intelligence from India, writing of two officers who are now in England from Affghanistan, says—"I rejoice to see that the officers to whom I refer consider the ladies and other prisoners in the custody of Akbbar Khan as secure from all indignity, though a ransom may probably be demanded for their release; and that they believe that the assassination of Sir W. M'Naughten will prove not to have been the act of Akbbar Khan, but to have been perpetrated, like that of Sir A. Burnes, by the uncontrollable fanaticism of the Ghazees."

It is but justice to General Elphinstone to notice the fact, that, in a despatch from Major Pottinger, dated January 30, he says that so far from blaming General Elphinstone for what has occurred he entirely exonerated him. This shows, at all events, the impropriety of those hasty condemnations which have been pronounced in some quarters. We apprehend that no newspaper-writer in this country has yet had altogether such good opportunities of appreciating General Elphinstone's conduct as Major Pottinger, and by that officer he has been altogether exonerated.

Our illustrations of the chief points of interest at the seat of war in the East are this week limited to views of the city of Cabul and the forces of Ghuznee, which we shall accompany with the following notice:—

CITY OF CABUL.—Cabul, the chief city of the province of the same name, is the capital of Affghanistan; it is situated on the river Cabul, in a large well-watered plain, filled with villages; low hills surround it on three sides, on one of which, to the north, is the King's palace. Also, on another hill near the city, is the tomb of the Emperor Baber, surrounded by large beds of flowers, and commanding a noble prospect. Many beautiful gardens surround the town, which is celebrated for its fine climate, though the proximity of the mountains causes great variety of temperature. The town itself is not large, but handsome and compact, and the houses, to avoid the consequences of the frequent earthquakes, are mostly build of wood. Cabul lies in latitude 31 deg. 10m. east, lon. 71 deg. 43 min.

This city is about 6000 feet above the level of the sea, and lies in a triangular gorge. The hills which encompass it on three sides are steep, bare, and rocky, and are crowned with a long line of wall, which is carried up their sides, summits, and across the narrow entrance which lies between them. This wall was intended as a defence against the Ghilzies, but it has fallen into ruin. The city itself is surrounded by a high but weak wall, and has no ditch. Above the fortress, upon an eminence is the citadel, and within this fort a brother of Dost Mahomed built a palace, which he called Koolah-i-Feringhee, or the European Hat, and which very curiously became, during the British occupation, in 1839, the hospital of the 13th Light Infantry. Around Cabul, and indeed throughout the Affghan country, are scattered castled houses, the seats of the principle men of the country, who, from the insecurity in which they live, have all their places strongly fortified."

GHUZNEE.—On the 1st of July, 1839, the British army under the command of Sir John Keane arrived before Ghuznee, and early in the morning of the 23rd began its operations. The Cabul gate was blown in; the tremendous fire of our artillery paralysed the enemy, and the English advanced guard, after a short but desperate struggle, won their way into the place. Prince Mahomed Hyder, after having made submission to the Shah, who spared his life at the intercession of the Commander-in-Chief, was retained prisoner of war in the British camp. The British loss in this engagement only 200 men, 18 being killed, whilst 500 dead of the enemy were buried by them two hours after the capture. At this period, the fortress, one of the strongest in western Asia, and whose capture was undoubtedly one of the most brilliant that British troops could achieve, was in possession of Mahomed Hyder Khan, son of the Ameer of Cabul, and the garrison which he commanded, amounted to the number of between 3000 or 4000, about 1500 of which were well-mounted cavalry. Lord Keane's plan of attack was brilliant, and its execution daring. The attack at the gates was vehemently severe, and the resistance of the Affghans great. In two hours it fell; the whole of the British troops employed in the service amounted to about 4400. Of the enemy upwards of 800 were slain, and near 1500 made prisoners. Numerous horses, camels, and mules, were captured, but no valuable booty obtained. The great gun of Ghuznee, which was captured, was an unwieldy piece of ordnance, to which the Affghans attached much importance, but which was very disproportionate to the injury it was capable of inflicting. Its great weight and the badness of the roads to the Indus, has prevented its being sent to England.

THE UNITED STATES.

Although the form of Government of the United States of North America is an exceedingly simple one, yet it is far from being understood in England. We may, probably, give a brief analysis of it in a future number of our journal.

The present President of the United States, John Tyler, of Virginia, succeeded to that office, under the provisions of the constitution, on the death of General Harrison, having been previously elected to the Vice Presidency, by the same overwhelming vote of the people which elevated General Harrison to the Presidency. It is not probable that Mr. Tyler would have received one-twentieth part of the votes for President which he did for the hitherto comparatively unimportant office of Vice President. The possibility of the Vice President stepping into the Executive chair by the demise of the President, having, in this instance, been realized, will naturally make the people more careful in future who they elect to the subordinate office. This is not said in disparagement of Mr. Tyler, who is unquestionably patriotic in his feelings, urbane and gentlemanly in his manner, and in every respect an honourable, amiable, and honest man; but he has too much good sense to say, that two years ago he supposed himself qualified, either by nature or acquirements, for the office of President of the United States. He will, probably, be a candidate before the people for election in 1844, and they will then place their seal of approbation, or otherwise upon his pretensions. From present appearances, his chance of success is very small. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, will, undoubtedly, be brought forward as a candidate for the Presidency; and if any man in the country have just claims upon his fellow citizens, for the first office in their gift, he is that man. Mr. Clay has filled every office below those of President and Vice President, with pre-eminent ability, and with unquestioned integrity; in the most satisfactory and beneficial manner to his country, and with the greatest honour and truest fame to himself. General Winfield Scott, the commander-in-chief of the American army, will be placed in nomination for the Vice Presidency by the same party which will support Mr. Clay for President. General Scott is as advantageously known as a gentleman, a scholar, and an enlightened and patriotic citizen, as he is for being a skilful, judicious, and gallant soldier. The people of the United States would do themselves honour and service by the election of Mr. Clay and General Scott to the two highest offices in the Government.

There will be, most probably, one or two other candidates. The old party distinctions are, however, in a great measure, broken up—Federalist and Democrat are no longer the watchwords of parties; and Whig and Loco-foco will also most likely have become obsolete before another presidential election. Mr. Clay, will, however, be the candidate of the genuine Whigs; and it is very likely that the pseudo Loco-focos will bring forward the ex-President, Martin Van Buren, as the advocate of their views. There is, probably, no man of the party so likely to succeed as Mr. Van Buren himself. He was the avowed successor of General Jackson, and the perpetuator of his policy. It is the strongest proof of the energy and power of the United States, that the country prospered, and increased in population, in wealth, and in everything which renders a nation truly great, in spite of the mistaken policy of the government, and during twelve years of a proscriptive, jealous, and short-sighted administration of public affairs, and a very wasteful expenditure of the public money. Mr. Van Buren is a man of gentlemanly and amiable manners, very much esteemed in all the relations of private life; and could he shake himself loose from the trammels of party, he would, no doubt, acting according to his own judgment, exhibit more marks of the enlightened statesman and the disinterested patriot than he has hitherto done. Two years may make great changes in the feelings of the people, but they must be great indeed, before any man from the ranks of Locofocoism can succeed to the presidency.

Daniel Webster, the present able Secretary of State, will not, in all probability be a candidate at the next election. His talents and his services have rendered him the idol of his own part of the country, the New England States; but strong sectional feeling, arising from local causes, which will, it may be hoped, subside in a few more years, would, at present, shut him out from the remotest chance of success.

Other candidates have been spoken of, such as John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, who would probably not receive a vote out of his own state. Commodore Stewart, known as a gallant seaman, but for nothing more, who has been nominated by a small party in Pensylvania, and one or two others of still less pretensions, have been mentioned: but, probably, none of these will come to the starting-post at the Presidential race. The candidates will most likely be Mr. Tyler, Mr. Van Buren, and Mr. Clay; and of these three, the odds are, at present, most decidedly in favour of the latter.

It has been said that the United States prospered and increased in wealth, &c., during the injudicious administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren; and it may be asked in rejoinder, how is it then that the treasury of the United States is now exhausted, and the monetary and financial affairs of the government so entirely disarranged? Let it be borne in mind that the people of the United States do not, at present, contribute one farthing in direct taxation, nor have they for the last twenty years, towards the support of the general government; and also that the rates of duties on imported goods have been, during the last ten years, annually diminished; that during the last twelve years, every dollar of the national debt has been paid off. Let distinction also be made between a poor government and a poor people. If the United States have the former, they have not the latter. If a certain country nearer home have not the former, they, unfortunately, most unquestionably have the latter. Which is the best position to be placed in? A small amount of individual taxation, or an increase of the duties upon imported articles of luxury, or a temporary loan of fifteen or twenty millions of pounds sterling, would remove all the difficulties, fill the coffers of the government without sensibly increasing the burthens of the people, and launch the country again full sail upon the current of commercial and political prosperity.

AWFUL STEAM BOAT EXPLOSION.

It is our melancholy duty to record the most fearful and fatal steam-boat explosion which has ever taken place on the waters of the Chesapeake. The Medora was just completed, and, preparatory to being turned out of the hands of the machinist, a number of persons were invited to go in her on an experimental trip. The day being pleasant, it is supposed that probably 100 or more were on board, including some of the directors of the steam-boat company and their friends, and a number of the hands engaged in finishing the vessel, putting in the machinery, &c., and otherwise connected with the construction or sailing of the boat. Soon after 3 o'clock P.M., the boat was about to start from the wharf of the engine builder, Mr. John Watchman, on the south side of the basin, on the proposed trip. A gentleman who was on board informs us, that the engine had only made the second revolution, in order to back the Medora from the wharf, when the boiler exploded with a loud noise, carrying upwards a considerable portion of the upper deck, and those upon it, and blowing the smoke stacks high in the air. The main force of the explosion was almost exclusively towards the head of the boat, and the portions of the boat around the boiler were torn to pieces. The boiler itself, an immense one of iron, was thrown crosswise on the deck. The boat was instantly enveloped in a cloud of scalding steam, which was inhaled by some with fatal consequences, while others suffered externally in their persons from its effect. Our informant was in the after-part of the boat, where the steam had no effect. He says that several persons were forced overboard, and that one of them was drowned. The boat immediately settled down in the water, until her hull rested on the bottom of the river. In the centre and forward part of the boat there was a fearful destruction of life and limb. Some of those on board were blown high in the air, and fell on shore, in the water, and on the boats lying near by. Others were crushed with the splintered timbers, others scalded with the steam, while those below the decks not having time to escape, were either suffocated by the steam, or drowned when the boat sunk. When we reached the scene of desolation, we found a large number of persons, among whom were several physicians, busily engaged in endeavouring to assist the injured, and carrying away those who were dead or dying. So great was the confusion that prevailed, and so little was known as to the number and names of the persons on board, that no complete account could be obtained. There are no doubt some who were on board whose loss will only be known by their not returning to their homes—Captain Sutton, who had command of the boat, was standing over the boiler when it exploded. He was much injured in the head, and it was very doubtful whether he would recover.—Mr. John C. Moale, the agent of the steam-boat line, was on board with his two sons. Mr. Moale had his right foot dislocated, and was injured in the side and back. Soon after he was taken home he expired. Mr. Moale's eldest son William, a fine lad about 14 years of age, was killed almost instantly; a second son who was also on board, was dangerously injured.—About forty persons were wounded, no more than half of whom survived.—Baltimore American.

The Sheik of the Druses arrived at Mivart's Hotel on Sunday night from Malta, with a numerous suite, apartments having been taken for his reception by the British Government. A great number of noblemen have called on the Sheik since his arrival.

We have much pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to Mr. Lover's Handy Andy; it is published in shilling monthly parts, and illustrated, by the author, with highly characteristic etchings. Five parts have already appeared, and they are all so redolent of fun and wit, ergo provocative of laughter, that all who enjoy the mirth-moving influence of Momus, should immediately hasten to their perusal. Press of matter prevents us giving an extract, but we shall do so in our next number.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—MONDAY, MAY 9.

Lord LORTON presented a petition from a place in the county of Longford, in favour of scriptural education in Ireland.

CASE OF MR. BIDDULPH.

Earl DE GREY, adverting to a question put to him a few evenings ago by his noble friend the noble Marquis (Normanby) opposite as to Mr. Biddulph, wished now to inform him that Mr. Biddulph's name had been struck out of the commission of the peace, and he was no longer a magistrate.—The Marquis of Normanby thanked the noble earl for the information, and observed that it was the duty of a firm Government in such a case as that of Mr. Biddulph, to make a decisive, a prompt, and a striking example of one who had so flagrantly violated the laws which he was sworn to administer justly. The noble marquis was understood to conclude by [illegible] for the communications with the Irish Government on the subject of Mr. Biddulph's removal from the magistracy.—Earl [illegible] said he had no objection to the production of the documents referred to. The motion was then agreed to.

THE MAGISTRATES OF SUNDERLAND AND THE MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY.

The Marquis of NORMANBY, in referring to this subject, said he would not, the noble marquis, did he adhere to, or retract, the statement, which he made with respect to the Sunderland magistrates on the evening of the 29th of April? The charge made against those magistrates was a very serious one, and it was desirable that the noble marquis should confine himself as much as possible to the precise points. Did he, or did he not, deny the statement imputed to him; and if he did not deny it, was he prepared to retract it?—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY entered at some length into the subject, without giving a specific answer to those questions, and concluded by saying, "My impression from what was within my own knowledge, and from information I received, was, that they, like magistrates in many other counties, used their power of granting licences for purposes of political partisanship."—After a few words from the Duke of WELLINGTON, expressive of his approbation of the course adopted by the Marquis of LONDONDERRY, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 9.

On the motion of Sir M. WOOD, the London-bridge Approaches and Royal Exchange Avenues Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—On the motion of Mr. HARDY, the Metropolitan Water Companies Company's Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—On the motion of Dr. BOWRING, the Bank of England Bill was read a second time and ordered to be committed.—Mr. RICARDO presented petitions from Roman Catholics of the Potteries in Staffordshire, praying that some measure should be adopted for affording proper religious instruction to Roman Catholics serving in the army, navy, and marines, as well as to Roman Catholic prisoners and inmates of workhouses.

TOWN OF SOUTHAMPTON.

Mr. WARD presented to the House a petition from 173 persons connected with the borough of Southampton, setting forth "That the undersigned electors of the borough of Southampton had seen and regret the report just made by the select committee appointed to try the matter of a petition against the recent election and return of members to serve in this present parliament for the said borough, by which it appears that an extensive system of bribery attended that election; that this being the second time within nine years members were unseated in your hon. House for similar practices, your petitioners feel, that under the present election law the same abuses must continue to prevail, and thus [illegible] expression of the sentiments of the electors; your petitioners, therefore, pray that your hon. House will suspend the [illegible] addition of members for the said borough (hear, hear), that your hon. House will take such steps against the recurrence of such immoral and uncon-titutional practices as your hon. House may, in its wisdom, think advisable." (Hear, hear.) The petition was then moved, "That the minutes of evidence given before the Southampton Election Committee be printed."

ELECTION PROCEEDINGS.

The order of the day having been read for the adjourned debate on Mr. Hume buck's motion for the appointment of a select committee, "to inquire whether certain practices connected with the trials of petitions presented to the House against the return of certain of its members be not a gross breach of its privileges"—Mr. ROBUCK presented a petition from the borough of Reading, signed by eighty electors, [illegible] reference to the circumstances which led to the debate of [illegible] night last, that they believed the charges contained in the petition against the return of Viscount Chelsea and Charles [illegible] to be true, and that the proceedings subsequently taken to prevent the disclosure of corrupt practices; [illegible] the House to appoint a select committee to inquire into the proceedings of which they complained. Ordered to lie on the table.—Mr. G. WYNN said, he thought the motion of the hon. and learned member was of too general a nature. There were [illegible] parties were alleged to be liable to certain [illegible], but those charges ought to have been specified. The hon. and learned member for Bath ought to bring forward special cases, in which the malpractices to which he alluded had taken place, and then the House would be justified in considering them.—Mr. WARD said, that the object of his hon. and learned friend was not to have either a fishing or a roving commission, as some hon. members [illegible] that latter object was not to generalize. Certain well-[illegible] observations were made, and those were confined within [illegible] Those allegations were supported by facts, based, on common fame; but in this case, common [illegible] fell short of the truth. The hon. and learned member for Bath had not exaggerated the facts connected with the committee to which he had alluded.—Sir R. INGLIS could not see to what practical result the committee would lead. Its object might be [illegible] but the hon. member refusing to answer a question [illegible] by so doing he would be criminating himself—[illegible] the carefulness to guard itself.—Viscount [illegible] the partial investigation proposed by the hon. and learned member [illegible] into six cases, would from the character of the whole herd of cases (cheers), would be to hold up to unjust and unmerited obloquy a few hon. members and gentlemen who had done nothing illegal, or committed any breach of the privileges of the House. He could not vote for the motion. Sir ROBERT PEEL did not consider the question as of a party nature. In his opinion, the hon. member for Bath ought distinctly to place the charge he preferred. If, having placed it [illegible] involved a breach of the privileges of the house, [illegible] for the honour and character of the House [illegible] strict inquiry into the charges so publicly made. [illegible] the course he took when a charge was made [illegible] gentleman, the present member for the county of [illegible] (Mr. O'Connell.) The inquiry then entered into was made [illegible] power of the House, and if the hon. member for [illegible] entered on the journals of the House, he [illegible] in his individual capacity—because in his opinion [illegible] matter, rather than one of party—he would be [illegible] same course. He was for an inquiry by [illegible] with the ordinary constitutional powers of the [illegible]—Lord JOHN RUSSELL would vote against the [illegible] had the fruits of the present discussion would be [illegible] measures which might tend to repress and prevent [illegible] of bribery and corruption.—Mr. HUME thought the [illegible] learned member for Bath had done much honour to [illegible] service to the country by bringing forward this [illegible] Mr. Hume) regretted to hear so many objections [illegible] motion. He would give it his cordial support. [illegible] objected to the motion on the ground of its vagueness [illegible] further remarks from both sides of the House, Mr. [illegible]ROCK withdrew his original motion, and substituted the following amendment:—That the House having been informed by an hon. member that he has heard and believes that in the cases of the election petitions presented to the House from Harwich, Nottingham, Reading, Lewes, and Fulmouth, certain corrupt compromises had been entered into for the purpose of avoiding investigation of the bribery alleged to have been practised at the elections for the said towns, a select committee be appointed to inquire whether such compromises had been entered into, and whether such bribery had taken place in the aforesaid towns; which, after a short discussion, was put and agreed to.

THE INCOME-TAX.

On the order of the day for the further consideration of the report on the Income-Tax being read, Mr. B. WOOD proposed a clause to the effect that only real income should be chargeable to the tax, and to enable persons in trade to deduct under schedule D, his losses in such trade, from the aggregate of his income under the other schedules. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER objected to the clause, and upon a division, there appeared

For the clause	.. .. ..	61
Against it	.. ..	110
Majority against the clause	..	46

Mr. Gill then moved a series of amendments and new clauses, having for their objects to capitalize all incomes not derived from landed or funded property, and to charge five per cent. on such capital as the groundwork of the Property-tax.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER opposed the amendment, as being contrary to the spirit of the bill.—After a few words from Mr. HUME and Lord ERSKINE the committee divided, when there appeared

For the amendment	.. ..	36
Against it	.. .. ..	183
Majority	.. ..	147

So it passed in the negative, and the Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Friday.—On the motion of Lord STANLEY, the House resolved itself into a committee on the Australian and New Zealand Bill, and the Bill went through committee.—The remaining orders of the day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned at half-past 12.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Copyright Bill was read a second time.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

Lord BROUGHAM rose to bring the subject of bribery at elections before their lordships. A bill had been introduced into that House on the subject some time ago, and these was then on their lordship's table a bill ready to be read a second time, but they both differed from each other as widely as they possibly could. The bill of last year provided that the witness was to sell all he knew to the husband against the wife, and even the counsel to give up his client. No such provision was in the present bill, passing into a law which was contrary to the first principles of English justice, that of calling on the counsel to divulge the secret of his client, and that agent not a party to the bribery at all, but to whom the acts of bribery had been conveyed, in order to the defence before the committee. The absurd part of the bill was, that the witness would be indemnified provided he concealed nothing, but told the whole truth. This was the most absurd part of the bill. Anything more impossible for their lordships to give their assent to never entered their lordships' house. He then urged them to pass the bill which he had proposed, and concluded by moving the second reading of the Indemnity to Witnesses Bill.—The Earl of WICKLOW said the noble and learned lord ought to have given notice of his motion.—The Lord CHANCELLOR said the difficulty would be obviated if the noble lord would consent to postpone his motion till to-morrow, and take the discussion in the committee.—Lord BROUGHAM assented to this course.

ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Lord CLIFFORD (of Chudleigh) presented petitions from Somerset and other places, complaining of Roman Catholic grievances in the army and navy. The noble lord said that he should withdraw his motion of which he had given notice, for a committee to inquire into the treatment of certain Roman Catholics in the presidency of Madras. Their lordships then adjourned

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

INCOME-TAX.

Mr. H. F. BERKELEY presented a petition from the solicitors of Bristol, praying that they might be exempt from the operation of the Income-Tax.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.

Mr. PHILIP HOWARD moved that Mr. Speaker should issue a writ for the election of a member to serve for the borough of Nottingham in that House. Under the circumstances, he should not object to the motion before the house.—Mr. GODSON thought that no writ should be issued.—Mr. WARD said he doubted whether the writ for Nottingham would ever issue—he should give his direct negative to the motion.—Sir ROBERT PEEL was of opinion, that it would be the most unwise course they could adopt to suspend the issuing of the writ for the present (cheers), and therefore he should vote for the suspension. (Cheers.)—Sir R. INGLIS would support the motion.—Lord J. RUSSELL could not agree to the issue of the writ in the present uncertain state of affairs; and at length, after a short discussion between Sir R. Peel, Mr. French, Mr. Roebuck, and Mr. Wynn, Mr. HOWARD withdrew his motion.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice that he would on Friday move for leave to bring in a bill for preventing bribery and corruption at elections.

SUDBURY ELECTION.

Mr. REDDINGTON rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to exclude the borough of Sudbury from sending burgesses to Parliament, and thought he should be able to show that the case to which he was now calling the attention of the House was one which ought to be marked with the greatest severity. The hon. member then proceeded to narrate the circumstances which had occured at the last election for Sudbury. The nomination took place on a Monday, and the election on the Tuesday following. Up to six o'clock on the preceding Sunday night, neither of the candidates who were returned had made their appearance in the borough. One arrived on the Sunday evening, and the other on the Monday morning, and within thirty-six hours after their arrival they were both returned as the members for Sudbury. In some cases of bribery certain corrupt individuals were employed, and they endeavoured to tempt others into corruption; in Sudbury there was no necessity to have recourse to such measures. The votes were bought openly in the market. There were the hustings and two public-houses, and the stream of corruption could be traced uninterruptedly from the one to the other during the whole election. The hon. member then moved for leave to bring in a bill to exclude the borough of Sudbury from sending burgesses to serve in Parliament.—Mr. G. H. VERNON seconded the motion.—Colonel ROSS [illegible] said, that as the representative of that division of the county in which this unfortunate borough was situated, he trusted the House would consider the subject calmly, and not permit the innocent to be punished for the sins of the guilty. (Hear, hear.)—Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

THE TARIFF.

Sir R. PEEL rose to move the order of the day for the committee on the Customs' Acts. He regretted the delay in the consideration of the tariff; but it had at least enabled parties affected to make such representations as they deemed necessary to the protection of their interests. Those representations, when reasonable, had received the attention of Government, however small the political influence of the parties urging them; where representations had been made without reason, no political influence had prevailed with the Government to give way to them. The great objects of himself and his colleagues had been to abolish prohibition, by reducing prohibitory duties; and to reduce the duties on raw materials, and on materials partly manufactured. By these means he hoped to diminish the general expense of living in this country; not, indeed, that any individual article would be so cheapened as to afford any great relief, but that, on the aggregate of consumption, the relief would be considerable; and therefore it was that the Government had made its reductions on a great variety of articles, so as to give to almost every one of those classes which might inevitably suffer from some one or more of the reductions, a compensation upon others. For instance, the reduction of the duty on various kinds of seed might, by letting in a supply from abroad, impair the profits of particular dealers; but the benefit thereby conferred upon agriculture in general would be an important one. Again, in respect to furniture woods, the high duties had greatly discouraged the industry of cabinet-makers here, and induced importations of foreign furniture. He trusted that the reduction of duty would establish an export trade in that manufacture, and lead to the extensive use of mahogany in some branches of shipbuilding to which it was peculiarly applicable. Next, as to foreign ores; for example, copper. At present that metal was smelted abroad, and copper could there be sold, and applied to the sheathing of vessels and to other purposes, at rates much below those at which the same objects could be executed in England, notwithstanding our coal and our manufacturing advantages. Spermaceti and other whale oils were important articles in our manufactures, and it was now proposed to reduce the duties upon them, because whale oil had been 100 per cent. dearer in this country than in the United States, which had manufactures extensively consuming this article and successfully competing with ours. He reminded the House of Mr. Deacon Hume's dictum, that this country having plenty of untaxed iron and untaxed coal, wanted only plenty of untaxed wood to give employment to her industry; and this was the principle on which Government now proposed the reduction in the duties on timber. He now came to articles of foreign manufacture, on which it was contemplated so to reduce duties, that they should in no case exceed the maximum of 20 per cent. It was said that such a reduction, unless accompanied with a repeal of the corn-laws, was a great injustice to the British operative. But, in fact, there had been, as the amount of duties in this very week evinced, a very great reduction in the duties on grain. Salt provisions, too, which had been hitherto under a total prohibition, would, under the new system, be admitted at a duty of about a penny a pound. So, as to live animals, about which he trusted he should be able to make a fully satisfactory explanation. So likewise as to fish, particularly to the fish on which the poor were most interested—namely, herrings. The Irish peasant now paid 30s. per barrel; henceforth he would get that barrel from Norway for 10s.; or would procure herrings off his own coast, by means of that improved craft which the reduced duty on timber would enable him to obtain there. The duties were also to be reduced on the importation of potatoes, rice, and hops; on the last of which articles the reduction of duty would be from £8 11s. to £4 10s. He trusted, therefore, that a full disposition had been proved on the part of Government to lower the prices of those articles of food which were principally consumed by the poor. He exposed the error commonly prevalent about the comparative cheapness of living in the great manufacturing towns of the Continent, where, although food was indeed produced cheaply, the workman had always to buy it dear, by reason of the octroi duties payable at the gates of every city. He then argued as to the straw-plait and other manufactures, that under the present extent of smuggling, as induced by high duties, there was in actual practice no protection at all. Now he came to the great question touching the importation of live cattle. He had been strongly pressed to defer to the apprehensions entertained on this subject, but he believed it to be a groundless panic. Advertisements had been published for supplying English towns through a firm at Hamburgh, with meat at 3d. a pound, and people had been frightened by those offers into selling their cattle at a sacrifice. If they had waited to inquire, they would have found that no such firm existed at Hamburgh, and that the meat in that city itself was at 6d. a pound. He would not say that there would be no reduction in the price of meat—there would be some; and some there ought to be, for the price of meat in England was now too high. The influx of cattle from Scotland and Ireland by steam, within the last fifteen years, had been immense; yet the price of meat had still gone on increasing. All this, it must be remembered, went to swell the NAVY Estimates. The meat consumed by Greenwich Hospital alone cost 4000*l.* more in 1841 than in 1835. The chief objection made against the intended admission of cattle was, that the duty was proposed to be uniform per head, on fat and lean. Now, the admission of the lean cattle was of course an advantage to the grazier, whose business was to buy them for fatting; and so far there was a clear benefit to one important class of agriculturists, which benefit would be diminished if lean cattle of a large size were made to bear a heavier duty than lean cattle of a small size. But now as to the fat cattle. The great protection on fat cattle was not amount of duty, but the unwholesomeness of the voyage; no fat ox could ever cross the Bay of Biscay. France, however, was near, and the agriculturists fear an influx from her shores. But France, for many years, instead of exporting cattle, had on the balance, been importing them, and the price of meat had been as high there as in this country. He showed that the danger was equally chimerical of importation from Belgium, Holland, Germany, and the Prussian League. England had another security in the quality of her meat. So great was its superiority, that he did not conceive any would adopt to supersede it. He was asked, why not impose the duty by weight instead of per head? He would answer fairly, that he wished to have meat somewhat cheaper in London; but still, the increase of our population, and the scarcity of continental stock, gave a consumer security against any very great diminution of price. We were exporting horses even now, and he saw no reason why we should not hereafter export other cattle likewise. On the whole, the fullest communication and consideration had strongly confirmed the Government in their intentions as to the duty upon cattle. He would not revive the discussion on the corn question; that he considered as decided by Parliament: but, at the proper time, he was prepared to state the reasons why the Government did not consider the general principles of free trade (which they fully admitted) as applicable to the present state of the sugar and timber questions. They had endeavoured to act in the spirit of Mr. Huskisson, and to do as much general good, with as little individual hardship, as possible. —Mr. LABOUCHERE observed that the principles of the hon. baronet's speech were those on which the late Government had intended to act; he only regretted that any party struggle should have prevented the country from obtaining the benefit of them sooner. Any honest and effectual reform of the tariff should have been based upon a large alteration in the corn-law, and should have embraced also the important article of sugar. The measure of the late Government, comprising both these articles, was therefore greatly preferable to the present. Mr. HUME said the right hon. baronet appeared to be a convert to free trade. (Hear.) He was delighted to find that free trade principles were now to be the order of the day with a Tory Government, having a large majority. He hailed with delight the change which was about to take place, whether it came from a Tory or Whig Government.—Mr. GLADSTONE said the present was not the time to enter into the details of the subject. The details would be best considered when the House was in committee, but he felt called upon to enter his protest against the term used by the hon. member who had just sat down, of a "converted Government." No change had taken place in the opinions of those composing her Majesty's present Administration.—After a few words from Colonel SIBTHORP, the order for going into committee on the Customs Duties was read.—On the question that the Speaker leave the chair, Major VIVIAN moved "for copies of any additional details which might have been supplied by Mr. Meek to the Government relative to the importation of agricultural produce, salt provisions, &c., or any passage or paragraph which might be suppressed." Lord WORSLEY seconded the motion.—An animated discussion then ensued, which terminated in a division, in which the amendment was negatived by 219 against 132 votes. The House then went into committee. The chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Friday next.—Adjourned at half-past 6 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.

NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LINE ELECTION.

Sir J. Y. BULLER brought up a report from the select committee appointed to try the merits of the election petition complaining of the undue return of John Quincy Harris for the borough of Newcastle-under-Line; that the committee had determined that the said John Quincy Harris was not duly elected a burgess to serve in the present Parliament for the said borough of Newcastle-under-Line; but that, as far as the said J. Q. Harris was concerned, the election was void. He (Sir J. Y. Buller) had further to inform the House, that the committee had come to a resolution that the said

J. Q. Harris had, by his agent, been guilty of bribery at the last election for the said borough.

Lord STANLEY presented a petition from the parish of Preston in Lancashire, praying that the instructions of the Poor-Law Commissioners to the boards of guardians may be set aside.

POOR-LAW COMMISSION CONTINUANCE-BILL.

Sir J. GRAHAM moved for leave to bring in a bill "To continue the poor-law commission for a time to be limited, and for the further amendment of the laws relating to the poor in England." The honourable Baronet shortly adverted to the statutes preceding the present law, and to the practice which arose under them of making up wages out of rates. Earl Grey's Government met that evil by the now subsisting act, which was founded on the report of a committee, and was permanent in all its provisions, except the authority for regulating the administration of the system. The commission had since been prolonged by act of Parliament until the 31st of July next; and the Government now intended to propose that it should be further continued for five years from that day, and until the end of the session succeeding. In support of the principle of the commission, he cited a speech of Lord Brougham, purporting that the variety of the cases to be administered required a discretionary power somewhere. He himself believed that the same necessity existed now which existed when the commission was constituted. The Duke of Wellington also had expressed his concurrence in Lord Brougham's opinion, when the measure was first adopted; and Sir James Graham himself saw nothing in the experience of the bill, which should induce him to change his own persuasion of its necessity. If the whole power were restored to the magistrates, they must cease to be members of the board of guardians; and if the board of guardians were to be broken up, the unions must be dissolved; so that the discontinuance of the commission would be the abrogation of the law. He believed that the board as now composed was such as to possess and to deserve general confidence. The number of its members had varied; at present there were ten; but he proposed to ask, henceforth, for only nine, the experience now acquired having increased the facility of transacting the business. Regulation by general orders had not at first been practicable, but he and the commissioners had thought that the time was come when general orders might usefully be issued, and such orders had accordingly been prepared, and would be laid on the table, affecting the principal questions upon which difference of opinion had arisen. It was intended to abolish by this bill the Gilbert unions. It was also proposed by the new bill to prevent the enlargement of unions already containing 30,000 persons, but to allow combinations of parishes for the purpose of district schools within such short distances as would leave the children easily visitable by their parents or friends, and with such regulations as should allow the access of ministers of all religious denominations. Local committees would be appointed in large unions for those parts of them which should be inconveniently remote from the place of the guardians' meeting. Poor persons, having been long resident in any parish far distant from their places of settlement, would in case of sickness be relieved without incurring the liability to be removed as persons chargeable. With respect to bastardy, a remedy against the putative father not maintaining his child, would be given in the shape of imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months. These were the main outlines of the bill, and he assured the House he would not have undertaken the responsibility of it, had he not been persuaded that it would conduce, not only to the comfort of the sick, aged, and infirm, but to the advancement of honest industry and the increase of its just remuneration.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE regretted to hear that the commission was to be continued six years longer.—He protested against the abolition of the Gilbert unions.—Mr. WAKLEY accused the Government of acting uncandidly in these temporary renewals of a commission, which it was plain that they meant in reality to make perpetual. He advised the people to pour in their petitions against the bill.—Captain PECHELL would do his utmost against the measure. He particularly objected to the dissolution of the Gilbert unions.—Mr F. MAULE praised the tone of Sir James Graham, and he eulogised several of the proposed regulations.—Mr. STUART WORTLEY rejoiced to find from Sir James Graham's speech that the impracticable notion of uniformity was at length fairly abandoned.—Mr. BOATHWICK expressed his disappointment at the proposed measure.—Mr. SHARMAN CRAWFORD declared his hostility to the principle of the whole law.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM, in answer to a question from General Johnson, intimated his intention to move the second reading on Monday se'nnight or Friday fortnight.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM and Mr. GRIMSDITCH exchanged a few words; and leave was then given to introduce the bill, which was brought in and read a first time. The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships assembled at five o'clock.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

The Duke of WELLINGTON gave notice that on Friday he should move the adjournment of the House to the 30th instant.

HOPS.

The Earl of WINCHILSEA presented a petition from Maidstone, praying for an alteration in the bastardy clauses in the Poor-laws. Also a petition from Kent, against the reduction in the duty on foreign hops.—Earl FITZWILLIAM wished to draw the attention of the noble earl to another point. The other night a conversation arose respecting the employment of persons in mines. His noble friend then expressed great anxiety concerning the morals of that part of the population, which he said were so deeply injured by the employment of females and children in those mines. Now, as his noble friend was so exceedingly desirous of protecting the morals of the inhabitants in the manufacturing districts, he would recommend the noble earl to look a little more to the morals of the persons in the districts with which he was more intimately connected. He (the Earl Fitzwilliam) would turn his attention to what occurred in the ground during the time of hop-picking. (Loud laughter.) If he would look to those females, then, it would be more useful than his turning his attention to those who delved in the bowels of the earth.

THE INCOME TAX.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE moved for certain returns relating to the exemption of foreigners from the operation of the Income and Property Tax. The reason why he called their lordships' attention to this subject was, that unquestionably this was the first time the income enjoyed by foreigners in other parts of the world, arising from property in this country, had been made the subject of taxation, and he considered such a measure as highly inexpedient and unjust.—The Earl of RIPON did not apprehend that there could be any objection to the motion of the noble marquis, or any difficulty in complying with it.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS' BILL.

Upon the motion of Lord BROUGHAM, the Bribery at Elections' Bill passed through a committee of the House, and was reported without amendments.—The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.—No house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The House re-assembled at four o'clock, and was chiefly occupied during the evening in the discussion of matters connected with the late elections.

POOR LAWS.

Colonel SIBTHORP gave notice that on the third reading of the Poor-law Bill he would move an amendment to the effect, that from and after the passing of the bill, the board of commissioners and the assistant commissioners be discontinued, and that the guardians of the poor have the sole management of the poor in their respective parishes.

FINES AND RECOVERIES.

The Fines and Recoveries Bill was read a third time.

The dropped Orders of yesterday were then re-appointed.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Sir R. PEEL moved that the House, on its rising, do adjourn till Friday, the 20th of May. (Loud cries of "Monday, Monday," and "Divide.") The SPEAKER, having put the question, declared that the Ayes had it.—The House, therefore, stands adjourned till Friday.

HER MAJESTY'S BAL MASQUE.

Masques have been in all ages the recreations of Courts. The name brings with it reminiscences of romance, history, and poetry; nor is it necessary, we think, to bear such a title, that the personages should have their faces masked, or utter set speeches for the occasion; for Shakspere, describing the peculiar and gorgeous costumes assumed by the two kings and their courts at the meeting at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, says—

We think a masque means merely a travestie, and in that sense the term is used by us upon this brilliant occasion. As regards the question of propriety, at the present moment, for such a gorgeous display, it may be shortly observed, that we do not read of any prince in history, who was both great and good, that loved not pageantry and sought not the applause of subjects in the recreation of royal shows. Her Majesty, following the noble natural bent of her ever-gracious feelings, has felt that such rejoicings most of all become a young and constitutional Sovereign; and while we applaud the exquisite taste manifested in the choice of the pageant's epoch, we, however, admire still more the charity and beneficence to suffering traders and artisans which her Majesty's fete combines with courtly enjoyment.

If precedent were necessary, we could but adduce one instance, amid a thousand more modern, as well as more ancient, that in Ben Jonson's Masque of Queens, no less a personage than his royal mistress personally honoured it by representation, assisted by her court, the Countess of Arundel, Countess of Derby, Countess of Huntingdon, Countess of Bedford, Countess of Essex, Countess of Montgomery, Lady Eliza Guildford, Lady Anne Winter, Lady Windsor, Lady Ann Clifford, Viscount Cranbourne. In this masque each lady enacted a Queen.

We could go even further, and show that Queen Elizabeth, the greatest sovereign that ever held sway of empires, was devotedly fond of tournaisements and of dress. It is the Scotch ambassador of the time, we believe, who reports that the great Elizabeth had a new dress for every day of the year.

This magnificent scene of historic revelry, for which such extraordinary preparations have been made by the most illustrious and beautiful of the land, was enacted at Buckingham Palace on Thursday night, with all the effect that refined taste and unbounded resources could give to human enjoyment. The purpose of this splendid gathering of the brave and beautiful, it is known, was to give a stimulus to trade in all the various departments that could be affected by the enormous outlay it would necessarily involve; and we have no doubt that many thousands are this day grateful for the temporary aid which this right royal entertainment has been the means of affording them.

The Lord Chamberlain and the official persons of his department, had been long engaged in preparation for the disposal of the great concourse of guests invited to her Majesty's masque. This was a subject requiring the most sedulous attention. Places were to be found for an assemblage exceeding in number any other reunion that ever took place after mid-day within the precincts of the palace; and without discipline, all the effect of the pageant, and of the characteristic costumes on which, with so much trouble and tasteful research, such enormous sums have been lavished, would have been utterly lost. Military order was therefore established, and gentlemen ushers, with their wands, as in ancient times, marshalled the gay crowd, and directed the entrance of the company, whilst a herald preceded each quadrille. The great groups and quadrilles assembled in rooms set apart for them, and they entered the palace by a door assigned for their exclusive use. When each group was complete and marshalled in due array, they advanced to the Presence-chamber, and after paying their obeisances to her Majesty and her Royal Consort, filed off, as we see troops do, by battalions and companies, each group or quadrille being headed by their leaders. As the noble corps filed off, each bright phalanx formed separately at the end of the Reception-room, and when the whole procession had perambulated the Presence-chamber, then the quadrilles began. First, as to rank of its leader, that of the Duchess of Cambridge kept time to the gay measure of the music. Many of the quadrilles having characteristic music as well as costumes, they danced one by one in succession. The quadrilles having been once danced under her Majesty's eye, her Majesty dropped her minover mantel, and joined in the quadrille with her own group. After which occurred the grand medley, in which all ages, all countries, were mixed. Such a scene may never again occur till doomsday. It was calculated to infuse a spirit and joyousness into the recreations of the night, such as no pageant, however gorgeous, no costumes, however brilliant, could produce alone.

Amidst the surges of the mixed flood of nations and ages, which this festivity rolled back upon us, some costumes still shone as stars of the first magnitude amidst their lesser colleagues in the firmament.

There were noblemen and noble ladies who wore diamonds and precious ornaments to the amount of many thousands, a dangerous experiment in a crowd: the late Prince Nicholas Esterhazy, when Ambassador Extraordinary, dropped two thousand pounds' worth of diamonds at the coronation.

The costume of one of the characters, that of the Earl of Chesterfield, cost £800. Lord Pembroke borrowed for the night ten thousand pounds' worth of diamonds from Storr and Mortimer, at one per cent.

The commonest dresses for this one night have cost from £40 to £50, and we have seen a plain, although highly becoming costume, which cost £200. Thus, many a gay mummer, like his ancestors of old, will—

"Wear a farm in shoe-strings edged with gold,
And spangled garters worth a moyle and;
A hose and doublet which a lordship cost,
A gaudy cloak three mansions' price almost;
A beaver hat and feather for the head,
Priced at the church's tithe."

The dress of her Majesty, as Queen Philippa, was finally completed on Tuesday, and no less than 250 carriages of the elite of the aristocracy and beau monde, anxious to view the Sovereign's costume, were assembled in Belgrave-square. Even deprived of its jewels, which on Thursday evening threw on its tissue an effulgence of light, the regal robes were picturesque beyond the most sanguine expectation. The open hanging sleeves of bright scarlet velvet lined with minever, the surcoat, with its grey silver ground, looking like a corselet enriched with the loveliest flowers of gold, were part of the costume. The dress is transcendant in the brilliancy of that contrast which it is the great and difficult object of a costume-maker to produce. Surrounded by an immense bevy of the most lovely, accomplished, and virtuous ladies of the land, her Majesty's position on Thursday reminded many a noble literateur of the beautiful description of Ben Jonson in his masque of the "Queen of the Ocean, Low that she also is Present all virtues, for which, one by one,

They were so famed, and wanting then a head
To form that sweet and gracious pyramid
Wherein they sit, it being the sovereign place
Of all that palace, and reserved to grace
The worthiest Queen."

Her Majesty's display of jewels was of immense value. From the upper part of the robe was suspended a description of pendant stomacher of the intrinsic worth of £60,000.

The leading feature of the ball was the assembling and the meeting of the two Courts of Anne of Bretagne (the Duchess of Cambridge) and Edward and Philippa (her Majesty and Prince Albert). A separate entrance at the palace was set apart for the Court of Brittany, the Duchess of Cambridge assembling her Court in one of the lower rooms of the Palace, while the Queen and Prince Albert, surrounded by a numerous and brilliant circle, prepared to receive her Royal Highness in the Throne-room, which was altered so far as to be made as much as possible to harmonize with the period. The throne was removed, and another erected, copied from an authentic source, of the time of Edward III. It was lined (as well as the whole alcove on which the throne was placed) with purple velvet, having worked on it in gold the crown of England, the Cross of St. George, and emblazoned shields with the arms of England and France. The state chairs were what might be called of Gothic design, and the throne was surmounted with Gothic tracery. At the back of the throne were emblazoned the Royal Arms of England in silver. Seated on this throne her Majesty and Prince Albert awaited the arrival of the Court of Anne of Brittany.

The body of the Throne-room was tastefully illuminated by wax candles in handsome glass drop chandeliers and lustres, and the upper part of it, where the Queen was seated surrounded by her attendants, &c., was lighted by a body of 330 jets of gas. This light was so disposed as to throw its rays immediately upon the throne, whilst a rich star of cut glass drops encircled the light, producing a most brilliant and imposing effect. The gas was naphthalised, which imparted to it additional illuminating power.

Several officers of the College of Arms were present, as heralds of the reign of Edward III, wearing over their scarlet tunics their tabards, emblazoned with the arms of the king.

About half-past ten the heralds marshalled the procession from the lower suite of rooms, and the Duchess of Cambridge appeared in a magnificent costume, led by the Duke of Beaufort, as Louis XII., equally magnificent, and followed by the rest of her Court. These were divided by heralds and marshals into quadrilles, and marched in the following order:—After the Royal party, consisting of Prince George, the Princess Augusta, &c., came the Highland Quadrille, the Greek Quadrille, the Hungarians, the Knights Templars, and the Saracens. These, on reaching the Throne-room, passed before the Sovereign, making their obeisances, and then formed themselves for dancing, which immediately commenced.

THE QUADRILLES.

French,	led by	H. R. H. the Duchess of Cambridge.
Spanish,	,,	Her Grace the Duchess of Buccleuch.
German,	,,	Her Grace the Duchess of Sutherland.
Crusaders,	,,	The Marchioness of Londonderry.
Waverley,	,,	The Countess De La Warr.
Scotch,	,,	Her Grace the Duchess of Buccleuch.
Cossack.	,,	The Baroness Brunow.
Greek	,,	Her Grace the Duchess of Leinster.

Her Majesty left the ball-room about a quarter to three o'clock, but dancing was continued for about an hour afterwards.

Never did England maintain its supremacy in female beauty more decidedly than on Thursday night, when a galaxy of lovely women, attired in the most gorgeous and becoming costumes, met to do honour to the fair and youthful Sovereign. Anxious to evince their respect towards her Majesty, no expense was spared in the dresses of her honoured guests; and when one considers the vast treasures of jewels descending, as heir-looms in each family line, from our proud and ancient aristocratic houses, it might forth on this occasion, we cannot wonder that this fete was acknowledged by all present to surpass those of every other country.

The annual distribution of prizes to the students of Guy's Hospital took place on Monday, after which the bust of the late Sir Astley Cooper, raised by his pupils to his memory at a cost of 400 guineas, was opened to inspection. The bust has been executed by Mr. Towne, and stands upon a pedestal of white marble, with the inscription—"Astley Paston Cooper. Alumni Grato Animo. Hoc Monumentum Posuere. 1841."

WICKLOW.—A local paper informs us that a few days since a piece of gold, weighing five ounces and a half, was picked up by a labourer employed in the Wicklow gold mines. It is said to be the heaviest piece that has been found for more than thirty years, and probably the largest specimen of unwrought gold at present in Ireland.

At a Court of Common Council, held on Wednesday, the report of the Royal Exchange Committee stated that the Bank of England had consented to advance 40,000*l.* for the New Royal Exchange. A further sum of 25,000*l.* for the great City improvements about Farringdon-street, in addition to the above sum, was also recommended by the court to be applied for from Government.

We come now to speak of the characteristic illustrations of this brilliant event, as they adorn the pages of our ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. And first, as in all honour and duty bound, we must direct attention to her who, not more in her exalted station as "sovereign of all she surveyed," than by her grace and condescension, was emphatically the sun from which the glorious constellations of the evening drew light, and life, and brightness. The costume worn by her Majesty was that of the noble-hearted and tender Phillippa, Queen of Edward III. Our limits preclude a full-length representation of her Majesty's attire; but the accompanying engraving will enable our readers to form an idea of its splendour, with the assistance of the following description.

DRESSES OF HER MAJESTY AND HER LADIES IN ATTENDANCE.

Over a skirt, with a demi-train of ponceau velvet, edged with fur, her Majesty wore a surcoat of brocade, blue and gold. The centre and the edges likewise lined with minever. This fur—distinctive of the highest social station in the middle ages, when the costume of high and low, of age and youth, were not confounded—her Majesty alone wore at her ball. From the upper edge of the centre of the minever stomacher there was a band descending of jewels laid on gold tissue, and the other parts of the dress, the armlets, &c., were likewise studded with precious gems. Over this was affixed an ample mantle of splendid brocade, gold and silver, with flowers of silver mattes and brilliants, over a gold ground—a marvellous tissue made, as well as the blue and gold brocade, by the ingenuity of our own Spitalfields' weavers. This mantle was lined with minever. Her Majesty's hair, folded inward a la clovis, was surmounted by a light crown of graven gold.

THE BEDCHAMBER WOMEN.—The Hon. Mrs. Anson and Mrs. Brand wore dresses of charming effect of the period chosen by her Majesty, bearing the quarterings of the ancient arms of England, with lions and fleur-de-lis.

LADIES IN WAITING.—Lady Jocelyn and Lady Portman wore dresses of the same form as her Majesty's, with a surcoat, but without minever and other distinctive accompaniments.

THE MAIDS OF HONOUR. Miss Liddell, Miss Paget, Miss Devereux, Miss Stanley, appeared in dresses and surcoats, trimmed with gold and silver.

Lady Rosslyn exhibited a dress copied from the picture of the famous Countess of Salisbury, whose garter Edward III. turned into a trophy—origin of the highest order of chivalry now in existence, and which Kings, Princes, and Nobles of the highest degree bear as a remembrance of the most romantic of all past ages.

To describe the effect of these dresses as gorgeous would be but to half express the admiration they elicited. The design and execution of her Majesty's costume were intrusted to the genius and skill of Vouillon and Laure. The former, who, we hear, is an amateur of the pictorial art, had amassed experience under Sir Thomas Lawrence in the famous bal costume of the Marchioness of Londonderry, and with the assistance of his expert and tasteful sister, Madame Laure, we are told that he succeeded marvellously in embodying the noble devices of her Majesty upon this occasion.

The small engravings in the centre of this and the next page exhibit detached groups of her Majesty's illustrious visitors in the various costumes honoured by their adoption, as, blended together after the quadrilles, they wandered through the scene of enchantment unveiled to them by the favour and hospitality of their young and lovely Sovereign.

The engraving at the bottom of this page will enable our readers to form an accurate idea of the novelty and splendour exhibited in the ball-room of the Palace, at the precise moment of the commencement of the royal quadrille. Amidst this magnificent group the ingenuity of our curious friends will find no difficulty in appropriating particular costume to individual character; and fastidious indeed must be the taste that, in such a cluster of brilliants, would care to discover a flaw.

If we might be allowed space, we could here dilate with enthusiasm upon the surpassing magnificence of the scene before us. The highest, the wealthiest, the loveliest, and the most honoured of the land, are gathered into one Tableau Vivant of the most interesting period of modern history; and but that any reference to the stern and unclothed facts of actual life would here be out of place, we would observe that, in our opinion, never did Sovereign and Prime Minister coincide in their measures more happily, than Queen Victoria and her Premier. The latter taxes us to relieve the commonalty; our gracious and lovely Sovereign, who combines exquisite feminine diplomacy with more serious statesmanship, amerces her nobles through their pleasures, and the gay magnates, en amusant, spend £100,000 to revive languishing trade! This is the healthful ingredient which lies at the bottom of the overflowing cup of pleasure. This is one of the wholesome conditions by which affluence and rank should preserve their distinctions amongst us. Some of our contemporaries, in narrow-minded envy of the rich, appear as if they would retrograde to the very sumptuary laws of the dark ages. We laugh to scorn the remarks of these > "Malicious censurers which ever,

> As ravenous fishes, do a vessel follow
> That is new trimmed, but benefit no further > Than vainly longing."

We must now describe the magnificent dress worn by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, in the character of Edward III., and, considering the impersonation selected by his royal consort, we cannot but admire the pure taste that dictated the adoption in this instance. The cloak (which, as well as every other external part of the attire of his Royal Highness and of her Majesty, was manufactured in Spitalfields) was composed of the richest scarlet velvet, lined throughout with crmine of the first quality. Round the entire extremity ran a splendid gold lace, three inches in width, bearing upon it a raised pattern of oak leaves and acorns. This lace was edged top and bottom with two rows of pearls of an unusual size, amounting in number to no less than 1200. The cloak was cut to fix itself in such a manner as to hang pendant fully from each shoulder without any fastening. His Royal Highness connected the two sides of the cloak across the breast with a band composed of, and most gorgeously studded with diamonds, emeralds, rubies, topazes, and almost every other description of precious stones. Underneath this cloak his Royal Highness wore a full robe, reaching from the throat to the feet, constructed of a material which in its manufacture, cost 15 guineas per yard. It is a brocade of which the component parts are gold, and blue and satin silk. The splendour of the effect of this robe was greatly enhanced, by being slashed with royal blue velvet, the slashing being fully studded, like the connecting band of the cloak, with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, &c. The collar of this robe was arranged, with respect to the brilliancy of its jewels, so as to match the band of the cloak.

The tout ensemble of his Royal Highness's attire was, in every way, worthy of the distinguished wearer, and formed a correct and beautiful parallel with that produced by the gorgeous costume of her Majesty.

His Royal Highness was surrounded by a noble group of attendants, in appropriate habits; amongst whom, with others not historically associated with the monarch represented, were the Earl of Rosslyn, who wore the costume of Grand Veneur of the nearest period to Edward the Third's age.

The Marquis of Normanby selected for his delineation of character, that of the heroic Sir Walter de Manny, one of the most valiant and chivalrous companions of the great Edward.

The Earl of Jersey appeared as Grand Master of the Order of the Templars. His dress was entirely white, with the red cross on the breast. This character is rich in historic association, and, as such, excited peculiar interest.

The Marquis of Douro, Sir William Stanley, Mr John Stanley, and the Hon. Charles Gore, wore costumes of the court and age of Philip II.

The Duke of Sutherland appeared as the Duke of Ferrara.

The Hon. Colonel Anson exhibited the splendid dress of Francisco de Medici, Grand Duke of Tuscany.

Among the most effective costumes of the evening, that of the Earl of Pembroke, as Francis I., stood prominent. Could that magnificent Prince have arisen from his tomb, he would have been delighted to see so fair and well-featured a nobleman reviving his memory in the eyes of the toutes belles, to which he was so much devoted. In the hands of the noble lord he represented the finer moments of his bright but chequered existence, as when vanquished at Pavia, he wrote the noble letter with "tout est-perdue fors l'honneur." It would be impossible, and if otherwise, perhaps not sufficiently interesting, were we to give a categorical list of the 2000 distinguished individuals who, upon this occasion, condescended to merge the identity of their own character in that of the illustrious of bygone days. Some few we may notice, as for instance:—

Gaston de Foix (personated by Prince George of Cambridge).—The most interesting of all youthful historical heroes. To him might be assigned what Ariosto so beautifully says of his imaginary hero Zerbino, that "Nature made him, and destroyed her mould."

Louis XII. (the Duke of Beaufort).—Ariosto, superior in that to any other poet, gives the title of Il buono to his greatest hero, as a quality superior to and implying every other. Louis XII. had a right to this appellation, he was a good and stout soldier, as well as the best of the French kings.

The Constable de Bourbon (Lord Hillsborough).—Nothing can be more splendid to dress out than the character of this illustrious traitor; but his historical character is detestable. A prince of the blood, he imprisoned his king; a Frenchman, he shed the blood of his countrymen; a Catholic, he besieged the Pope, stormed the capital of Catholic Christianity, and in our age antiquarians still lament the destruction, by his soldiery, of some classic remains which then still subsisted at Rome.

Bayard (Earl of Cardigan).—To throw a moral light on the picture before so dark a character as Bourbon's has disappeared, we take up the Chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. The scene that once took place betwixt Bayard and Bourbon is sublime, and alone suffices to depict the noble mind of the former. When Bayard fell, mortally wounded at the passage of La Sesia, the Constable arrived as he was on the point of death. "Bayard," he exclaimed, "how I pity you!"—"No, Monseigneur, it is you to whom pity is due," murmured the expiring knight, as, kissing his cross-handled sword as a sign of redemption, his great soul winged its way to heaven. The contrite constable passed on with a sigh and dropped a tear. With Bayard "the age of chivalry was gone." How strictly appropriate was the taste that for a moment led posterity to imagine his resuscitation in Lord Cardigan.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex appeared in a full Highland costume, embellished by every source of sartorial art. The dagger, pistols, and claymore of his Royal Highness, a necessary part of the national costume, were mounted in silver, wrought with a talent not unworthy of a Benvenuto Cellini.

The Lord Chamberlain, Earl De La Warr, appeared in the supposed costume of an Officer of State in the court of Edward III. His surcoat was embroidered with the badge worn by his ancestor at the battle of Poictiers. His motto, also assumed on the same occasion, was embroidered on the edge of his mantle.

Lord Forester wore the costume of a Captain of the Guards at the time of Edward III.

His Grace the Duke of St. Alban's, Grand Falconer of England, attended in the magnificent and picturesque costume of his hereditary office, which, happily, agrees with the epoch in which her Majesty has placed the scene of this incomparable masque.

Sir Robert Peel's eldest son adopted a costume copied from Vandyke, a painter whose name if it had not been immortalised by a greater fame—would have been perpetuated by the appellation given by him to a peculiar dress, which has descended to our times. In the costume of our Prime Minister's youthful heir, the rich dress of grenat velvet was set off by deep trimmings of rich point lace and guipure, enhanced by the splendid coiffeur so often seen in the pictures of Charles I. and his courtiers, by the great artist.

A report obtained circulation at the beginning of the month that, amongst the epochs most in favour for selection of character was that of Henry VIII., and consequently every burly nobleman or gentleman not previously cust was importuned into persecution to become the bluff Harry of the night. But they have all proved inexorable, although temporary wives more numerous and more lovely were offered the copy, than the original English Bluebeard ever possessed. Some beaux are mentioned who have been most wofully hurt at the irreparably offended discovery by their fair friends, of a jovial embonpoint of which their own amour propre had never accused them.

We had almost omitted to mention that the Marquis of Exeter as well as the Earl of Beverly and several other noblemen, appeared in splendid suits of bright armour. We understand that this costume should be adopted was the particular desire of her Majesty; and it is another instance of her taste and discernment, for it could not fail to enhance the striking effect of the pageant. The armour of the epoch of Edward III. is of striking effect. The pointed helmet encircled by a gold coronet, denoted the rank of the bearer. At this period the plate armour had superseded chain mail. To the effect of bright steel was added that of the surcoat of a rich silken tissue, emblazoned with an embroidery of the armorial bearing of the knight; added to them, the embroidered scarf of silk, en sautoir, across the breast; the bright jewelled poinard de merci, and the cross-handled sword, formed altogether a most picturesque costume.

As regards the dresses worn by the high-born ladies who graced this romance with their presence, it may here be observed that amongst the tissues of which they are made, nothing surpasses that novelty of the season—blondes d'argent et d'or. It is a triumph of human ingenuity to have turned the precious ductile metals into such gossamer tissues. The patterns are exquisite. Whilst the surface in all positions preserves its metallic brilliancy, each thread reflecting every ray of light, the coloured tissues of the dresses beneath are not concealed. These metallic blonds are supervisable to the eye, and you get thus all the effect of cloth of gold and silver, without the inconvenience of its weight. Far the greater proportion of the costumes of the middle ages are made of gold and silver brocade, and of velvet. The effect of the latter, in the dresses we have seen, is relieved by rich embroidery, by gems of every description, and by contrasts of colour. The gold and silver brocades are of coloured grounds with antique patterns, of exquisite designs. Still the heat to be endured in these gorgeous costumes must have been very trying in so crowded an assembly.

The small engravings on this page we have already spoken of as exhibiting partial groups of her Majesty's distinguished guests en ambulance.

In the illustration with which we shall terminate our pictorial record of this extraordinary event, her Majesty is represented on a chair of state, surrounded by her royal and illustrious relatives. Her youthful consort, the venerable and time-honoured Sussex, her justly-endeared mother, and others of her Court, will be readily distinguished amidst the splendid throng.

It is but just that we should acknowledge so far our obligation to the editor of the Morning Post for the information afforded by his columns upon this interesting subject, and from which much of the preceding detail has been collected.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have to acknowledge, with feelings of unqualified satisfaction, the numerous testimonials of approbation that have poured in upon us since the announcement of this unique, and as it has been, we think, correctly designated, "truly national undertaking." To our friends in town and country we tender our warmest thanks for their cheering encouragement so far, and shall rely with much confidence upon their co-operation to assist us in achieving the triumph we hope to deserve. In furtherance of our object, we invite communications, and sketches for illustration, from our literary and artistic friends generally, pledging ourselves to afford every attention to their wishes, compatible with the interests of our paper and the instruction and amusement of our readers.

Dr. Bailey's Notes," and the "Lament of the Railroads," are respectfully declined.

"T. Dass" is right in the matter of the office.

"A Young Man"—It is true the lady in question is still living, but have no immediate means to ascertain the fact.

"J. E." Leeds.—In reply to the question "if a reader would be entitled to the Correspondents Print by a subscription for six months, paid weekly," we beg to state that we have no intention to confine the same to any particular mode of remittance in advance. Every one who may have subscribed to the paper regularly for six months will, upon application to his newsman, be supplied with a copy. It will not be a year in our power, to require payment in advance, except in the usual course of business, as practised by the established journals.

"D. Jones," Euston.—We beg to inform this correspondent that the paper will be forwarded direct from the office to any person remitting sixpence, with a proper address. In places where there is no established news-agent, two weeks or a fortnight first have been found necessary; and we shall furnish a specimen of our contemporaries in due course.

For terms of Advertisements, and what upon the production of a first number must be our guide, we refer to the columns of further correspondence this week.

A specimen sheet of illustrations will embellish our second number.

All communications for this paper are requested to be forwarded to the Office, 320, Strand.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1842.

We commence our political course by a distinct avowal of an unconquerable aversion to the very name of "Party." At any previous time such an announcement would probably have proved sufficient to damage the opening prospects of our journal, despite of all attractions which, in other respects, it might have been enabled to present. There is, however, at the present day, a growing tendency on the part of the people to test all legislative measures simply by a reference to their practical utility, which we have watched with the sincerest pleasure, and upon which we are disposed to place a full reliance. Although, therefore, we are unable, on the one hand, to promise our Conservative friends that we intend to uphold SIR ROBERT PEEL as a faultless minister, whose disposition would be irreparably damaged by an infusion of the least additional degree of candour or docility; or, on the other, to bid for the favour of the Whigs, by averring to a conscientious belief that in his struggles for power no feelings ever lodge in the breast of LORD JOHN RUSSELL save those which originate in an intense desire to accelerate the march of liberal opinions, we can safely promise to readers of both parties, that whatever may be the measures proposed on either side, they will receive no word of encouragement or opposition from us but such as will at all events be supported by honest, if not unanswerable, reasons. In the path which we have thus chalked out, we must, perhaps, expect in turn to give occasional—we trust only momentary—offence to many of our readers; but the manifestation of constant sincerity on our part will gain for us, we feel persuaded, at all times, something like favourable attention, and insure in the long run a more extensive support than could be hoped for from other means. The career of a courtier is as short as it is brilliant; but we hesitate to break entirely with an honest adviser, even although he may sometimes render himself extremely disagreeable.

THE Income-tax, with all its most obnoxious clauses, is now fixed upon the country. When SIR ROBERT PEEL entered upon the office, it seemed as if his administration possessed, to a singular extent, the elements of durability. Weary of watching a lingering death-bed, the people had hailed, as a "happy release," the dissolution of the Melbourne Administration; and eager to shake off the listlessness which had been generated by a constant communion with slow, yet hopeless decay, were prepared to go forward with the lusty heir, who was about not only to remedy the neglect and disrepair consequent upon the prolonged sickness of his predecessors, but to improve in numberless ways the national estate, to the management of which, after long patience, he at length succeeded.

When all men were thus predisposed to favourable constructions, we could have fancied it almost beyond the scope of human ingenuity to devise a mode of action that should at one instant give almost general dissatisfaction. Yet this, despite of the way in which, for the sake of consistency we may try to shake off the impression, has certainly been effected by SIR ROBERT PEEL.

Nor is the case one in which he can console himself for the loss of popularity, by the reflection that it is a temporary consequence of the annoyance naturally felt by the public, when they are suddenly called upon to fulfil an unpleasant duty, and that when this shall have subsided, they will do him justice the more earnestly, to make up for the wrong which he first sustained by their injurious opinions. As the case stands, it is precisely the reverse of this. The disposition on all sides is to shut out all belief as to the impending evils of the obnoxious measure, to avoid all discussion, and hopefully to wait and see what will come of it. His supporters have been bitterly disappointed; but they will not, as yet, confess it even to themselves.

It is not, then, from the circumstance that taxation is at all times ugly, that the Income-tax is now regarded so distastefully. There exists an universal spirit that does honour to the country, cheerfully to meet every demand that may arise for the maintenance of national faith. It is not that there is an aversion to direct taxation. People have learned that, by no other than direct means, can taxation be fairly levied, and a disposition is consequently entertained to encourage the experiment. It is not from a belief that other methods of raising the revenue could have been successfully resorted to. It is from none of these causes that the Income-tax, which is now looked upon with silent forebodings, will, ere long, be regarded with universal loathing.

It is from the fact that it has been arranged upon a plan involving the grossest injustice—injustice apparently as objectless as it is monstrous—that we may venture to foretel the storm that awaits it. To some inequalities in its collection, the people, in their desire to support the ministry, and in the consciousness that it must at present be impossible to devise a scheme by which the contemplated object could be achieved with perfect fairness, were cheerfully disposed to submit: but the remedies for the glaring inequalties of the present bill lie so completely on the surface, and have been so ably pointed out, that it seems as if nothing short of fatuity could have caused the dogged perseverance with which the Premier has maintained them.

The exemption of persons with incomes under £150 a year, although it appears at first to show a most praiseworthy consideration for the poor, is an act of direct injustice. Honest men require equality of taxation, but not exemption of any kind. SIR ROBERT maintains the Poor-law, which, in many cases, deny an out-door allowance of a few shillings to the aged pauper, and grants a boon of £4 10s. per annum, or thereabouts, to every man with a yearly income of £119. It is true that the collection of the tax from the very needy would be difficult and inconvenient; but the way to have avoided this would have been to have exempted the first £100 of every man's income. This would include an entire exemption for all that is strictly poor; but it would at the same time have been just towards the other classes. The man with £160 would, under its operation, be required to pay upon £60; the man with £10,000, upon £9,900 a year. To the former it would operate most beneficially, while the latter would have no cause to complain, since he would share the exemption to the same extent as all other persons. In like manner the injustice of the scheme, as regards terminable annuities, admitted of correction in the simplest way, by causing the tax to be levied according to their money value; while the crowning iniquity of the whole measure involved in the taxing of precarious incomes to the same extent as incomes arising from real property, might have been avoided by a recourse to the plan repeatedly suggested, of estimating all such incomes at the value of life annuities, and levying the tax upon the interest which at 6 per cent. such amount would yield. This course, while it would still have given undue advantage to the possessors of real property, would have appeared singularly righteous when compared with that which has been adopted.

As it stands, the measure is neither more than less than a measure for the exemption of property from the payment of any tax whatever. The professional man, realizing a precarious income of £600 a year, will pay precisely the same amount as the man of independent fortune with his £20,000 Consols. So far as the payment upon income goes, each man is fairly taxed. But one is without capital of any kind, while the other has property to the amount of £20,000, for the protection of which he pays not a single farthing.

These things are so obvious, and have been so clearly enforced by writers of all parties, that it is impossible to believe that SIR ROBERT PEEL is blind to them. If no other means could have convinced him of the impolicy of his measure, the conduct of LORD JOHN RUSSELL might have awakened some misgivings in his mind. Perhaps he calculates that it will take more than three years to break down his majority, and that at the end of that time he can afford to let the Income-tax die a natural death. From this calculation, however, he must not omit all reckoning of the damage which his character will sustain from the rankling thoughts which the pressure of injustice, during so long a period, will fix in the minds of all classes.

If the measure be fraught with wrong—and of this no one can entertain a doubt—the evil consequences that will arise from it must, sooner or later, recoil upon the head of its author. For our parts, we think that a single year will serve to exemplify this truth.

The annual festival of the Literary Fund Society took place on Wednesday evening, at the Freemasons' Tavern, and, we rejoice to say it, an assemblage more numerous, more brilliant in talent and rank, and more enthusiastic in the cause which drew it together, has not, as we believe, been known in the annals of the institution. His Royal Highness Prince Albert took the chair; and nearly four hundred gentlemen sat down to dinner. The galleries were crowded with a brilliant assemblage of ladies, who frequently during the evening testified the interest they took in the proceedings.

ORIGIN OF THE MAIL COACH SYSTEM.

In the year 1780, Mr. John Anderson, of Fermoy, the subject of our present memoir, removed from Dumfries, where he originally resided, to the city of Cork, and formed a commercial establishment at that place, which ranked amongst the first houses in the kingdom. Applying himself to business, his perseverance and industry were rewarded, in the course of a few years, by the acquisition of a large property, which enabled him to purchase the extensive Barrymore property, consisting of the Buttevant, Castle Lyons, and Carrickotoohill estates, and afterwards the estate of Fermoy, in the county of Cork. There he commenced improvements of an extensive and uncommon character, which afforded employment to thousands of poor persons, who, at the time that this field was opened to them, were destitute of all means of living, and absolutely reduced to the last necessity.* When Fermoy came into Mr. Anderson's possession it was a miserable village, but, under his creative hands, it soon became a flourishing town, having an extensive brewery, flour and paper mills, and manufactories of various kinds, the largest inernal corn market in Ireland, a great military depot, with a population of 7000 inhabitants. Mr. Anderson having had occasion to visit England, was struck with the great public benefits arising from the mail-coach establishment, then only in its infancy, and animated by a laudable zeal for the interests of his adopted country, he conceived a wish to establish that great national convenience in the Sister Kingdom. At this time, it should be remembered, the journey from Dublin to Cork, a distance of about 126 miles, occupied between four and five days, while, during Mr. Anderson's lifetime, owing to the improvements made by him, it was accomplished in 24 hours. On recommending the project to the Government, they entrusted its realization solely to Mr. Anderson; and that gentleman, nothing daunted by the obstacles which he had to surmount, entered on the undertaking forthwith. His first line of operations was on the road between Dublin and Cork, and on achieving his object on that road, he passed successively to the roads between Dublin and Limerick, and Dublin and Galway, via Mullingar. The road between Dublin and Waterford, and that, no less fraught with difficulty, between Waterford and Cork, next claimed his attention; and, in fact (for it were tedious to particularise), to him may be attributed the formation of mail-coach roads throughout Ireland.

When the French fleet arrived at Bantry Bay, the kingdom was thrown into the greatest confusion and alarm, and Lord Carhampton, the Commander of the Forces, hastened to the south by forced marches. There he endeavoured to find an eligible position for an encampment, but could not effect his wishes, which involved such serious consequences, unless he consented to pay an enormous sum under the name of rent. On becoming acquainted with this circumstance, Mr. Anderson offered Lord Carhampton the free and unconditional use of his splendid estate (Fermoy), or any part of it, for the lodgment and accommodation of the troops, and the offer was immediately accepted. But winter was fast approaching, the troops required to be lodged in barracks, and the Government having found Fermoy a convenient site for a military station, wrote to Mr. Anderson to ascertain what he would take for such portion of his estate as they might require. Mr. Anderson, with unprecedented liberality, replied by presenting the Government with 26 acres of his best land, worth about £2000, free, for ever. At Buttevant, also, he gave 14 acres of land, worth upwards of £1000, for a similar purpose; and Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who commanded the forces at the time, conceived a high sense of his munificent and public spirit, which was so particularly acceptable at this critical period, that he offered him, by command of the Lord-Lieutenant, the appointment of Commissary-General. The emoluments of this appointment, the most lucrative in the army, amounted to £7 per day, and half-pay for life; but as his whole attention was occupied in the formation of the mail-coach establishment, and his other public works, Mr. Anderson declined it. When the union of the two kingdoms began to be agitated, his efforts to facilitate that object, then a very unpopular one, were highly serviceable to the Government, and he had the credit of sending the Minister of the day the first petition agreed to at Cork in favour of the measure, which was received. Lord Melville was so highly pleased with the strain in which it was conceived, coming from such a quarter, that he read it in the House as part of his speech, paying a compliment to Mr. Anderson the originator of the petition, which few persons have ever had the honour to receive. During the Duke of Richmond's administration, the Prince Regent expressed his sense of Mr. Anderson's public spirit, which had been productive of such benefit to Ireland, by raising his son to the dignity of a Baronet, an honour which Mr. Anderson declined himself, but which he might be gratified to see established in his family.

But the palmy days of his public usefulness have passed away. After devoting the best energies of his mind and the most active era of his life to the advancement of the solid interests of his country—after applying the large property he had accumulated to the furtherance of great national objects—it is melancholy to reflect that while the country is thereby deriving substantial benefits from the plans of this extraordinary man, who pushed in advance the civilisation of Ireland by fully 50 years, his splendid estates, the produce of which he spent in the service of the State, have passed from his family into other hands. Contrast the means of Mr. Anderson with the great revenues of the Irish aristocracy, and say what would not Ireland now be if she had a few such men in every province. The history of no other country furnishes a like example of so much public good having been done to an entire kingdom by a private individual, at his own expense, as Mr. Anderson accomplished for Ireland.

* Mr. Palmer, who originated the mail-coach establishment in England, received £3000 per annum for its management, and was afterwards awarded upwards of £50,000 by Parliament; while the Mr. Anderson referred to, for similar services in Ireland, never received one shilling, notwithstanding the enormous sacrifices he made to carry out this object, and the service he rendered to the Government.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—At the ordinary meeting held on Monday evening, W. R. Hamilton, Esq., F.R.S., president, in the chair, some interesting particulars were read of the progress of the British Mission in Upper Abyssinia and Northern Amœra, under the direction of Captain Harris. The communication was brought down by Lieutenant Barker, of the Indian navy, who was eighteen days in travelling from Aukober to the coast. A commercial treaty had been negotiated with the king, who was well pleased by his alliance with the British, and satisfied with their proposals, and everything was going on well, the officers of the expedition being in good health. Aden, in the vicinity, would, there was no doubt, soon become a commercial emporium of great importance; and so considerable had been its increase, that whilst in 1830 the population was but 300, it had now increased to upwards of 20,000. The other communications were from Mr. Secke, on the valley of the Jordan, and its former courses; and from Lieutenant Barker, on the geographical positions of the town of Dirr.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived in town at half-past four o'clock on Monday afternoon in an open carriage and four, escorted by a party of Hussars, from Claremont. The equerries in waiting, Colonel Arbuthnot and Colonel Wylde, followed in a chariot and four. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, and their attendants, occupied another carriage; and the Dowager Lady Lyttleton, lady in waiting, and Lord Byron, lord in waiting, were in the last carriage. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were received at Buckingham Palace by the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and Lord Colville, lord in waiting on Prince Albert.

The marriage of the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Coburg Gotha and Princess Alexandrine of Baden took place at Carlsruhe on the 3rd instant. Lord George Lennox, who had arrived from England, charged by the Queen and Prince Albert with their felicitations to the Royal pair, was present at the ceremony.

His Serene Highness the Duke of Gerard of Saxe Weimar, attended by Captain Koch, arrived at Marlborough House, the residence of the Queen Dowager, at half-past twelve o'clock on Monday night, having landed from Rotterdam.

On Tuesday his Serene Highness and the Prince of Saxe Weimar, attended by the Rev. J. R. Wood, chaplain to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, honoured the establishment of Messrs. Henry Graves and Co., of Pall-mall, to view Mr. Hayter's splendid picture of the "Royal Marriage," with which the august visiters were pleased to express their unqualified approbation.

A pair of Shetland ponies, intended for the young Prince of Wales's pony phaeton, arrived at the Aberdeen steam-packet wharf, St. Katherine's, last week. A pair of beautiful Pegu ponies from Madras have also been sent to her Majesty, by her Anglo-Indian subjects for the young Prince of Wales.

It was reported in Vienna that the Queen of Spain would marry the hereditary Prince of Lucca, Ferdinand Charles, who was born on the 14th of January, 1823.

The installation of the Duke of Northumberland as Chancellor of the University of Cambridge is fixed for Monday, the 4th of July.

We understand that the preliminaries are arranged for the marriage of Lady Elizabeth Rede Ginkle, only daughter of the late Lord of Athlone, and the Hon. Captain Frederick Villiers, third son of the Earl of Jersey. Her ladyship is in her 21st year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has issued invitations for a full dress dinner-party on the 19th instant, to celebrate her Majesty's birth-day.

THE THEATRES.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

This elegant little theatre opened its doors on Monday night, for the season, with a variety of entertainments. To the bustling burlesque of "The Beulah Spa," with its minstrels and gypsies, troublesome youths, tormented old bachelor, and pretty maidens, which were very agreeably sung by Mrs. H. P. Grattan, succeeded the divertissement of "L'Amour Vainqueur," with its grand pas between Venus, Hymen, Mars, and Cupid; the maiden Flora being represented by Miss Rallin, and her son by Miss Marshall. This mythological interlude was followed by "The Insane Root," a new burletta in one act. The hero of this piece is Mr. Vane Waverley, who, when the curtain rises, has just undertaken the flute for phrenology, wherein his first discovery is that he is afflicted with the protuberance of homicide. Fortunately, he soon ascertains that he is likewise gifted with the bump of benevolence, when, contented with the compensation, he turns his enthusiasm to angling. Whilst trying his skill with fair Flora on the "Mississippi Swell," a dramatic enthusiast, named Sheridan Ward, on whom he has bestowed what passes his crutchets have not absorbed. This amusing little piece is well played by Miss J. Mordaunt, Messrs. F. Matthews, W. Lacy, Oxberry, and Mr. Granby, whose business it is to congratulate people on their infirmities and mishaps, in the character of Mr. Bore. A more conspicuous novelty was next produced, under the title of "The Trooper's Horn, or the Goblin of the Chest," by Fitzball; it met with an equivocal reception, and will probably be advantaged by curtailment. The house was well attended.

ST. JAMES'S.

The French Plays.—Mademoiselle Dejazet's performances seem to become more and more attractive. She made her third appearance on Wednesday night, and drew another salle comble, which boasted more rank and fashion than have perhaps yet graced the St. James's Theatre on any soiree, not included in the subscription. The entertainments consisted of "Les Premieres Armes de Richelieu," and "La Fille de Dominique," both of which pieces had already been represented. In the former, which is far more commendable for its comic situations and the spirit-ness of its dialogue, than for its morality, Mademoiselle Dejazet has so much scope for the exhibition of her eminent dramatic abilities, that one can easily conceive the vogue she has conferred on it in the French capital. The theatre was crowded to the last by the elite of fashion in the metropolis.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

The German Company.—Gluck's beautiful opera of "Iphigenia in Tauris" was performed on Monday night by the German company for the first time these two years, the part of Iphigenia being filled by Madame Stockel Heinfetter, that of Thaus by Staudigl, and those of Pylades and Orestes by Abresch and Eichberger. Heinfetter, Staudigl, and Abresch, were repeatedly honoured with loud applause. Pylades air, "Nur einen Wunsch" being encored. The dance of Furies around the sleeping Orestes excited, to be sure, rather more mirth than horror; but, with this one exception, the opera went off with great eclat. The house was tolerably attended.

The National Convention has been dissolved, and the members have returned to their constituencies, to prepare a memorial to the Queen in behalf of the Charter, and praying her Majesty to cause it to be made the law of the land.

Distress of the Country.—The Montreal papers have the following:—The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London had an interview with Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, at Sir Robert Peel's house in Whitehall-gardens, on Saturday last. We understand that, in consequence of the continued distress in some of the manufacturing districts of the country, and especially in consequence of the exemplary patience with which, speaking generally, that distress has been borne by the labouring classes out of employment, it is in contemplation to issue a Queen's letter, authorising the clergy to make an appeal in their several places of worship on behalf of the distressed to the sympathy and liberality of the public.

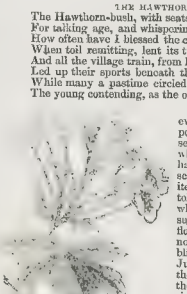
The Socialists are so completely extinguished in Liverpool, that they have been obliged to change the name of their building from "The Hall of Science," to the "Nelson Assembly Rooms."—Liverpool Standard.

We are glad to learn that there is no truth in the report that Mr. Thomas Moore's son has returned from India to this country in ill health.

HORTICULTURE.

THE HAWTHORN.

The Hawthorn-bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age, and whispering lovers made;
How often have I blessed the coming day,
When toil remitting, lent its turn to play,
And all the village train, from labour free,
Led up their sports beneath the spreading tree:
While many a pastime circled in the shade,
The young contending, as the old surveyed.—Goldsmith.



The Hawthorn-tree has ever been a favourite with the poet. Goldsmith, it will be seen, has immortalised the one which flourished in his native hamlet; Milton has also described it as being the favourite spot where "shepherds told their tales of love;" whilst numerous others have sung its praises in rich and flowing verse. But we require not the aid of poetry to establish its merits. In May and June appear the blossoms of the common hawthorn, and those of all its numerous varieties. Perhaps no tree has produced more varieties than this. Loudon enumerates 30 kinds, and we believe there are many more. The most remarkable of these is the Glastonbury thorn, which is generally in flower at Christmas. The Glastonbury thorn is, indeed, in leaf, flower, or fruit, almost all the year; and it has, generally, all three at once on it at Christmas. The original tree grows at Glastonbury, and, according to the legend, was the staff of Joseph of Arimathea, which, being stuck into the ground on Christmas-day, miraculously took root, and instantly produced leaves, flowers, and ripe fruit. Queen Mary's thorn has drooping branches, and long fleshy fruit, which are good to eat. The original tree is said to be still standing, and, if that be true, it must now be nearly three hundred years old. The other varieties of the hawthorn have probably originated from seedlings observed in some hedge, and transplanted into a nursery. In this manner the beautiful scarlet hawthorn was discovered, and also the double-flowered kind, which is so ornamental in our shrubberies, both when its blossoms first expand, and are of a pure white, and when in about a fortnight they begin to take a pinkish tinge, which deepens gradually as they decay. Some of the varieties have brought yellow fruit, and in some it was quite black; in some the leaves are shaped like those of the oak, and in others they are slender and deeply cut, like those of the fern. One kind grows stiff and upright, like the Lombardy poplar, and the branches of another kind are curled and twisted together like gigantic cruglets. In some the leaves are variegated, and in others smooth and shining; in short, it is scarcely possible to set any limits to the varieties. The red-blossomed hawthorn was one of the earliest discovered, it having been found in the time of Ray; and we may easily imagine what a valuable acquisition it must have been to the slender stock of flowering shrubs possessed by our ancestors. It is somewhat remarkable that all the red-blossomed hawthorns have not been propagated from the same tree, but that several red-blossomed seedlings have been found at different times, and at different places. Nearly all the other varieties appear to have been discovered accidentally; and their number is accounted for by the fact of more plants of the hawthorn being raised from seed than of any other tree, from the great length of time that the hawthorn has been used for a hedge plant.

The seeds ripen in October, and may, in most seasons, be collected from old hedges in any quantity. They should be preserved in dry sand for one year, at least, as they do not vegetate till about eighteen months after they are gathered. The ground for sowing the hawthorn seed should be light, and if quite moderately rich should be made so by the application of good rotten manure.

SEASONABLE OPERATIONS.

The Flower Garden.—This is a busy time for the florist. Dahlias may now go out, also tender and half-hardy annuals; picotees, pinks, pansies, &c., will require water when the weather is dry—the late showers have greatly forwarded these favourite plants. Keep ranunculuses and anemonies free from weeds. Tulips will require protection from strong winds and rain; but it is better not to keep the awning over them in fine weather, until the bloom begins to expand. Balsams, coxcombs, and amaranths require frequent shifting. The latter end of the month will be the best time for planting out all kinds of greenhouse plants, climbers, &c., taking care to protect them from frosts. And this reminds us of

The Greenhouse, which department requires constant attention at this season. Admit all possible air; water may be given freely—the evening is the best time; and great care should be taken to keep the plants clean: fumigate often. Geraniums and calceolarias will be now coming into bloom; they should have plenty of water, and be syringed occasionally. Cuttings may be taken of Verbena, Phlox, Drummondii, Maurandias, Lophospermum, &c., and the old plants turned out: the cuttings will afford a good succession.

Border Flowers and Shrubs, which bloom best in May, are those which have some analogy to the wild flowers of the same season. Many of the early bulbs are still in perfection; and the foreign and cultivated members of the Primrose family add great interest to the borders, if judiciously blended with those more highly-coloured flowers which are to come later in the season. Among shrubs requiring mossy soil, the Rhododendrons, the Azalæa, the Kalmias, and several analogous ones, make a fine appearance; and as several of these, more especially the Rhododendrons, admit of being broken into many varieties, they may be diversified without end in their arrangement in the shrubbery; while judiciously worked they have a fine appearance as single plants in the border. Some of the foreign currants, such as the sanguinea and speciosa, have a splendid appearance, either singly or in combination, though as fruit-trees they have no value whatever. The chief beauties of a garden are variety and contrast of colour; and care should always be taken to avoid placing two plants of the same or similar colour together, but invariably to have them as opposite as possible.

[The Plant illustrated in our next paper will be the Geranium.]

The Duke of Wellington.—Sunday last was the birth-day of the Duke of Wellington, who completed his 73rd year, having been born in 1769.

It has been rumoured that Good made a confession on Friday night. The fact is, after sentence had been pronounced on him, he addressed the Court, declaring in the name of God that he did not murder the woman—that she persisted in remaining in the stable all night, and he left her there—on his return he found she had killed herself—that he was alarmed, and had got an old man whom he knew to dispose of the body—and that the old man mutilated it for the convenience of carrying it away. He (Good) first took the ring from the woman's finger, because it was his wife's, and the earrings from her ears; he attributed all the mischief to Susan Butcher; and having so far delivered himself, he turned round to the auditory, and concluded his speech thus:—"Ladies and gentlemen, I wish you all very good night. I have a great deal more to say, but am too much fatigued to say it now." The prisoner was then removed. The announcement of the verdict was received with cheers by the mob under the windows of the Court.

On Saturday Molly Good and Richard Gamble were arraigned as accessaries after the fact. No evidence was offered against them, and both were accordingly acquitted.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

WOMAN.

Women, with their bright imaginations, tender hearts, and pure minds, create for themselves idols, on whom they lavish their worship, making their hearts temples, in which the false god is adored. But, alas! the object of their best and fondest feelings generally too soon proves to be of base clay, instead of pure gold; and though pity would fain intervene, to veil its defects, or even to cherish it in despite of them, virtue, reason, and justice, combine fatally to destroy it; but in the deed too often injures the fane in which it was enshrined.

GEORGE THE THIRD AND HORNE TOOKE.

"Do you ever play cards?" inquired George III. of Horne Tooke. "Please your Majesty," was the reply, "I am so little acquainted with the court cards, as not to know a king from a knave."

A NATURAL CHECK-STRING.

It is well known that Lord Monboddo averred that men were originally born with tails, but they had worn them off with sitting on them. In a disquisition as to what use tails could by any possibility have been to any body, "Oh, yes," said a lady, with great naivete, "they would have been good things for conchmen, as they would serve for check-strings."

THE PAUPER'S DEATH-BED.—BY MRS. SOUTHEY.

Tread softly—bow the head—
In reverent silence bow—
No passing bell doth toll,—
Yet an immortal soul
Is passing now.

Stranger! however great,
With lowly reverence bow;
There's one in that poor shed.
One by that paltry bed—
Greater than thou.

Beneath that beggar's roof,
Lo! death doth keep his state.
Enter—no crowds attend—
Enter—no guards defend
This palace gate.

That pavement damp and cold,
No smiling courtiers tread;
One silent woman stands,
Lifting with meagre hands
A dying head.

No mingling voices sound—
An infant wail alone;
A sob suppress'd—again
That short deep gasp, and then
The parting groan.

Oh! change—Oh! wond'rous change—
Burst are the prison bars—
This moment there, so low,
So agonised, and now
Beyond the stars!

Oh! change—stupendous change!
There lies the soulless clod.
The sun eternal breaks—
The new immortal wakes—
Wakes with his God.

LORD ERSKINE'S ANCESTORS.

Erskine's well-known habit of talking of himself often brought the jest of the table upon him. All the London world was amused by Mingay's retort on Erskine, in one of those fits of laudation. The trial was on some trivial question of a patent for a shoe-buckle. Erskine held up the buckle to the jury, and harangued on "the extraordinary ingenuity of an invention which would have astonished and delighted past ages. How would my ancestors," added he, "have looked upon this specimen of dexterity?" From this point he started into a panegyric on his forefathers. Mingay was counsel for the opposite side, and concluded his speech with,—"Gentlemen, you have heard a good deal to-day of my learned friend's ancestors, and of their probable astonishment at his shoe-buckle; but, gentlemen, I can assure you their astonishment would have been quite as great at his shoes and stockings."

JUSTICE.

The charms of generosity, the attractive loveliness of compassion, the healing and quickening influences of charity, have often and justly been set forth. They have been recommended by all the graces and winning arts of human eloquence. But, should simple and even-handed justice but govern our land for one day, not bestowing aught as a favour, but restoring to each human being that which is rightfully and truly his own, what pen could record all the touching tales of relief from misery—what ear, but that of the all-merciful God, could bear the full swell of blissful gratitude, which would rise from the millions of human hearts now suffering and dying from defrauded rights, and reckless, ruthless injustice.—Sketches of Married Life.

I AM NEVER ALONE.

I am never alone!—at an early dawn,
When the lark pours his joyous notes on high,
When the diamond dew-drop gems the lawn,
And the daisy opens her tearful eye—
I am never alone—with fragrant air,
The spirit of the first young Hour is there.

I am never alone!—at warm noon-day,
When the breeze is drunk by the scorching heat,
When the lark hath hushed his thrilling lay,
And the flowers shut up their odours sweet—
I am never alone—beside me lies,
The Spirit of the Wood, with deep dark eyes.

I am never alone!—at evening's close,
When the twittering birds bid earth good night,
When the insect hums round the laurel rose,
And the hat flies low in the dim twilight—
I am never alone—on bended knee,
The Spirit of the Night wind prays with me.

PULPIT POLITENESS TO THE LADIES.

A minister a short time ago held forth to his female auditors in the manner following:—"Be not proud that our blessed Lord paid your sex the distinguished honour of appearing first to a female after the resurrection, for it was only done that the glad news might spread the sooner!"

WHITE-WASHING.

The husband gone, the ceremony begins. The walls are in a few minutes stripped of their furniture; paintings, prints, and looking-glasses lie in a huddled heap about the floors; the curtains are torn from the testers, the beds crammed into the windows; chairs, and tables, bedsteads, and cradles crowd the yard; and the garden-fence bends beneath the weight of carpets, blankets, cloth cloaks, old coats, and ragged breeches. Here may be seen the lumber of the kitchen, forming a dark and confused mass; for the foreground of the pictures, gridirons and frying-pans, rusty shovels, and broken tongs, spits, and pots, joint-stools, and the fractured remains of rush-bottomed chairs. There a closet has disgorged its bowels; cracked tumblers, broken wine-glasses, phials of forgotten physic, papers of unknown powders, seeds, and dried herbs, handsful of old corks, tops of teapots, and stoppers of departed decanters:—from the rag-hole in the garret, to the rat-hole in the cellar, no place escapes unrummaged. It would seem as if the day of general doom was come, and the utensils of the house were dragged forth to judgment. This ceremony completed, and the house thoroughly evacuated, the next operation is to smear the walls and ceilings of every room with brushes dipped in a solution of lime called white-wash. These smearings and scratchings, washings and dashings, being duly performed, the next ceremonial is to cleanse and replace the distracted furniture. The losses and destruction incident to two whitewashings are equal to one removal, and three removals equal to one fire.—Dr. Franklin.

THE FASHIONS.

Rue de la Chausse d'Antin, Paris, May 9th.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—I feel an inexpressible delight in inditing my first communication to your lady readers, upon the fashions of the haut ton of this ville de gaite. So suddenly and with such power has the sun lately shot forth, that there is no end to invention in our spring fashions.

To begin, then, let me first speak of bonnets. These most decidedly a-la-mode, are the chapeaux paille de riz, which are trimmed with shaded ribbons, white in the centre, gradually increasing in tone towards the edges. Pale blues, greens, and coleur d'or, are most in vogue. For dress, a small pendant plume of shaded marabouts, light as a zephyr, is worn on the left side; while the right is trimmed with a neuel rosace of ribbon encircled with lace. For the promenade, a bouquet of hanging) flowers (pale roses, violets, and primroses have the preference) is placed on the left side, and a slight garniture of lace is sometimes twisted with ribbon across the bonnet, the corners of which are worn rather pointed.

Leghorns are trimmed in the same style as the paille de riz, excepting that the colours are a tone deeper, to harmonize with the increased colour of the straw.

White is but little worn as present by our elegantes for the promenade, but it enjoys their patronage in our salons. An endless variety of organdies balzarines have appeared as competitors for favours, to which, as demi toilettes, they are justly entitled. For evening dresses the Pekin and watered nenon are the most fashionable kinds of silks. Trimmings of every description to the bottom of dresses appear to be waning, although for the fronts they are much employed. For these a new kind of varied silk gimp, plaited in serpentine forms, is used; but the skirt must be plaited in broad plaits, to keep it well in view, as it is otherwise apt to curve and fold round in walking. Muslin dresses are occasionally lined with pale blue and rose silks, the sleeves of which are tight, and trimmed with perpendicular rows of bouillonne.

Shawls will decidedly give place to scarfs and mantelettes, of which there is an endless variety—those a la Louis XIII. are especial favourites, but one cannot be comme il faut without another charming novelty—for what is more chaste than the capuchon, which, as it brings into use any kind of lace you may have in your armoire, combines at once economy with elegance? Au revoir. FELICIE.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

[Sittings in Banco.]

THE QUEEN v. ALARIC ALEXANDER WATTS.

In this case a rule had been obtained calling on the defendant to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against him for the publication, in the United Service Gazette, of a libellous paragraph, reflecting on the character of Captain Maurice, the prosecutor. Mr. Thesiger, on behalf of the defendant, now stated that the article in question imputed to Captain Maurice—that, under certain circumstances, which occurred a great many years ago, the captain had avoided an inquiry by a court-martial. The defendant now publicly expressed his belief that there was no foundation for the supposed charge against Captain Maurice, to whom he offered his sincere apology for its insertion. The Attorney-General, on the part of Captain Maurice, said—This reparation having been made, Captain Maurice had no wish whatever to prosecute this matter any further. His object was, the vindication of his character, and not the obtaining an award of offended justice against the defendant, who might possibly fall into an error, notwithstanding the use of great care in the conduct of his paper. On payment by the defendant of all the costs which had been incurred, and on his apology being, as it had been, made by the defendant's counsel, he consented that the rule should be discharged.—Rule discharged accordingly.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

The Nisi Prius sittings for Middlesex commenced on Tuesday morning at Westminster before Lord Abinger.

DYER AND ANOTHER v. MAY.

This was an issue under the order of a judge, pursuant to the Interpleader Act, to determine a question as to the property in the furniture of a house, situate No. 54, Devonshire-street, Portland-place. Mr. Platt and Mr. Lee appeared for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Thesiger with Mr. Watson, for the defendant. It appeared that Mr. H. C. Moreton Dyer, the brother of the plaintiffs, occupied the house in Devonshire-street, Portland-place, up to the beginning of the month of April last, when he departed with his wife and family to France. The defendant and Mr. May had previously obtained a judgment against Mr. Dyer for about 700*l.*, and issuing an execution upon this judgment, proceeded to Devonshire-street, when it was ascertained that the furniture was previously taken possession of by a person named Hawker, on behalf of the plaintiffs, who claimed the property in the furniture under an assignment executed on the 26th of March last. To show that the assignment was a bona fide transaction, it was now proved that the plaintiffs, the Misses Dyer, had advanced their brother 1200*l.* in September, 1831, and understanding he had got into pecuniary difficulties, they urged him in February last to make some arrangement for securing their debt, upon which he executed the assignment in question. On the other hand, it appeared that, although the assignment purported to transfer all the plate, linen, &c., in the house in Devonshire-street, to the plaintiffs, within a few days before Mr. Dyer left England, he caused a plate-chest to be taken to Hoare's bank, in Fleet-street, and lodged there in the name of the plaster Lady Knatchbull, who was a relation by marriage, and had also some trifling articles removed to the house of Mrs. Chichester, in Wimpole-street, who was also a connexion. This clandestine disposition of the property, it was contended, showed that the assignment of the plaintiffs was merely colourable, to protect the property from Mr. Dyer's creditors, and that the plate and linen would not have been removed if they belonged to the plaintiffs. Lord Abinger advised the jury that the removal of the plate and linen before Mr. Dyer left this country for France, although it might have been a fraud on the plaintiffs, did not show that the assignment to them was not bona fide. The real question for the jury was, whether the Misses Dyer meant to make their brother a present of the 1200*l.*, or to accept the assignment as a valid security. If the assignment was really taken as a transfer of the property, although it may be done by way of preference to his sisters, as Mr. Dyer had not become a bankrupt, it was not fraudulent. The jury, after a short conference, returned a verdict for the plaintiffs.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The seventh session of the present mayoralty commenced on Monday, before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Alderman Sir Chapman Marshall, Sir James Duke, the Sheriffs, the Under-sheriffs, and the other civic officers.

The calendar contains a list of 222 offences: and the cases arise as follows:—From London, 44; Middlesex, 104; Essex, 8; Kent, 18; and Surrey, 38.

UTTERING A FORGED ORDER.—William Elphinstone, aged 22, described as a sailor, was placed at the bar, charged with feloniously uttering a forged order for monies to Moses Myers. Mr. Phillips defended the prisoner, from the evidence, had presented an order for 10*l.*, which appeared to be an order for an advance of wages to the prisoner, under an engagement of his making a voyage in the capacity of chief mate to India in the ship Madras, and which appeared to be signed by the master, Robert Slack. The prosecutor's wife advanced a sovereign on it, and promised to give the prisoner more on the ensuing day. He, accordingly called to receive the money, when the prosecutor's wife, having discovered by inquiry that the order had been forged, gave him into custody.

Mr. Phillips, for the defence, asserted that the prisoner was very highly connected, but had been deserted by his friends in consequence of wildness; and the present charge arose in consequence of a wager which had been made between the prisoner and another young man, who had since sailed to India, the terms of which were, that the prisoner could get his presents from Mr. Myers on a Sunday. The prisoner presented the order for the purpose merely of winning his wager. The order had been actually written and prepared by the other young man, who has since sailed. The learned counsel proceeded to urge that whatever may have been chargeable to the prisoner inconsiderate wildness, there was no criminality in his intentions.—The Recorder summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of Guilty.—The Recorder then addressed the prisoner, and sentenced him to seven years' transportation.

WEDNESDAY.—Maria Williams, alias Maria Wood, a respectable-looking woman, was charged with stealing plate to the value of 300*l.* the property of James Holden, Esq., her master.

The robbery was committed in a very singular and daring manner. It appeared that the prisoner was cook to the prosecutor, and in the month of October, in last year, she had warning to leave. On the 20th of that month the prosecutor and his wife were from home, and on their return they discovered that the drawers in their bed-room had been forced open, and that a number of silver articles, consisting of coffee-ewers, tea-pots, salvers, forks, spoons, gold rings, and other articles, to the value altogether of more than 300*l.*, had been stolen, and that the prisoner had also absconded. It was then ascertained that in the course of the same day the prisoner left the house in a hackney-coach, carrying with her a large box, and it appeared that she proceeded to Dublin, where she went to the house of a jeweller named Bennett, and represented herself to him as a widow, and stated that her husband had left her some plate, and that, being in difficulties, she was anxious to dispose of it. She was dressed very elegantly in mourning, with a widow's cap on; and Mr. Bennett having no suspicion, purchased of her two hundred and twenty ounces of silver plate, for which he paid her 4*s.* 8*d.* an ounce. She afterwards said that she wanted to raise more money, and sold here a quantity of jewelery. The prisoner was subsequently apprehended at Cork; and on the prosecutor arriving, and being confronted with her, she denied all knowledge of him, and declared she had never seen him before in her life. The prisoner was then brought to London, and, on her way thither, she made a statement tantamount to a confession of the robbery, and asked the officer whether it would be better for her to plead guilty.

The jury found the prisoner Guilty.

The Court ordered the plate in the possession of Bennet to be given up to the prosecutor.

The Recorder took his seat on the bench at five o'clock, and, in the course of the evening, the grand jury came into Court with a number of bills, and among others, they returned a true bill against Daniel Good, for the murder of Jane Jones, otherwise Good, and against Mary Good, as an accessory after the fact. Both the indictments are very voluminous, and contain no less than thirty-two counts. A true bill was also returned against Daniel Good for felony, and against Mary Good for felony. A bill was likewise returned against Richard Gamble for felony, and against Thomas Cooper for the murder of the policeman Daley.

OLD COURT.

THE HIGHBURY MURDER.—At the sitting of the Court on Thursday, Thomas Cooper, the man charged with the wilful murder of Daley the policeman, on the 5th instant, was arraigned. The prisoner appeared in a very weak and debilitated state, and was accommodated with a chair while the indictment was being read. When placed in the dock he looked carelessly round the Court for a few minutes. He appeared to pay no attention whatever to the indictment as it was being read, but, as he did at the police-office, placed his arms across the bar, resting his head upon them. After pleading Not Guilty, an application was made by Mr. Horry to postpone the trial, upon the ground of there not being time to prepare the defence. Mr. Baron Alderson refused to defer the trial to the next sessions, and advised Mr. Horry to apply to the full Court on Friday.

POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE—WEDNESDAY.—A Mr. Rainton, who stated that he resided in Mortimer-street, and was principal conductor of a matrimonial institution, came to the justice room in consequence of some observations which were made by Sir Peter Laurie, relative to an establishment for bringing couples together in the matrimonial way. He brought with him a book, containing the items of the various charms and recommendations which the subscribers possessed by their own accounts, and to which he desired to draw the attention of the magistrate in proof of the bona fide character of the mart with which he had, he said, the honour of being connected. Sir Peter Laurie—Pray, what brings you here, Mr. Rainton?—Mr. Rainton—I come here on account of the attacks which you have been pleased to make upon a highly honourable and bona fide matrimonial institution, of which I am the head. Sir Peter Laurie—How do you know that you are the person alluded to? I never mentioned a name, and I never heard yours before. Mr. Rainton—Because mine is the only matrimonial mart in the metropolis, and I suspect the false information came from a man who was formerly connected with the institution, but who acted disgracefully, and has now nothing to do with it.

Sir Peter Laurie, after having read aloud to the amusement of the crowd a few of the items of recommendation of gentlemen who sought ladies with considerable fortunes without requiring that they should be particularly beautiful, asked the principal in the matrimonial mart how long he had been connected with the institution?—Mr. Rainton replied, that he was in the concern in 1839.—Sir Peter Laurie—And how many marriages may you have caused to be perpetrated in that time?—Mr. Rainton—Why, three. (Laughter.) Sir Peter Laurie—What! only three in all that time? Then I suppose you get a per centage upon the cash which ladies bring?—Mr. Rainton—Certainly I do. (Great laughter.) Oh, you may ridicule it, but the concern is in every respect honourable and creditable. Sir Peter Laurie—And do you get women who are silly enough to expose themselves to this sort of humbug?—Mr. Rainton—I repeat, there is no humbug in it. Sir Peter Laurie—Well, I am very glad that you have caught no more than three flats in three years. (Laughter). Mr. Rainton—I am not a sharp, however. Sir Peter Laurie—You are certainly rather a flat for coming here; but as you are here, let me look into your book for the history of these parties you have coupled together. (Great laughter.) Mr. Rainton (withdrawing and closing his book)—No, we never give information of that kind. Sir Peter Laurie—Well, then, do you know that I consider all matrimonial agency rascally. I think it is very like swindling. Mr. Rainton—I assure you that some of the first people are in my books. There is one who is a deputy lieutenant and a magistrate of two counties. (Laughter). Sir Peter Laurie—Well, it is as creditable to him as it is to you. Mr. Rainton—Oh, Sir Peter, I have one in my books who belongs to your own club. (Laughter.) Sir Peter Laurie—Depend upon it, if he had been known to be a customer of yours, he would have been well black-balled. But let me know your object in coming to me. Mr. Rainton—To contradict the statements you have made. I may make you responsible for them in another court. (Laughter.) Sir Peter Laurie—When I succeeded in knocking up the West Middlesex Insurance Company, I cannot be afraid of concerns of minor import. Mr. Rainton—Mine is no West Middlesex Insurance Company. Mr. Hobler—No; I suppose, however, you insure the happiness of your couples? (Great laughter.) Mr. Rainton—No; I don't insure anything of the kind. (Laughter.) Sir Peter Laurie—But as you only effect one marriage per year, your profits upon the commission must be considerable. Now, is it true that you charge each of your patients £2 12*s.* 6*d.*? Mr. Rainton—Not at all. I charge no more altogether than eleven shillings. (Great laughter.) Sir Peter Laurie—What! No more than eleven shillings for a lady with £1000 a year? Now, I do not relish this way of couple-making. I never knew any persons joined together in consequence of a matrimonial advertisement except a poor fellow in Fleet-street, who cut his own throat soon after the knot was tied; and Corder, the murderer, for whom a knot was tied in another way. Mr. Rainton then withdrew amidst loud laughter, which he bore with fortitude.

A young man, named Samuel Crafts, was charged by Israel Cohen with having defrauded him, by selling him the duplicate of a chain described as gold, but proved to be copper. The complainant stated that the defendant prevailed upon him to purchase the duplicate of the chain, which was a watch-guard, and upon which 11*s.* had been lent by the pawnbroker, for the sum of 3*s.*; that upon redeeming the chain he ascertained, on getting it tested, that there was not an atom of gold in the whole length, and that the defendant refused to return the property which had been paid for the redemption from pawn. The defendant, in the absence of the pawnbroker, stated that the chain he had pledged was certainly gold, and did not partake of any of the base qualities of the inferior metals of that produced, which it was quite evident was copper or brass without mixture. He denied that the complainant had paid him money for the duplicate, but admitted that he had borrowed 6*s.* from that person upon it. When the pawnbroker appeared, however, the defendant admitted that the chain produced was the identical one he had pledged. Two shopmen, in the employment of Mr. Barker, pawnbroker, gave rather a singular account of the transaction. It appeared from their statement that the defendant went into one of Mr. Barker's shops, and, presenting the chain, said all he wanted was ten or twelve shillings upon it. The shopman, not doubting that the article was gold, readily complied, but after the defendant was gone he tested it, and found that it was copper. Subsequently the defendant returned, and wanted more money upon the chain, but the shopman of course declined any further advance. The defendant then parted with the duplicate to the complainant, who, in the belief that he had got a good thing, ran off and released it, and walked off to another shop, belonging to the same pawnbroker, and asked for the loan of 30*s.* upon the valuable commodity. The shopman being a keener and older hand than his fellows at the other establishment, immediately refused to lend a farthing upon such trash; and then back walked Mr. Israel Cohen to the other shop, and tried to get even the money he was out of pocket upon the article. The attempt was, as might be imagined, ineffectual, and the complainant then caused the defendant to be apprehended.—The Lord Mayor asked whether it was the fact that the pawnbroker's man, who lent the money upon the chain, did not mention to the defendant that it was base metal upon the second application? The shopman replied that such was the fact. He apprehended, if he made any such admission, that it would never be redeemed. (A laugh.) The defendant—I declare I never knew it was not gold, and also that I never sold the duplicate to Cohen. I only borrowed the five shillings upon it, and he promised to keep it safe for me till I could redeem it. He, however, was so anxious to make something by doing me, that he ran off and took out the chain, and tried to raise twice the amount. (A laugh.) The Lord Mayor—I believe that one of you is just as bad as the other, and I dismiss the case altogether. Complainant—Well, but please you, my lord, this here fellow must hand me over my sixteen and twopence farthing, what this here rubbish cost me. The Lord Mayor—No; take your chain. Your friend has done you, and you tried to do the pawnbroker, and I congratulate the tradesman for having got so well out of your hands. Complainant—Why, plesh my heart, what am I to do with this here copper? The Lord Mayor—Put it round your neck to be sure—the proper place for it. (Laughter.)

UNION-HALL.—A FLARE UP.—Edward Jones, a man of respectable appearance, was brought before Mr. Traill, charged with being engaged in the illicit manufacture of spirits in a house where the seizure of a private still and a quantity of liquor was made by the officers of excise.—John Court, an excise officer stated that on Saturday last, at four o'clock in the afternoon, he went, accompanied by another officer, to 35, Wellington-street, Blackfriar's-road, where, from information, it was known the prisoner was engaged in the illicit manufacture of spirits. On obtaining admission to the house, which they did by stratagem, and on entering the back parlour, they found it fitted up with a still, and all the apparatus necessary for carrying on business in an extensive way. The prisoner was there apparently as if he had been at work, and was in the act of running out of the house without his coat, when he was stopped and brought back to the still-room. At this time there was a large fire under the still, from which was running through the worm into a large pan, spirits of a strong quality. The prisoner, on finding that he had no chance of escape from the premises, ran forward to the still, and seizing up the pan with the spirits, threw the contents into the fire, which set the place in a blaze, and, had they not retreated expeditiously, they would all have stood a chance of being severely injured; as it was, however, a good supply of water being procured, the flames were soon extinguished without doing much damage; and on examining the place, a seizure was then made of a large quantity of spirits, besides several gallons of molasses wash, which is in a state of fermentation. The prisoner, in his defence, said, that he dashed the spirits into the fire, not with the intention of inflicting injury on himself or the excise officers, nor to set fire to the place but that he did it with the view to get rid of the liquor, so that none of it could be produced in evidence against him. He was fined £30, and in default of payment was committed for three months.

PORTRAIT PAINTING.—George Good was charged with caricaturing an old gentleman named Heather, the proprietor of Golden Cottage, Kennington, and defacing the boards in front of his house.—The complainant stated that he had latterly been very much annoyed by some persons drawing his likeness in chalk, with a pipe stuck in his mouth, on the boards in front of his cottage. The caricature caused a number of persons to assemble in front of the house, whose boisterous mirth was anything but pleasing to him. He added that, determined on finding out who the person was, he watched, and caught the defendant busily engaged with a lump of chalk, writing his (Mr. Heather's) name under a figure representing him, and he therefore gave him into custody.—Mr. Traill inquired whether there was anything indecent in the character of the figure drawn, or obscenity in the writing on the boards, as in that case he could inflict a very heavy fine on the defendant.—The complainant admitted that there was not, only that it made him look very ridiculous, and caused crowds to collect round his door.—The defendant said that he did it to be revenged for an insult offered to his wife by some person living in Golden Cottage, who called out after him, and said that he was like Good, the murderer, by name and by nature.—The defendant was fined 10s.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—THE DRAPER'S DODGE.—Samuel Gregory, porter to an oil merchant, was brought before Mr. Maltby, charged with having caused a mob to assemble about the shop of Messrs. Bycroft and Co., Commerce House, Leicester-square.—A shopman in the employ of the firm, said the defendant looked over a number of parasols for sale at the door, and having selected one, he tendered 2s. in payment. Witness told him the price was 8s. 6d., but the defendant insisted on having it at the price marked on a ticket, which must have slipped into a basket containing the high-priced parasols accidentally. In consequence of the defendant's determination to have the parasol at his own price, a crowd assembled, and it was then found necessary to call a policeman to remove the defendant to the station-house.—In answer to the charge, the defendant said, that he was passing through Leicester-square on an errand, he saw a basket of parasols ticketed 1s. 11d., and he selected one from the lot and tendered the money. The shopman wanted to make out that the ticket came there by mistake, but he (defendant) insisted on having the article on the terms specified on the ticket.—Mr. Maltby said it was a very common practice for tradesmen to attempt to defraud the public. In the present instance he should order the defendant to be discharged from custody.

AN IRISH TEA-PARTY.—A brace of Irish ladies came before Mr. Hardwick with all the evidences upon them of having been recently engaged in pugilistic contest. The complainant in particular had her face so tattooed by the nails of her adversary, that she resembled a New Zealand squaw. "Yer honner," says Mrs. Ryan, the complainant, "I don't know Nelly Roche, barring she lives on the same flure. On Wednesday I was taking my bit of tay in my own room, when in comes Nelly, and without axing anybody's lave, sits down behind me. 'A warm day, Mother Ryan,' sez she. 'That's no news, Mother Roche,' sis I. 'A cup of tay wouldn't do me any harm,' sez she. 'You know best about that,' says I. Then, yer honner, she sot for a minute without spaking, and then, up she jumps, and calls out, 'Bad luck to the woman that won't ax another to a cup of tay.' Then she rinands aff my cap, and scrapes me face wid her five finger-nails, till I'm unable to stand up in my own defence."—Mrs. Roche, in reply, admitted the assault which had been provoked by Mrs. Ryan's inhospitality, in not asking her to have tea, when she had been out with her all the morning, and had spent all her "market money" at the various gin-shops which they had visited together.—The magistrate after hearing a witness, ordered the defendant to pay the expenses.

ELECTIONEERING.—The investigation of the double return for Cardigan, which lasted but half an hour, cost Pryse Pryse, Esq. the Hon. Member, more than £1200.

HORNCASTLE AND CO.'S BANKRUPTCY.—The first dividend of 5s. in the pound is expected to be declared on Tuesday next.—Keene's Bath Journal.

M. Dormoy, the director of the Italian Opera of Paris, is now in London, effecting engagements for the ensuing season. His company of tenori will be reinforced by the presence of Salvi, who enjoys a great reputation in Italy; and Mdlle. Moltini, who made so promising a display as Norma, at her Majesty's Theatre a few Saturday since, will, it is said, be added to the list of prime donne. The Salle Ventadour is at present in the occupation of a German company, but their success has been very indifferent.

Several letters were received at the General Post-office by the last overland mail, via Marseilles, bearing the extraordinary postmark of Hong-Kong, in China.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

SCULPTURES.

"Nothing extenuats, nor set down aught in malice."

"All first impressions are voluntary and inevitable, but the knowledge of the subject will guide you to judge first of the whole—not to creep on from part to part, and nibble at execution before you know what it means to convey. The notion of a tree precedes that of counting leaves or disentangling branches. Every artist has, or ought to have, a character or system of his own; if, instead of referring that to the test of nature, you judge him by your own packed notions, or arraign him at the tribunal of schools which he does not recognise, you degrade the dignity of art, and add another fool to the head of Dilettanti.

"But if, for reasons best known to yourself, you come determined to condemn what yet you have not seen, let me advise you to drop your pursuits of art for one of far greater importance—the inquiry into yourself; nor aim at taste till you are sure of justice."—Fuseli Greek Aphorisms.

Those who, like ourselves, in the earnest search after the ton kalon ideon, anxiously fly to gaze on the gorgeous banquet spread for cultivated taste, this 70th time, by the associated representatives of British Art, the Royal Academicians, will, of course, as curiosity demands, first seek for an impression of the whole, more or less distinct, ere they attend particularly to individual works. And it is not to be expected that every visiter will attentively consider each separate specimen; but judging in the manner Reynolds preferred, from their immediate perceptions, without much fatigue of thinking—allowing the eye to roam and wander at large over the whole magnificent array, till the mind is arrested, and an interest excited by the dazzling lustre and unusual brilliancy of some prominent gem. We have leisurely strolled over the rooms and observed those works whose intrinsic excellence absorbed us in contemplation, and enforced our admiration, and those which, by partial defect or oversight, demanded the gentle censure of all real lovers of art, and shall offer but few remarks, expecting that all will go, see, and be gratified. And, first, the Sculpture Room—for we love to begin here, that we may be immediately transported from the busy hum of the out-door throng, and gather a calmness from the solemn simplicity of those images that seem to have started instinct with an entranced vitality, hearing to time's latest date the figured type of high enobled virtue.

1827. 'Venus rescuing Æneas from Diomed.' W. C. MARSHALL, Royal Academy. Gold medal group.—It may undoubtedly have deserved the medal in comparison with the other groups sent for competition; but how Mr. Marshall could commit such an error as to give Æneas, a warrior, the almost softened outline and muscles of a female, we cannot conceive. When a warrior falls wounded, the muscles, without doubt will be relaxed, but they will still present an appearance analogous to the character of the figure; the relaxed state of the large distinct masses of prominent muscle belonging to heroic form, can never partake of the undulating suavity of the female contour. Mr. Marshall, by the slightest reference to the torsos of Apollonius and Ceerops, to the Ilyssus, Theseus, &c., will perceive to be essential to grand class form. If the remainder of the group was not of excellence sufficient to demand still further labour in order to perfect the whole, we should pass it without even this remark.

1291. 'A Greek Warrior, illustrative of Caution and Resolution.' P. PARKS.—A sneaking coward of villanous form. Oh! what an effort it must require to imitate humanity so abominably. Horror-stricken with the affectation of this and some others not far distant, with what delight and pleasure we turn to the truly pensive angel, 1299, 'Part of a Group at the Entrance of a Family Vault.' R. WESTMACOTT, A.—Mr, Westmacott has succeeded admirably in combining classic correctness and form with the beautiful simplicity of action and drapery of the early English monumental figures. What will the whole work be when complete? Even one—

"That kings for such a tomb, would wish to die."

1273. 'Model, life size, of a Statue of Lord Viscount Nelson,' E. H. BAILY.—An attempt to hand down to posterity, under cover of a great artist's name, by an unfeeling committee, the imperfections of one of England's greatest heroes. Why is not Mr. Baily allowed a sculptor's licence? Why may he not use a grand cloak and massive drapery, instead of an abominably fashioned coat and coil of rope? Why not use his taste in selecting materials, and dealing with them as he pleases; instead of being compelled to treat us with a choice morceau from a marine store, in the shape of a rotten cable? How often will posterity wish that the whole committee had been hung with the prototype, ere they had decided so ridiculously. Why are Nelson's wrinkles to be perpetuated? Why a thousand such questions? But let any one compare this with 1989, a statue of Sir Astley Cooper by the same artist. Here (though the hero is making the most of his double chin) is given grand character, simple action, and accordant drapery; the whole is of a piece; perfect unity pervades the omneity; the effect noble and magnificent! Nelson is an insignificant, common-place, imperfect individual, which any one would suppose would directly sit down to pick the rope into oakum; though the artist has done his utmost, and no one that ever lived could have done more, under similar circumstances, than he has. These two works form a perfect lesson to artists, committees, and the public.

1396. 'Marble Bust of Allan Cunningham, Esq.,' by H. WEEKES. If anything was required to prove the old saying, "that a man thinking was one of the three noblest sights of nature," this bust would more than confirm it; its simple majesty and true dignity awe us; whilst a mouth formed for natural humour brings it to the level of our humanity.

1349. 'Bronze Frieze for a Mantelpiece, electrotyped,' subject 'Poetry and Painting,' Mr. L. WATSON, breathes the very spirit of FLAXMAN's later works. To this mode of multiplying the finest basso relievos, and applying them in such an useful manner, those interested in domestic decoration (and who is not?) ought to pay a particular attention.

1439. 'An ideal Head of Pythagoras,' Sketch—F. W. MILLER. The work of a mind deeply imbued with classic feeling. Mr Miller ought to have added quantity to quality, and made this head at least six times the size.

DRAWINGS AND MINIATURES.

709. 'The Man who built his House without a Foundation.'

720. 'The Man who built his House on a Rock,' G. JONES, R.A. The two groups of a mother and children require only to be taken out of these sketches, and having the drapery and parts elaborated, and then finally painted full size, to rank with the maternal groups of the Sistine ceiling.

623. 'Portrait of a Lady,' M. HOLDEN. Exquisite. We cannot sufficiently applaud the elegant taste and judgment which selected this transient moment of beautiful action from pure nature, and rendered this representation of it with such feeling, delicacy, and truth.

667. 'Portrait of Mrs. Wheeler,' G. RICHMOND. Something like a water-colour drawing, admirable colour and execution, though with somewhat of the very, very slightest possible tinge of affectation.

871 and others, Sir W. J. NEWTON. Perfect for character, expression and execution. We cannot say more, we would not say less.

917. 'Lady Carmichael,' R. THORBURN. One's heart throbs and longs for such a work, a beauteous vision that will haunt us through life. The one large mass of light rather too strongly contrasts the soothing repose of the back-ground. We beg to hint, had Mr. Thorburn thrown the lower part of the dress more in shadow, and added a little more light to the pink drapery, so as to form a secondary mass, and then carried the least bright trifle over on the other side, would not the effect of the whole have been improved?

MATRIMONY.—A professional gentleman, who has for some time past enrolled the category of his multitudinous graces, accomplishments and prosperts, in the portfolio of the "Matrimonial Alliance Establishment," fearing that, under the influence of Sir Peter Laurie's recent animadversion, they will waste their sweetness unseen—unknown in the rose-tinted volume of the modern Hymen, avails himself of the glorious opportunity afforded to advertisers by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, "and boldly and unhesitatingly submits his picture in little," to the approving smiles of the fair daughters (and widows) of Albion's isle; conscious of his perfect sincerity in stating, that he has no insurmountable objection to fortune being combined with beauty, taste, lively disposition, and cheerful temper: he feels assured that the lovely creature whose eye shall be fortunate enough first to meet this advertisement (and then the advertiser), will secure to herself a perfect amenity, if truth be truth, and manners, not money, make the man. Address with portrait (miniature set in gold, pearls, or other precious stones, not refused), to A. Donis Slim, Esq., 320, Strand.

CAPITAL SPEC! Safe as the Bank! Wanted a partner in a snug, genteel little concern, with an airy and pleasant corner situation, in one of the most densely crowded thoroughfares of the metropolis, and doing a good ready money business, without much risk; which an increase of capital would considerably extend. The returns exceed the outlay, and the Sunday custom alone covers the rent. The taxes are redeemed, and there is a long unexpired term of the lease, which is held at a lolly-pop. The coming-in to a half-share, including plant and stock, very moderate, say a trifle above £2000. Any person who can command the above sum, will not only find this a decided bargain, but a very desirable opportunity of commencing business, and well worthy the attention of an industrious person, of small means and less family. References exchanged. Address, prepaid to B.B. (Brandy Ball), Pieman's-alley.

MONEY MARKET.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

Money has become very tight on the Stock Exchange, and the prices of Consols are not quite so good as at the close of business yesterday, being 92¾ for Money, and 92¾ for the Account; Three per Cents. Reduced, 91¾; Three-and-a-Half per Cents. Reduced, 99⅝; New Three-and-a-Half per Cents., 100⅝; Bank Stock, 167½ 168; India Stock, 250½; India Bonds, 21; and Exchequer Bills, 39 42 prem.

Scarcely a bargain has been made either in Foreign Securities or Shares.

Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, 55¼; Grand Junction, 189; London and Birmingham Shares, 31⅛; and Eastern Counties, new, £5 1s. 8d.

Mexican Bonds are quoted at the advanced rate of 37¾ having been 37½.

IMPROVEMENTS IN PICCADILLY.—A memorial has been sent to the Lords of the Treasury from the inhabitants of Piccadilly, the object of which is to maintain a uniform width of street between Hyde-park Corner and Piccadilly, by taking in portions of the Green Park on the site of the late Green-park lodge.

THE BALL THAT KILLED NELSON.—The musket-ball that killed Nelson is now in the possession of the Rev. F. W. Baker, of Bathwick, near Bath. A considerable portion of the gold lace, pad, and silk cord of the epaulette, with a piece of coat, were found attached to it. The gold lace was as firmly fixed as if it had been inserted into the metal while in a state of fusion. The ball, together with the lace, &c., was mounted in crystal and silver, and presented by Captain Hardy to Sir William Beattie, the surgeon of the Victory.

CARLISLE—STATE OF TRADE.—We regret to say that the hand-loom weaving in this city continues in a most depressed state, and that the weavers have suffered a further reduction of their wages, although the previous cunnings of a vast proportion of them were scarcely sufficient to sustain life.

The subscription raised for the assistance of the sufferers at Hamburgh has been promptly met in the city, and is understood already to have reached about £5000, making, with the £2367 subscribed on Wednesday, by twenty-four individuals and two companies, upwards of £7000 collected in a day and a half.

LORD'S DAY SOCIETY.—The annual general meeting of this Society was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Tuesday, the Bishop of Chester in the chair. The Bishop of Peterborough, the Rev. W. Stowell, Major Buxton, and a great number of other gentlemen were on the platform. The Right Rev. Chairman having opened the proceedings, the Secretary read the Report, by which it appeared that in the manufacturing and mining districts the working classes were in a lamentable state of spiritual ignorance, from a neglect of Sabbath-day instruction. The chaplain of the Sussex House of Correction, in a letter to the magistrate, stated, that during the last three years he observed that, of 2616 prisoners, 1680 were ignorant of their letters, that only 111 could read, that 61 were ignorant of the leading doctrines of Christianity, that 344 had some idea of them, that 800 could not give any account of the history of Christ, and 1400 knew nothing beyond the name of Christ, which he attributed to neglect of the sabbath. There was, however, a general disposition evinced in favour of Sabbath-keeping. The proprietors of boats on the Weaver river, in Cheshire, had discontinued running their boats on Sundays, and had erected three churches along its banks. Government had also contributed towards its observance by the late Police Act, which limited the hours for opening spirit establishments on Sundays. It was ascertained that on the Sunday evening of the 5th of last August, there were 6000 in the White Conduit, Royal Standard, the Eagle, (City Road), and two other places of amusement. But the Middlesex magistrates had suppressed those resorts, confining them to the sale of drink. The report, after a most voluminous detail of the Society's operations against travelling by railways and working in mines, &c., on Sunday, stated, that the receipts of the past year were £618, and the disbursements £383.

LITERATURE.

ENGLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.—Parts I. to V. Lancashire and Cornwall. London: How and Parsons.

This will certainly be a very valuable book. It has a claim beyond most topographical words, as every detail presents the freshness of recent examination. Here is no appearance of an overdrawing from old books for common-place traditions and musty records: all has been written for and to the purpose. It gives a broad view of the peculiarities of each county, whether it be its romantic scenery, its manufactures, its historical associations, or its antiquarian remains; there is a sufficiency of local matter to please the resident, but which is yet so condensed and agreeably told that it will not fail to entertain all readers. The work comprises the utile with the dulce; even in its descriptions of the giant forges and factories of Lancashire, it is lively enough to interest the most unstatistical mind, and so far solid as to be useful to those who may make these matters their particular study.

Dr. Taylor's is a high name. He has previously aided the philanthropist by his reports of our manufacturing districts, without over-colouring the picture of disease, depravity, and misery which the march of machinery, stayed by a sunken trade, has engendered; and he thus slightly touches upon the state of the factory operatives in one of the numbers of the work before us:—

"The peasants of Lancashire were anciently celebrated for their skill and agility in athletic sports, and they still display the taste wherever they have an opportunity of exercising it. But there is no spot expressly set apart where the operatives can enjoy the old healthy sports of England, which would be so grateful after the monotony of the factory, and an antidote to the injurious effects produced by crowded lodgings and damp cellars. These cellars are necessarily chosen by the poor hand-loom weavers because a moist atmosphere is required for weaving cotton; but poverty often compels them to share these miserable abodes with others more wretched than themselves. No better proof can be given of the deficiency of lodging for the destitute poor of Manchester than the report of that excellent institution the Night Asylum. In the first year of its existence it afforded shelter to 1,106 men, 3,077 women, and 2,757 children; making a total of 17,406 cases of persons rescued from sleeping on the stones of the street

Although the description of the county of Lancashire must necessarily abound with accounts relative to machinery and steam, still there is not a deficiency of general interesting information, which moreover derives additional value from the excellent wood-cuts that are abundantly interspersed in illustration of it.

But Cornwall's romantic coast and fertile inland valleys must draw us awhile to dwell among their beauties. Rich in popular traditions, and bearing evidences in its language of words borrowed from an eastern source, and of a "remote intercourse with some of the more celebrated nations that now exist but in history," this county possesses a character peculiarly its own, the description given by Mr. Redding is in a lively anecdotal Train, clear, yet not verbose, now and then gossipping among interesting local legends, but never trivial in its details. We give the following as a specimen:—

"After Bottreaux church was erected, or more correctly Forrabury, for Bottreaux town, small as it is, belongs to two parishes, it was considered that no country church could be complete and orthodox without an harmonious peal of bells. Those of Tintagel were particularly musical, and within hearing when the wind blew towards Bottreaux; but this was not enough. The bells, which some said had tolled for King Arthur as he was borne a corpse from the field of blood near Camelford, to Tintagel, and again as he was borne away from his native castle to be interred at Glastonbury, were not the bells of Bottreaux, but altogether aliens to that place; so they determined to have as choice a peal as money could procure. The Lord de Bottreaux, who had vast possessions, was then residing in the castle, and subscribed largely towards the purchase for the benefit of his soul,—lords being, in those good old days, as careful of their souls as persons less loftily born. An order was sent to London for the bells, to a founder of great reputation. There they were made, and despatched by sea, having been prettyously blessed; it is presumed, from the sequel, by some most exemplary dignitary of the hierarchy. The peal, thus shipped, had a prosperous voyage, until the vessel came into the bay opposite Bottreaux, when Tintagel bells were "swinging slow with sullen roar," and the sound boomed along the waves to the ear of the pilot who was steering the ship at the time. The pilot was pleased with the sound of his native bells, and thanked God that evening he should be on shore.

"'Thank the ship, you fool,' said the captain, 'thank God upon shore.'

"'Nay,' said the pilot, 'we should thank God everywhere.'

"'Go to; thou art a fool, I tell thee,' said the captain; 'thank thyself, and a steady helm.'

"This strain was continued for some time; the captain jeered the pilot, and the pilot soberly maintained that it was the duty of all to thank God on sea or land, much more as the sea was a place of danger. The captain at last waxed choleric, and swore most sinful oaths and blasphemies, as sea-captains were wont to do in those times. The ship, in the mean while, was in sight of the tower that only lacked the bells to be complete. Arrival of Tintagel. The people were on the cliffs, and above all upon that named Willapark Point, overlooking the rocky gulph called the Black Pit, in expectation of soon receiving the precious freight. But the captain was not to go unpunished. The wind rose rapidly, and blew furiously from the west, nearer and nearer drove the vessel into the bay, and when not a mile from the church tower, which was full in view, a monstrous sea struck her, she gave a lurch to port, and went down, bells and all. The pilot, who could swim, was taken up by a fishing boatsman, who ventured to his assistance. The storm raged with tremendous fury, and the clang of the bells was distinctly heard, dull, as if muffled by the waves, through which the sound rose out of the ocean depths in solemn tollings at intervals, clearly distinguishable from the roar of the winds and waves. The sound continues still to be heard during the frequent tempests that assail that part of the coast, as it was heard at the hour when Bottreaux bells were engulphed beneath the ocean. The tower to this day has no bells, and more useful to the living is its silence, with the recollection of the cause, than the most harmonious chimes.

"The Rev. Mr. Hawker, of North Tamerton, has noticed this story in his verses, entitled 'The Silent Tower of Bottreaux.' We take the liberty of inserting a few stanzas.

"'The ship rode down, with courses free,
The daughter of a distant sea,
Her sheets were loose, her anchor stored,
The merry Bottreaux bells on board—
'Come to thy God in time!'
Rung out Tintagel's chime—
'Youth, manhood, old age, past,
Come to thy God at last!'

"'The Pilot heard his native bells
Ring on the breeze in fitful swells;
'Thank God!' with reverent brow he cried,
'We make the shore with evening's tide.'
'Come to thy God in time!'
It was his marriage chime;
Youth, manhood, old age, past,
His bell must ring at last!

"'Thank God, thou whining knave, on land,
But thank at sea the steersman's hand,'
The Captain's voice above the gale
'Thank the good ship and ready sail'
'Come to thy God in time!'
Sad grew the boding chime:
'Come to thy God at last!'
Boom'd heavy on the blast.

"'Uprose that sea, as if it heard
The mighty Master's signal word.
What thrills the Captain's whitening lip?
The death-groans of his sinking ship.
'Come to thy God in time!'
Swung deep the funeral chime—
'Grace! Mercy! Kindness past,
Come to thy God at last!'

"'Still when the storm of Bottreaux's waves
Is waking in his weedy caves,
Those bells, that sullen surges hide,
Peal their deep tones beneath the tide;—
"Come to thy God in time!"
Thus saith the ocean chime;
Storm, billow, whirlwind, past,
'Come to thy God at last!'"

The steel engravings given with each number of this work are from drawings by Mr. Creswick, and these we need not say are of the first character. His view of the Land's End in the last part is one of the most poetical conceptions that has ever proceeded from his pencil. It is as grand as Turner could have been, and by no means fantastic, as he might have been; it merely wanted the figure with the gun omitted, to increase its quiet and add to its desolateness. In conclusion, there is one advantage, and it is a great one, that this edition possesses above all other topographical works—it comes before the public in a cheap form, which none so complete in text and illustrations on steel and wood have ever presented before; and this, with its valuable contents, will certainly obtain for it an extensive circulation.

THE LADIES' COMPANION TO THE FLOWER GARDEN. By MRS. LOUDON.—W. Smith, Fleet-Street

This seems a very useful book. There is a sufficiency of scientific knowledge to aid those for whose use it has been compiled, and this without too many technical terms that might embarrass them. It aims to guide a lady in the management of a small garden; and the name of the authoress alone, would suffice to make us believe that her purpose is fully accomplished in the pages before us. At this period of the year, such a work must be greatly in demand.

EDWY. By J. BELL WORALL.—Houlston and Hughes, Strand.

An historical poem, treated in a religious vein. The subject is taken from an early period of British history, and relates to the cruelty practised by Dunstan towards Edwy's youthful wife Elgiva, and Edwy's sorrow at her death.

Mr. Boothby, barrister-at-law, is now in Nottingham, to conduct, it is said, Mr. Sturge's election. We suspect, from what we have heard, that he is amongst us for the purpose of "getting up a case" for Mr. Roebuck's committee. Mr. Sturge is to be in Nottingham next week. The electors will no doubt bear in mind that at the proper period their esteemed friend, Mr. Walter, will again be a candidate for their suffrages.—Nottinghams Journal.

LIVERPOOL.—TWO MEN DROWNED.—This afternoon, May 9th, about three o'clock, some boatmen standing on the north end of the Prince's Pier-head, observed, at some distance, a corpse floating down the river with the tide, and supposing it to be one of the unfortunate young men recently drowned, immediately put off for the purpose of picking it up: a large reward being offered for their recovery by the relatives. They had not proceeded far, when unfortunately, the day being stormy, a gust of wind upset the boat, and the men, four in number, were immediately immersed in the water. Assistance was rendered with all despatch from the shore, but before it could reach, two of the poor unfortunate fellows had met a watery grave: we are happy to add, the other two were saved.

STATE OF BURNLEY AND THE NEIGHBOURHOOD.—We regret to learn that the condition of the labouring population in the neighbourhood of Burnley is becoming daily more deplorable. Not only are the hand-loom weavers very inadequately employed and very wretchedly paid, but many of the factories have ceased working, and nearly the whole labouring population is in a state approaching destitution. In some of the country townships, too, where almost all the inhabitants are poor, it is difficult, and indeed impossible, to collect a sufficient amount of poor-rate to afford relief to the claimants upon the parochial funds; and it is greatly to be feared, that unless some assistance can be obtained from other quarters, the poor will be left without resource.

NOVEL INDICTMENT.—The Grand Jury having returned a true bill against Mr. John Jones, the churchwarden of the parish of Christchurch, Spitalfields, for having refused to call a vestry for the purpose of adopting Sir John Cam Hobhouse's Vestries Act, Mr. Prendergast applied to the court to order process to issue against the defendant; but the chairman refused the application on the ground that it was not likely the defendant would run away.

In the bankruptcy case of Seddon and Seddon, a proof against the separate estate of Mr. George for 10,500*l.* under the marriage settlement of his wife was admitted, and the bankrupts declared to have passed. The sale of their effects has been re-fixed for the 2nd of next month, as the day for which it formerly stood fell upon the "Derby-day."

The costumes at her Majesty's ball which excited the greatest admiration, and were pronounced to be decidedly the most recherchés, were those executed by the houses of Vouillon, and Fortier and Leviller, which we had the pleasure of inspecting. Among the costumes from the latter firm, those of Eleanor of Austria, Margaret of Valois, Queen Claude, and an Italian Marchesa of the fifteenth century, were of unparalleled magnificence.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.—At a meeting of the electors of Nottingham, held in the market-place of that town, on Tuesday, for the purpose of expressing an opinion as to the fitness of Mr. Joseph Sturge to represent them in Parliament, a resolution was adopted in favour of that gentleman, who was requested to allow himself to be put in nomination. The rumour that Feargus O'Connor would offer himself has been contradicted.

POVERTY.—It is not a poverty so much as pretence that harasses a ruined man—the struggle between a proud mind and an empty purse—the keeping up a hollow show that must soon come to an end. Have the courage to appear poor, and you disarm poverty of its sharpest sting.

Benvenuto Cellini's celebrated silver bell was bought for 240 guineas, by Mr. Forster, at Wednesday's sale, at Strawberry hill.

It is said that Sir George Woodford will shortly retire from the Governorship of Gibraltar, and Sir James Lyon is already named as likely to be his successor.

ANTIDOTE FOR THE SLAVE TRADE.

We submit to the amputation of a limb for the sake of life; we hang a man for the benefit of society; we remit punishment for the sake of truth, when evidence is furnished against accomplices. The appliances for obtaining and rendering justice must be coincident with its demands. When bad men conspire, good men must combine. For national crimes there must be national remedies. Those nations that dare the world's scorn deserve the world's execration, and when humanity bleeds it behoves the humane to act with energy. The slave-trade is now indelibly branded by civilised Europe as infamous in those nations that allow it, iniquitous towards man, and a wicked defiance of the Almighty.

There are no guilty deeds without guilty men. The hardened piratical crew of a slaver are not the only sinners, nor indeed the chief sinners. The breeders and owners of slaves; the builders, owners, and equippers of the slave-ships; the naval dealers in our race, the bargainers for blood upon the coast, the marketing buyers in America, Cuba, Brazil; the inhuman taskmasters in each exacting, not only sweat from the brow, but blood from the flesh. These are the beings that Europe execrates.

When the confirmed scoundrel and the young confederate are caught, and brought to prison, the older and reciting party receives the greater punishment.

The sailor in a slave-ship is not so criminal as the owner of the cargo and owner of the ship. Though working in such an iniquitous traffic, he is innocent when compared with his masters and the capitalists who employ him for their iniquitous gain. He seeks bread his employers gold, through the sacrifice of blood.

The sailors now employed in that trade feel that they are in a desperate course; many of them, if they could and had the inducement, would quit it to-morrow. The question is, can it be managed? Can the inducement be offered?

To the first question the answer is—every British port in the British colonies offers an asylum for any kidnapped African, and restores to him his natural freedom, and it may be hoped all over long, all other countries, not excepting those who still uphold slavery, will also become such asylums.

Can an inducement be offered for the crews of these slave-ships to carry the slaves into one of these ports, instead of taking them to countries where they would be bought and sold as slaves? If the different colonies can now subscribe to pay the passages for free immigrants, and of free negroes to the colonies, it would answer their purpose quite as well to subscribe to meet a reasonable gratuity to the crews of slavers, and accomplish thereby the noblest work—the freedom of the captives.

The cry from the colonies is for free combined labour, because the manumitted blacks work now mostly for their own account, and chiefly in occupations hitherto neglected. Free emigration cannot be resorted to in any sufficient degree from Europe to tropical climes, nor is it desirable; and spontaneous emigration from Africa is prevented by the convulsions in which that continent is kept through the slave-trade.

Now, if we combine a remedy for the honest demands and necessities of a drooping agriculture, and, at the same time, apply a final cure to the evils of Africa; and if the interest of humanity can be combined with those of the planters, not only of the West Indian, but the real and true interests of the very shareholders of Brazil and Cuba, whose existence is perilled by their own showing, by further importation of slaves, why should we hesitate to do it?

By these means self-interest would be made to act as a useful assistant in the cause of humanity. The greater risk for the owners of slave-trading vessels to lose their property by the turning of their crews against them, would deter them from embarking in such hazardous speculations, and the temptations of a pecuniary reward would act as a stimulus to these crews to bring their cargo to such ports, where they can rely upon a premium for so doing.

If such a device were acted upon, all tropical countries in want of African free labour, and all those sincerely desirous of doing away with the slave-trade, now a hundred times more cruel and destructive than in past centuries, would probably subscribe or vote an amount for so valuable an importation of labour secured by such means.

The countries wishing to protect themselves against any further importation of slaves would co-operate, and countless philanthropists all over the world will contribute their mites of contributions towards a fund to be employed in sufficient remunerations to said crews.

The vessels to be abandoned, or to be given up to the lawful (?) owners, in any manner consistent with the law which the funds of the subscribers will test.

Let, therefore, meetings of private individuals forthwith take place here and in the islands; let a purse be made up: and let the notices of premium be circulated on the coast of Africa, and among the sailors of Havannah and Brazil; and let an authorised individual or body, as the representatives of the subscribers to the fund, issue his or their engagement for the faithful performance of these terms on the surrender of the ship and landing of the passengers, and the slave-trade will surely cease.—Correspondent of the Sun.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

Ere yet her child has drawn its earliest breath,
A mother's love begins—it glows till death—
Lives before life—with death not dies—but seems
The very substance of immortal dreams.—WERRISCKE.

"I'll back out of this, if you please," as the crab said when the girl put him in the pot.

DISINTERESTED GRIEF.—Cooke, the tragedian, was in the habit of giving orders to a widow-lady who was once sitting in the pit with her little girl, when their friend the performer was about to be stabbed by his stage rival. Roused by the supposed imminence of his danger, the girl started up, exclaiming, "Oh! don't kill him, sir, don't kill him; for if you do, he won't give us any more pit orders!" Her disinterested grief, like the gratitude of some people, was a lively sense of benefits to come.

At the anniversary dinner of the Royal Free Hospital, given on Wednesday at the London Tavern, the report stated that, during the year 1843, no less than 7500 individuals had been relieved. The Duke of Cambridge was in the chair, who presented to Dr. Marsden a tribute of respect, in the name of the hospital, consisting of a rich and classically designed piece of plate. The subscriptions for the day amounted to 1898*l.*

In course of proceedings in the House of Commons on Wednesday evening, Mr. T. Duncombe wished to obtain an explanation from Mr. Roebuck as to the "reptile" who drew up the National Petition, but the Speaker would not allow the hon. member to ask the question.

By a return just presented to Parliament, on real property, we perceive that the annual value of an acre of land in Middlesex, where the people are most crowded, is 1*l.* 14*s.*; Leicester, follows, 1*l.* 7*s.*; then Somerset, 1*l.* 6*s.*; Worcester, 1*l.* 6*s.*; Lancaster, 1*l.* 5*s.*; Warwick, 1*l.* 5*s.*; while the value of an acre of land in Sussex is 13*s.*; in Devon, 10*s.*; and in Suffolk, 19*s.*

CARMYLLIE.

A FORFARSHIRE SCULPTOR.—We were lately favoured with the sight of a group of four figures, cut out from the rough rock of Carmyllie quarries, which, considering the materials which had to be worked up, the entire want of any scientific knowledge or experience of the art of sculptor on the part of the young man who executed them, and the coarseness of the tools used, are well calculated to create feelings of surprise and admiration. Wonderful as the first exhibitions of Thom, Forrest, and other untutored geniuses have proved, and however much worthy of praise, we venture to affirm that nothing has ever been produced by any sculptor of the day under similar disadvantages, which, in chasteness, taste, and an exquisite perception of the natural, in form and figure, can compete with the group we allude to. The artist is a most unassuming young man, of the name of James Christie, son of Mr David Christie, Muirhead of Carmyllie, a place about seven miles distant from Arbroath. He belongs to the humble but industrious class of society, was bred a weaver, and has occasionally been employed in working in the Carmyllie quarries. The only time he ever happened to see anything in the shape of sculpture, previous to his commencing this, his first work, was during a visit to Dundee, in which town there then happened to be some travelling exhibition of that kind. Whatever its merits might have been, it appears to have awakened in the mind of Christie a desire to try his hand; and, assuredly, if ever first effort evinced promise of future excellence, it is that to which we refer. The group, as we have said, consists of four separate figures. The most prominent is that of a piper "in full blow." A stout stalwart wight he is, and the consequential, serious air with which he "sets his drones in order,"—for pipers are invariably consequential, and often serious too, though the cause of mirth in others—the pursed-up, inimitable screw of lips, as the pipe is applied to them, the windy instrument itself, the broad blue bonnet, and the matchless corduroys, coats, and shoes of the musician, actually leave us nothing to desire. Near him stands, or rather dances, an old woman—an old woman worth her weight in gold. She is evidently completely overcome by the merry strains of the rude instrument, which is able to "discourse most eloquent music." With an utter forgetfulness of what is due to her age (for she must be past her sixtieth), she has evidently taken to the floor with a determination to shake her foot if she should die for it. With a might disregard for the lecture which the evangelical nonintrusion minister of her parish, she is aware, has in store for her, she actually kicks up one of her feet behind, in her ecstatic joyousness, showing, during this feat, a somewhat greater display of understanding and ankle than the usages of civilised society usually permit, except in the case of opera girls. It must be admitted that the old crone is somewhat scandalised at her own conduct, as there is an inimitable smile, or rather simper, upon her face, discovering her three only remaining teeth, which says, "Well, I'm sure I ought to be ashamed of myself." The coiffure and entire dress of the old lady is in excellent keeping. It is indeed above criticism. The two other figures are a young man and woman. The former appears to have thrown aside all the cares of this world, and is seen executing a jig with a degree of vehemence and determination truly edifying, while the buxom damsel, "a supple jade she is, and strang," stands quietly looking at the merry group, evidently smiling at the old exhibition made by "auld aunty," but not without affording evidence of an ill-suppressed longing to foot it with the others. The costumes of both, but more particularly that of the young woman, is admirably executed, and the drapery of her frock or gown, for we must plead ignorance as to the differences, is worthy of the chisel of a Chantrey. We doubt not that our present notice will rouse the curiosity of amateurs. We feel perfectly confident that, if the young man Christie is patronised, and encouraged, he will not only be an honour to the county, but to Scotland.

The Marquis of Northampton gave his first soirée, as President of the Royal Society, on Saturday evening, at his mansion in Piccadilly. About 400 of the most distinguished members of the Society were present, and many foreigners of rank and distinction, together with Mr Washington Irving, and Mr. Samuel Rogers, the poet.

DUBLIN, MONDAY, MAY 9.—The accounts from the country prove that it becomes more disturbed. Tipperary is the scene of frequent outrages. A Rockite notice was posted in the county Carlow on the 25th last month, near Broomville, which contained a threat to shoot Alexander John Humfrey, Esq., the respected clerk of the peace of this county, and a man in his employment, named Nicholas Young, for their interference in the lands of Creans, the property of Mrs. Carroll, the sister of Lord Chief Justice Doherty.

THE USED-UP LAWYER.—While a number of lawyers were dining at Wiscasset, Maine, a few years since, a jolly soul from the Emerald Isle appeared and called for a dinner. The landlord told him he should dine when the gentlemen were done. "Let him crowd in among us," whispered a limb of the law, "and we will have some fun with him." The Irishman took his seat at the table. "You were not born in this country, my friend?" "No, sir, I was born in Ireland." "Is your father living?" "No, sir, he is dead." "What is your occupation?" "A horse jockey, sir." "What was your father's occupation?" "Trading horses, sir." "Did your father cheat any one while here?" "He did cheat many, sir." "Where do you suppose he went to?" "To Heaven, sir." "And what do you suppose he is doing there?" "Trading, sir?" "Has he cheated any one there?" "He has cheated one, I believe." "Why did they not prosecute him?" "Because they searched the whole kingdom of heaven and could not find a lawyer!"

TIT-FOR-TAT.—The citizens of Lincoln have been much amused during the past week, by a joke said to have been played upon a medical gentleman of Lincoln, by a blunt, independent son of St. Crispin. Of late years a practice has crept in amongst the surgeons, of sending in the total of their bills, instead of, as formerly, a bill of particulars. They now run in this fashion:—

Mr. Muggins.

Dr. to Esculapius Sawbones.

and family, during 1844. ..... 12 10 6

"Umph!" says Mr. Muggins. "Guess this won't do. I'm not to be done out of my entertaining light reading in this kind of way, Mr. Sawbones, I can tell you. Am I to be debarred the pleasure, when I'm laid up with the gout, of perusing a legitimate bill of particulars, of casting up the number of boluses swallowed and the bottles emptied in 1844; of endeavouring to recall the precise flavour of the crimson mixture taken night and morning in January, and of the brimstone-coloured two-table spoonsful every three hours in March. This is the way, in this age of tyranny and corruption, we are daily robbed of our constitutional privileges, and all I stand in may every member of the Whistlecorats point at me the finger of scorn, and no mistake." Mr. Muggins at first thought of demanding a bill of particulars, but at length the following scheme came into the head of this champion of light literature. Esculapius Sawbones, Esq., had patronised Mr. Muggins during the year, and accordingly soon sat Muggins and wrote as follows:—

Esculapius Sawbones, Esq.

Dr. to Timothy Muggins.

To booting yourself and shoeing wife, and mend- £ s. d.
ing Miss Lucretia, and piecing family, during 1844. ..... 7 3 6

This bill (of course the names are fictitious) Mr. Muggins has sent to the medical man, declaring that what is "sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander."

SHEEP FARMING IN AUSTRALIA.

We have before us a letter from a young man, a native of the West Highlands, settled in Australia. It is dated 22nd September, 1841, and relates chiefly to the pastoral interests of the colony. Lambing was to commence early in October, and the writer expected to have about two thousand lambs. The sheep did not stand the winter well, and he had crossed the flocks with rams betwixt the improved Leicester and the Merino. For some years back there had been extensive losses among the sheep, from a complaint called the catarrh, which, on some farms had carried off half of the flocks, and few escaped. At the close of the letter sheep were low in price, about 3*s.* or 4*s.* overhead: and one lot of 3000 had been sold at 4*s.* 6*d.* "With the ravages of the catarrh," says our countryman, "the sheep proved worthless wages, and the effect of a number of failures, the sheep declined in value, but they will rise again." Another Highland emigrant had purchased a small herd of cattle, and taken a station for them, at the same time engaging himself to keep the cattle of another settler, for which he received 5*s.* each. In this way, by being industrious and useful, some of our country people, on getting out, may find full employment with a small capital, and taking sheep on credit, when they were selling at 2*s.* and 3*s.* each, and being afterwards obliged to sell them at a sacrifice, when their bills fell due. The extensive sheep-owners are occasionally very successful, as 2,000 are attended with little more expense than 1000, and better stations can be obtained in large lots. The new settlers must go to Port Philip district, and even there penetrate into the interior, to obtain settlements. There seems also to be a great uncertainty as to prices. "A flock of wethers," says the writer, "may be taken to market, and fetch only 3*s.* next week they may be up to 14*s.* and 16*s.*, the latter being a high price." On the whole, this emigrant considers that sheep-farmers in the Highlands, at a moderate rent, can do equally well, if not better, than those in Australia. The poor emigrants are now ill off; situations are not easily obtained; and scores of young men, who landed in high hopes, may be seen perambulating the streets of Sydney in quest of places. Men with young sons or relations, striplings, do best; and the writer instances the case of a man and two boys, who received £70 per annum, and their rations; the father watching the flocks at night, and the boys acting as shepherds. The graziers now depend wholly upon free labour, the system of assignments being done away with Inverness Courier.

KENT COUNTY MEETING.—A requisition to the High Sheriff is now in course of signature for a county meeting. We are thoroughly convinced that there never was a time in which the prosperity of Kent was in greater danger. It would seem as if this county had indeed been singled out by the Minister for a visitation of an especially destructive character, which any extensive and abrupt reduction in the hop duty cannot fail to prove; and it would also appear that the nature of the alteration is studiously concealed, in order that the planters may be taken by surprise and robbed—we cannot use a milder term for such unparalleled and unstatesmanlike treachery—robbed of their property without an opportunity of offering any effectual remonstrance or opposition, by being kept in the dark respecting the case they have to meet.—Maidstone Gazette.

The total number of emigrants who have embarked at London derry during this season is 4,314. Of these, 1,815 left for the United States, and 2,329 for British America. The vessels employed in this conveyance were eighteen. The effects of the temperance reformation among all the parties have been most remarkable.

ARABIAN METAPHOR.—The Arab chiefs having been much feted in Paris, one of them has given expression to his gratitude in a very florid address to Louis Philippe, of which the following is a literal translation:—"ON PARIS.—To Louis Philippe, Sultan of the French. Paris with the river which traverses it is admirable; but its Sultan, by his generosity and his justice is still more admirable. Its inhabitants have a surprising aptitude for the sciences; but the skill in war and in the arts is still more surprising. Their politeness towards their guests is, by Allah! of an extreme cordiality. Married women, young and old, all vie with each other. Their gardens flows more abundantly than their river, and is sweeter than its waters. O marvellous! When the sun from its height on the heavens beholds the beauties of Paris, he is abashed and covers himself with clouds as with a veil. From time to time he comes forth to view the brightness of their countenances: he steals from them a share of their brilliancy and then hides himself again. The author of these verses is known by the name of Schady. Constantina is his dwelling-place. He solicits indulgence."

CHEAP TRAVELLING.—The competition between the Forth and Clyde Canal Company and the Edinburgh Railway is so strong, that the canal company are carrying passengers from Glasgow to Edinburgh, with profit, at less than a farthing a mile! So much for the benefits of opposition to the public, when the opposing parties are in earnest. Since the reduction of fares by the canal company, about a year ago, the increase of passengers nearly exceeds belief, being 235 per cent. increase upon the day through passenger trade, and 209 per cent. by the night boats. The last half-yearly report of the company, from which we glean these results, further states that all this has been accomplished "at an extra expense not exceeding £30. This great increase of passengers has again been exceeded by the returns for the last month, and we have little doubt that the canal company will find that they never did anything more for the benefit of the proprietors than the reduction they have made in the fares.

"A SHAVE."—The following anecdote, illustrative of the craft and shrewdness of that class of men employed in public works and usually called "navigators," many of whom we have had lately among us, may be depended upon for fact:—A "navey," some six feet three inches in height, and of herculean build, went into the shop of one of our shopkeepers, and asked if they had got any "whirlers"—which is a corruption of wheeler—that is, stockings without feet. "No," quoth the shopkeeper; "but we have got some famous big and strong stockings, as will just suit such a man as you." "Let us have a look at 'em," rejoined the "navey." The counter was quickly covered with a quantity. Our Hercules, selecting out the largest pair, said, "What's the price o' them?" "4*s.* 9*d.*" was the rejoinder. "Can you cut feet on 'em?" was the next query. "O, certainly," was the answer. "Then do," was the laconic command. No sooner said than done, the shears were applied, and instantly the stockings were footless. "And what's the price on 'em now?" quoth our friend of the pick-axe and spade, with all the composure imaginable. "Price on 'em now," re-echoed the man of broadcloth, surprised beyond all measure at the absurdity (as he thought) of the question; "Why, 4*s.* 9*d.* to be sure." "Four shillings and ninepence," quoth the navey, "I ne'er get more than 1*s.* 6*d.* (putting the latter sum on the counter) for a pair o' whirlers I' my life." "Well," replied our tradesman, chopfallen and fairly outwitted, throwing the mutilations at him—"take them and be off with you; you've 'whirled' me this time, but I'll take care that neither you nor any of the roguish gang do it again as long as I live."—Worcester Guardian.

DISCOVERY OF A BAND OF MURDERERS AT NUREMBURG.

In December last the limbs of a body, supposed to be that of a rich widow named Bayer, who had disappeared from her habitation, were found in the streets of Nuremburg. The police made the greatest efforts to discover the circumstances which had brought the unfortunate deceased to her frightful end. They could only succeed, however, in discovering the most vague information; and the public had begun to think that the crime must remain unpunished, for two other persons had been assassinated in a mysterious manner without the criminals ever having been detected.

The police still kept a close watch upon a young woman who had been in the habit of working for one of the murdered persons, and at length they succeeded in procuring some very important testimony, and they proceeded to arrest a woman named Romstatt who, however, denied all knowledge of the matter, and indeed nothing was found at her residence of a suspicious nature. But a search at the house of her daughter, who lived not far from Pegnitz, was attended with different results, for in a drain they found the intestines of a human being, and shortly afterwards the confession of the mother led to the discovery of the head of Madame Bayer in the drain of the Hotel de Ville. All the part that the woman Romstatt acknowledged to have in the transaction was that of taking the portions of the body to different parts of the city; but she pointed out certain persons as the assassins, who were immediately apprehended and imprisoned; and proofs were soon established of the existence of a band of murderers, who had doubtless committed the murders we have alluded to, and probably many others which have never come to light.

As soon as these circumstances became known, the irritable character of the citizens of Nuremburg became greatly incensed against the authors of these diabolical outrages; and it became necessary that the police should take extraordinary measures to prevent the populace from inflicting summary justice upon the criminals on their way to prison.

It appears from the latter details of this horrible affair, that the woman Romstatt has stated that Madame Bayer was murdered on St. Thomas's Day, a winter fete which annually brings thousands of strangers to Nuremburg. She says, that the assassins having contrived to entice her into a secluded house, seven of them immediately fell upon her with razors and poniards, and that having killed her, they proceeded to cut up the body, Romstatt being employed to get rid of the remains by disposing of them in the drains or sewers in the different and distant parts of the city. With regard to the fate of one of the murdered persons, a book-keeper, for whom she had worked as a daily servant or laundress, she pretends utter ignorance. She was, however, heard to say, that a woman named Bezold, who was found in bed with her throat cut, had been murdered by a barber, who formed one of the gang, and who has been apprehended.

Nuremburg being situated on the great European route, and being consequently the constant rendezvous of foreigners, it is supposed that the band of demons had imagined that their devilish practices would be less likely to be detected from the fact that foreigners would not be readily missed.

Method of Introducing Bills into the House of Commons.—The occasional visitor of the house cannot but be struck with the art and mystery of law-making, as developed in what is called the "preliminary business." When I entered the House on the 11th of March, I found Sir H. Douglas, whom I saw admitted a member on the Corn-law night, now in the centre of the throng of legislation. He stood at the bar with a pile of papers at his right hand, on a little table, of which there is one at each side as one passes through what is called the bar to the body of the House. "Sir Howard Douglas," shouted the Speaker from the chair. "A bill, Sir," answered Sir Howard. "Please to bring it up," exclaimed the Speaker. Up walks Sir Howard, and places the bill in the hands of the clerk of the House, returning again himself as quickly as possible to his former station at the bar. Mumble, mumble, went the clerk, making believe to read the title, or a part of the title, of the bill; but no one, I suppose, could tell what he said. All the time the buzz of private talk was going on in the House, the Speaker's voice predominating in such words as these:—"That this bill be read a first time;" buzz, buzz—"say, aye; contrary opinion, say no. The ayes have it," buzz, buzz. "Sir Howard Douglas," again shouts the Speaker. "A bill, Sir," again answers Sir Howard. And so the whole ceremony was gone through three times, and I was made aware that three bills (private bills, no doubt) had passed through two of their stages; but though I had the honour of "assisting," as the French say, at their first and second reading, I most truly aver that I know no more of the purport of the said bills, than I do of the Pope's opinions concerning the number of tumblers of whiskey punch which it is lawful for a man to drink on St. Patrick's day, when it happens to fall upon a Friday in Lent.—Dublin University Magazine.

IMPORTANT TO RAILWAY TRAVELLERS.

UNIFORMITY OF CLOCKS THROUGHOUT GREAT BRITAIN.

Now that railway-travelling has become so universal in the kingdom, doing so much to annihilate space, the question of time became a matter of considerable importance, and he had long been of opinion that some plan must be adopted to prevent the errors and inconvenience of every town in the kingdom setting its clock to a meridian of its own, different to every other place out of the same longitude. To show the extent of the evil to which he adverted, it would perhaps be sufficient for him to state, that there was a difference of 25 min. 28 sec. between the times at Dover and Falmouth; that is to say, when it was noon at Falmouth, it was 25 min. 28 sec. past noon at Dover. There was nearly a minute difference in time between the east and west of London, and about a quarter of a minute difference between the east and west of Birmingham. The railroad directors have endeavoured to remedy this defect, by keeping London time at all their stations; but there was this great inconvenience attending it, that all persons who resided west of London, were in great danger of being too late for the trains. On all the time-tables of the Great Western Railway, an endeavour was made to remedy this difficulty, by printing the correction for longitude. It occurred to him a year or two ago, that it would be a very excellent plan if government would recommend the adoption of one uniform time throughout the kingdom; and he was happy to find that his friend Mr. Dent, had turned his attention to the same subject, and he quite agreed with him that they ought to adopt one meridian as a universal standard, and call it "British time." Happening to mention this subject to his friend, Mr. Rowland Hill, as a matter of some importance in connexion with the post-office department, he informed him that he had received a letter from Captain Basil Hall in 1840, on this very point; and as it embodied all that he (Mr. Osler) could say respecting it, he would, with the permission of the audience, read the letter to them. [The lecturer here read the letter of Captain Basil Hall]. The idea of the adoption of a general standard for time throughout Great Britain originated with the late Dr. Wollaston, who suggested that all the post-office clocks throughout the different counties, should be kept at London time, a measure which he considered might be very easily accomplished, and which would greatly simplify all those arrangements of the post-office in which time was included as an element. He proposed to regulate all the post-office clocks in the kingdom, by means of the time brought from London daily by the mail-coach chronometers; and he had no doubt that, ere long, all the town clocks, and, eventually, all the clocks and watches of private persons, would fall into the same course of regulation; so that only one expression of time would prevail over the country, and every clock and watch indicate by its hands the same hour and minute at the same moment of absolute time.—From Mr. Osler's Lecture at the Birmingham Philosophical Institution.

To the Conscientious Voter.—You are an elector. To you is intrusted the privilege of choosing the lawgivers. It is a trust for the good of others; and upon the right or wrong exercise of this trust depends the happiness or misery of millions of your poorer fellow-creatures. At the next parliamentary election, you will be entitled to choose between a bread-taxer—one who withholds corn from the people—and a candidate who will untax the poor man's loaf. The choice involves an awful responsibility. Think, solemnly and carefully, before you decide. Examine the evidence carefully and deliberately. Ignorance cannot be pleaded. Remember that you decide for plenty or scarcity, comfort or misery, health or disease, life or death, to many thousands of immortal beings. Remember, above all, that your decision will be recorded on high, and that you will be called to account for your vote at that dread tribunal when all mankind will be judged—not by their professions, not by their prayers—but when the blessed will be told, "I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat."—From the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League.

Tenacity of Scotch Iron.—A very excellent proof of the great tenacity of Scotch-made bar-iron has, this week, been exhibited in the Abercorn foundry. The iron under operation was the produce of Mr. Dixon's works, Glasgow, and formed the tire of a railway wheel. In turning this wheel, Messrs. Barr and M'Nab took off a ribbon of iron about a quarter of an inch broad, and about the thickness of thin pasteboard, which measured in length 67 feet. This was its length in the spiral form. If stretched to its full length, it would measure about 300 feet.

No matter how poor I am (says Dr. Channing), no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling, if the sacred writers will come in and take up their abode with me; if Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise, and Shakspeare to open to me the worlds of imagination and the workings of the human heart, and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom, I shall not pine for intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man, though excluded from what is called "the best society" of the place where I reside.

The following anecdote is given by the Echo de la Frontiere as having been lately related by a witty bishop, during his visit to Valenciennes:—"One day a bishop was travelling with his theologal (everybody is not aware what this word means: a theologal is a sort of coadjutor to the bishop, who accompanies him everywhere)—the bishop was reciting his psalms in one corner of the carriage, his companion was asleep in the other, when they arrived at the bureau of customs. The postilion pulled up, and a representative of the public treasury, clad in green, opened the carriage door, and inquired 'if he had anything to declare.' 'Why, I don't know,' said the bishop, 'I have nothing with me but a theologal.'—'Perfectly right, sir; I will only detain you one minute.' And away went the functionary to his chef. 'There's a traveller below who declares a theologal—what duty am I to demand?' 'Look at the tariff.' The man in green examined the tariff, but could find nothing to enlighten him. 'It is an untariffed object, sir,' said he to his chef. 'I had better claim the fixed duty.' Assent being given, he proceeded to the carriage, and said to the bishop, 'Two francs for your theologal.' The money was paid, and the journey resumed. Some time after the sleeper awoke, and inquired where they were. 'A quarter of a league beyond the line of customs, and you owe me two francs.' 'And why so, pray?' 'It appears it is the duty on a theologal. You could not be permitted to pass for less, and I preferred paying to awaking you; so pay me my two francs. You can afterwards, you know, appeal against the tariff.' The money was paid, but the theologal is still pursuing his inquiries, to ascertain on what ground he has been treated as a smuggled article."

The Wall of London.—Mr. W. D. Saull, F.S.A., and G.S., at the recent meeting of the Antiquarian Society, communicated an account of his observations upon the foundations of the Roman Wall of London, recently developed at several points, and especially on the site of the French church, in Bull-and Mouth-street, Aldersgate. It is ascertained that there was a gate in the Roman period in the same spot, which was afterwards called Aldersgate. The wall may thence be traced at intervals to Cripplegate churchyard, where a bastion still remains. A minute description was given by Mr. Saull of the materials of this celebrated and very ancient wall, which remains little altered by time under the surface of the soil. It is composed of layers of small rough flints, rough Kentish ragstone (the green sandstone of the geologists), pieces of ferruginous sandstone irregularly interspersed, two courses of bricks, another layer of ragstone, a double course of tiles, and another of ragstone. It is nine feet six inches in width at the base, and two feet wide at the top; and the total existing height is ten feet seven inches.

The Human Frame.—The number of hinge and other joints in the human frame is nearly one hundred and fifty, and we see the wisdom of the great Creator displayed in the structure and connexion of the bones. What if the joint of the knee could move in every direction like that of the shoulder? Do you not see that when we walked, the legs would have dangled about strangely, instead of moving backwards and forwards in one direction only? And is it not plain that we never could have stood firmly on the ground? In like manner, how very inconvenient it would have been to have our finger-joints to move one way as well as another! On the contrary, how confined and cramped would have been the motion of the arm, if the shoulder had been like the knee, and had only permitted the arm to swing backwards and forwards, without our being able to carry it outward from the body! The builders of machines have sometimes made joints in their machinery very much like the shoulder joint; but it is doubtful whether they ever could have contrived such if they had not first looked at the bones of a man, or some other animal; for other animals have these various sorts of joints adapted to their peculiar wants, as well as man.

Husband's Liabilities for his Wife's Debts.—The doctrine reported to have been laid down by Lord Eldon, that in the case of a husband living apart from his wife, and allowing her a separate maintenance, a notice of such allowance to tradesmen is necessary to free the husband from liability, has been recently overruled by Baron Alderson, in the Court of Exchequer. The decision of Lord Eldon, which is reported in 3 Esp. 350 (Rawlings v. Vandyke), has been frequently called into question, and the learned Baron, in alluding to it in the case recently argued, doubted the correctness of the reporter: for he said that when a wife living apart from her husband was supplied with sufficient funds to support herself with everything proper, she was no longer the agent to pledge his credit, and there was consequently no necessity of any notice to a creditor.

Impure Air.—Dr. Reid, in his lectures on chemistry, mentions the following simple and satisfactory experiment for the discovery of impure air:—A spoonful of lime should be injected into a beer-bottle with water, and being placed where suspicion is attached to the quality of the atmosphere, the presence of impurity would be tested by the appearance on the surface of a white and copious incrustation. This is the best practical test at present known.

THIRD REPRINT.

OUR PRINCIPLES.

Having got over the ceremonies of introduction, and received from the public a welcome warmer and wider than we could have anticipated, even in the buoyant enthusiasm of our first ambition, we will now take the higher privilege of seeking to make more familiar acquaintance with our readers, by indicating to them an outline of the course of conduct by which we hope eventually to ripen that acquaintance into strong and lasting friendship. Doubtless the first aim of a public writer should be to direct opinion into the channel of truth to work out the honest purposes of justice with unflinching courage and fearless energy of heart—to make his pen the interpreter of that noblest eloquence which has virtue for its oracle and honour for its priest—to put the glory of unsullied patriotism above all propositions of expediency and every consideration of gain—to despise party utterly as a faction, and only to recognise it at all when its worth is vindicated by its principles and its errors are palliated by deeds of good result; in a word—to make common cause only with what contributes fairly to national happiness and promotes the country's good; and when setting out in such a spirit to achieve such an end, to take that motto which invokes one of the proudest attributes of manhood, when it says—

"Thy spirit, INDEPENDENCE, let me share,
Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye."

It is our belief in the purity and efficacy of this doctrine that will animate us in the outset, to adopt its tone and principle in the general application of our discussions to passing events. We proclaim independence as the propelling power of our engine; and as we have already declared that we will not be trammelled by political partialities for any set of men, so will we not be withheld from the dissection of any order of measures however pungent their advocacy or plausible their aspect, so long as we find in them one particle of justice that can be violated, or one atom of the people's happiness at stake.

It is in this spirit, therefore, that we intend generally to devote this portion of our paper to the interesting and multifarious workings of our social system as it is approached by fresh legislation—as it has been acted upon by past influences as it is presented in its vital actuality, by the daily progress of affairs. In doing this, we shall be less deeply political than earnestly domestic. Our business will not be with the strife of party, but with what attacks or insures the home-life of the empire; with the household gods of the English people, and, above all, of the English poor; with the comforts, the enjoyments, the affections, and the liberties, that form the links of that beautiful chain, which should be fastened at one end to the cottage, at the other to the palace, and be electric with the happiness that is carried into both!

It will thus be seen, that in the course of the career that we propose to ourselves, three essential elements of discussion with us will be, the Poor Laws, the Factory Laws, and the working of the Mining System in those districts of our soil which nature has caverned with her treasures and cruelty disfigures with its crime. The recent horrible disclosures that have been made upon the last subject will be dragged by us into a broader and brighter daylight—and the mark, and brand, and impress of their atrocity rendered more hideous and inhuman under the burning gaze of national indignation and the loathing of the public disgust. There is no sin so shameless but it may be brought to shudder in the sun—there is no wrong so strong in its deformity but it may be withered by the people's breath; and borrowing, under this belief, something of Cobbett's homely bluntness of purpose and expression, we proclaim at once that "these minings shall be undermined." With regard to the factories, we adopt the doctrine of one who "went a good man to his grave"—of that pure, benevolent, fine-hearted philanthropist, Michael Thomas Sadler, whose great spirit yearned towards the weak and cowering, and battled with the wealthy and the oppressor—who fought his way towards justice at the head of a phalanx of little children, whom he armed with no other weapons than their wrongs. We are no friends to innovation—we rush at no wholesale changes and reforms—but, to avert the miseries of the factory system, we will work with heart and pen—and lend all our power to aid Lord Ashley in adorning himself with the mantle which the genius of Sadler left behind him, to be won honourably and worn with grace.

The Poor Laws will be attacked by us only in their clauses of cruelty and of wrong—only when they starve rather than relieve—only when they intrench upon the domestic affections, make poverty a crime, and pour their bitter punishments upon suffering rather than upon sin.

We abstain, upon either of the subjects we have named, from selecting any single theme for an immediate article—we are rather indicating a purpose, and laying out the ground for future exertion; and in so doing, we hope that we have already imbued our readers with the impression that our great aim and intent is—irrespective of all party, and in defiance of all opposition—to achieve, in its purest and most civilizing spirit, the true championship of humanity.

Thus, in keeping our eye upon the action of daily life, we shall most narrowly watch the administration of justice. The decisions of our magistrates, we at once declare shall be branded if they be not just; and the power of "brief authority" shall infringe upon no social liberty of our fellow-subjects, without the rod of castigation being fearlessly applied by us "to him who does the wrong." Coroners' inquests, and civil and criminal trials, will command no small share of our attention; and whenever society is shocked and degraded by, crimes so vast in magnitude and so deep in dye as those we have recently seen committed and condemned, we will seek to infuse a healthier tone of morality into the popular mind upon the subject of such dismal atrocities—to diminish the wild and dreadful excitement which at such moments agitate the public frame, and to cleanse that bad and brutal spirit which is fond of revelling in execration, and makes a holiday spectacle of the crisis that sends the murderer before his God.

In a word, we will promote to our utmost the purity of public life; and if some sneer at our purpose as Quixotic, we have at least the consolation of knowing that it is good. Moreover, we will carry it out in letter and spirit, vindicating it no less in one quarter than another—asserting its principle alike among those who make, and those who are protected by, the laws carrying its battery against bribery in the political, as against corruption in the social, atmosphere—and upholding it before mankind as the banner which wears on one side the sign of private worth, and on the other the symbol of public virtue.

TAKING THE VEIL.

This solemn and most interesting ceremony was recently performed at the church of the convent of "the most Holy Trinity, at Bermondsey;" and as it is now of rare occurrence in the vicinity of the metropolis, the following brief detail connected with the event will doubtless be interesting to our readers.

The convent of the Holy Trinity was erected by subscription, and opened for the reception of the sisterhood of "the Order of our blessed Lady of Mercy," in the month of November 1839, under the direction of the venerable superioress, a lady named Moore, conventually known as Sister Mary Clare. At the present time there are fifteen members of the community residing within the walls, and it is understood that sufficient funds have been raised to secure its perpetuity.

The objects to which these ladies devote themselves, in addition to those services of religion peculiar to their faith, are, the education of poor girls, the visitation and comfort of the sick and afflicted, and the protection of distressed females of good reputation. Upon application for admission to the order, the devotees are strictly examined by the bishop and the mother superior. If admitted, they continue on probation for six months, employing their time as may be directed. The period of their novitiate usually embraces two entire years, but, in extraordinary cases, the bishop can limit it to twelve months. The annual pension for this period is £30, and upon profession, a sum sufficient to produce that amount yearly is required to be funded. One of the principal benefactresses of the order is the Lady Barbara Eyre, daughter of the Earl of Newburgh, and now a sister of the convent. The whole of the present inmates are ladies of fortune, as may be assumed from the amount required to be funded, and among them is a niece of Sir Andrew Agnew. Nearly 200 poor children are educated and partially clothed by the establishment. Upon the occasion we have illustrated, the ceremony was for the initiation of two young ladies, one of whom was to receive the white veil, having completed the probationary term and entering her novitiate, the other, receiving the religious habit of the community, her novitiate having expired.

Before eleven o'clock, the hour appointed for the ceremony, the chapel attached to the convent was filled by a numerous congregation, the major part of whom consisted of ladies. As soon as the clock struck eleven, the convent bell began to toll, which was the announcement of the entry of the procession into the chapel. The Vicar Apostolic, the Right Rev. Dr. Griffiths, Bishop of Olena, in his pontifical robes, then advanced to the altar, attended by the Rev. Messrs. F. Butler, Horrabin, Foley, Sisk, Bowman, Coyle, Lee, and Hearnsip, and Father Lazarien, an Armenian priest, with other of the clergy in their rich vestments, the choristers, incense-bearers, and officers taking their proper stations. The hymn to the Virgin, "O Gloriosa!" was then commenced, and the procession of the nuns entered the chapel in the following order:—First, a cross-bearer—next, the postulants—after them, the novices—then the professed, each bearing a lighted taper—and lastly, the superioress, holding the postulants by the hand.

The novitiates, Miss Baxter and Miss Kellett, were both elegantly dressed in white embroidered muslin, wearing chaplets of white roses as the head-dress. Each held a lighted wax taper in her right hand. Upon arrival at the grate of the convent, they made a genuflection before the Holy Sacrament, and the nuns having taken their stations, the superioress and her assistant retired to their places, the postulants remaining on their knees. After the customary benedictions, each novice was led to the foot of the altar, and an exhortation was delivered by the bishop from the 19th chapter of St. Matthew, 29th verse, "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life." After the exhortation, the bishop severally interrogated the postulants as follows:

Bishop—My child, what do you demand? Postulant—The mercy of God, and the Holy Habit of Religion. Bishop—Is it with your own free will you demand the Holy Habit of Religion? Postulant—Yes, my lord. Bishop—Rev. Mother, have you made the necessary inquiries, and are you satisfied? Superioress—Yes, my lord. Bishop—My child, have you a firm intention to persevere in religion to the end of your life? and do you hope to have sufficient strength to carry constantly the sweet yoke of our Lord Jesus Christ, solely for the love and fear of God? Postulant—Relying on the mercy of God, I hope to be able to do so.

The bishop then rising from his chair said, "What God has commenced in you, may he perfect." The postulant then arose, making a reverence, and retired with the superioress and her assistant, to put off the secular dress and assume the full habit of the order. Upon her return, the hymn "Veni Creator" was sung by the choir; and the novices, now kneeling at the grate, were severally interrogated by the bishop, thus:—"My child, what do you demand? Novice—My lord, I most humbly beg to be received to the holy profession. Bishop—My child, do you consider yourself sufficiently instructed in what regards the vows of religion, and the rules and constitutions of this institue; and do you know the obligations you contract by the holy profession? Novice—Yes, my lord, with the grace of God. Bishop—May God grant you perseverance in this your holy resolution, and may he deign, in his mercy, to consummate what he has begun." A solemn mass was then said, after which an assistant took the candle from each novice, at the same time giving her the act of profession. Upon her reciving this the bishop approached the novice, and held the Host before her eyes whilst she pronounced her vow. Having signed the act of profession, each received the Sacrament. The bishop then attired himself in a cope and mitre, and advancing to the grate, commenced the antiphon "Veni Sancti." During this, the newly-professed sister, kneeling before the superioress, presented to her the act of profession. The superioress then placed a ring on her finger, upon which she rose, and retired to her place near the grate, when kneeling, the white veil was withdrawn and the black one placed over her head by the bishop, who pronounced the blessing. The taper was then again taken from the newly-professed, who immediately prostrated themselves before the altar, the religious kneeling, while "Te Deum" was sung by the choir, and the closing prayers of the service recited by the bishop, who sprinkled the professed with holy water. The sisters were then assisted to rise, and conducted to the superioress, who embraced them, the choir chanting the psalm "Ecce quam Bonum," which being ended, the whole of the sisterhood retired from the chapel in the order in which they entered, and the gate of the convent was closed upon them. It was a most solemn and affecting spectacle; but during the delivery of a very affecting discourse by the bishop, on their retirement from the world, the novitiates showed no signs of agitation, nor did their countenances betray any symptoms of reluctance; but, on the contrary, appeared to be lighted up by a beautiful expression of enthusiastic devotion.

The immense good which these ladies are effecting is little known, their beneficent acts not being paraded before the public. To form any idea of the extent of their charitable exertions in behalf of suffering humanity, we must follow them to the abodes of poverty and wretchedness, the scene of their labours, and from which the natural timidity of their sex would instinctively shrink, were they not possessed of more than manly fortitude and a pious determination of purpose. The "Sister of Mercy," may be hourly seen pursuing, with calm and unostentatious demeanour, her heavenly occupation amidst the vilest haunts of vice, wretchedness, and disease, conveying the consolations of religion to the afflicted souls of the outcast and abandoned of her species. To use the words of a late lamented poet,

> "Unbreaking where Pestilence scatters his breath,
> The an angel she moves 'midst the vapours of death

On Tuesday afternoon, about half-past two o'clock, a woman named Dodds, living in the neighbourhood of Ratcliff-highway, in a fit of despair, and heated by inebriety, threw herself over the swing bridge in Old Gravel lane, Wapping. She was sinking for the third time, and in an almost lifeless state, when an intrepid Scotch seaman, named Archibald Macdonald, belonging to the Robert, of London, jumped from the ship's side, and after many efforts succeeded in rescuing her. So pleased were the spectators with the manly and gallant conduct of Macdonald, that a subscription was made for his benefit.

KILMARNOCK.—The different wards of our town were again canvassed on Wednesday se'nnight, in order to ascertain accurately the amount of real destitution among us, when, after a strict and impartial scrutiny on the part of those engaged in it, the number of unemployed, including dependants, &c., was found to amount to 1105. The committee of council for assisting and finding work for the unemployed continues its labours, meeting and carefully sifting cases every night, with the view of giving immediate employment where it ought to be given. The applications have been pretty numerous. Collections have just been made in all the churches for this most legitimate purpose. Altogether there would be upwards of £100 collected at the church doors, and this independently of the money subscription going on for a similar purpose.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY, MAY 20.

Their lordships met at five o'clock.—A message from the Commons brought up several private bills.

FACTORIES' BILL.

Lord REDESDALE presented a petition from a place in Kent in favour of a Ten Hours Factory Bill

EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

Lord LORTON presented petitions from places in Ireland, complaining of the present system of national education in Ireland, and in favour of the Church Education Society.

THE QUARTER SESSIONS' BILL.

The Earl of FORTESCUE presented a petition against certain clauses in a bill which had been sent up from the other House for amending the acts relating to quarter sessions.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY moved that the report of the ecclesiastical commissioners of Ireland for the year 1841 be laid on the table. Ordered.—The House then adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.

One of the clerks of committees brought to the bar the minutes of evidence taken in the Newcastle election committee, which were laid on the table

FLINTSHIRE ELECTION.

Sir EDWARD HAYES appeared at the bar with the report of the committe appointed to try the merits of the petition against the return of the Hon. Mr. Mostyn, to the effect that that gentleman was not duly elected, and that Sir R. Glynn was entitled to the seat for that borough.

NEW PROJECTILE.

In reply to a question from Major VIVIAN Sir R. PEEL said that he had been a witness of the experiment made by Captain Warner of his newly-invented projectile upon a small piece of water; and he (Sir R. Peel) admitted that that experiment, as far as it went, had been completely successful. An offer had been made to Captain Warner for the purchase of his invention for the Government, but as he had refused to accede to certain conditions which had been submitted to him, the communications on the subject had been interrupted, and the purchase had not been made.

CHURCH RATES.

Sir JOHN EASTHOPE gave notice, that on Thursday, the 16th of June, he should move for leave to bring in a bill for the abolition of church-rates

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON gave notice, that on Thursday, the 9th of June, he should move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent persons in England and Wales from losing their votes at an election by removal after the preceding registration

BRIDPORT ELECTION.

Mr R. COCHRANE expressed a hope, that on Thursday the motion relative to the Bridport election might be brought on at an early hour, and that the subject would not be again deferred till another day.—Mr. MITCHELL said, that if upon inquiry he should find that hon. members who had notices of motions for Thursday next would not give way, he should feel it his duty to bring forward the subject of the Bridport election on Tuesday next, and to make his own statement on the subject.

SUPPLY.

The House then went into committee of Supply upon the Ordnance and Navy Estimates, and the necessary supplies were voted

COLONIAL PASSENGERS' BILL.

Lord STANLEY having moved the order of the day for the further consideration of the report on this bill, Mr. HAWES expressed a hope that a measure of so much importance would not be pressed in a house so thinly attended.—Lord STANLEY objected to any further postponement; and, after a few words from Mr S O'BRIEN and Mr. HAWES in explanation, the report was re-considered, and agreed to with some amendments. The bill was ordered to be read a third time on Friday next.

PENTONVILLE PRISON BILL.

Sir J. GRAHAM, in moving the third reading of this bill, remarked, that the prison was now completed, and that her Majesty's Government thought it desirable to bring it into operation on the first of July next. It would be necessary, in the miscellaneous estimates to move a vote providing for the payment of the salaries of the officers attached to the establishment; and as he understood the hon. member for Bath (Mr. Roebuck) wished to express some opinion on the separate system, he would suggest that it would be more convenient if any discussion on that point were taken on that occasion rather than at present.—Mr. ROEBUCK said, that, as far as he was concerned, he could see no objection to the right hon baronet's proposal. He certainly wished to express some opinions which he entertained on secondary punishments generally, and as an opportunity for that purpose would be afforded, he should offer no impediment to making progress with the bill.—The bill was then read a third time and passed. The Australia and New Zealand Bill was read a third time and passed The Ecclesiastical Corporations Leasing (No. 2) Bill went through committee, and the report was ordered to be received on Friday week.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS

Mr. ROEBUCK moved the first reading of a bill then lying on the table of the House, which had been sent down from the House of Lords, entitled "An Act for further Inquiry into Bribery at Elections of Members to serve in Parliament;" and the hon. and learned member said, that, in moving the first reading of the bill, he would also take the opportunity of saying, that he should not have that one string to his bow alone, but should still go on with his own bill, though he believed that all his purposes would be attained by this bill, with the addition of one or two words.—The bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday next. The other orders of the day were then disposed of.

NEW POOR LAW.

Mr. P BORTHWICK wished to know on what day the right hon. gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department would proceed with the consideration of the New Poor Law?—Sir J. GRAHAM said, that that measure stood for Monday next, but it could not come on upon that day. He would, however, then mention on what day he would proceed with it.—The House then adjourned until Monday

SOCIETY OF GUARDIANS FOR THE PROTECTION OF TRADE.—A numerous party of the subscribers and their friends dined at the King's Head Tavern, Poultry, last week. The president of the society, Mr. Alderman Farebrother, was in the chair, and presided with his wonted good humour and ability. The worthy chairman entered at some length into a statement of the advantages of the society, not only to its members, but to the interests of merchants and traders generally, and spoke with high estimation of the energy and ability of the secretary, Mr. Edward Frederick Leeks. It appeared also, from the statements of Mr. Deputy Frisby, Mr. Binyon, Mr. Brewster, and other gentlemen of the committee, that the society was increasing in numbers to a considerable extent, not only in London, but in the provinces also; and that its advantages were never more needed than at the present time, when thousands of fictitous firms in London alone required the warning and exposure effected by this society's system of mutual intercommunication.

FALMOUTH.—A meeting of the liberal electors of the united borough of Penryn and Falmouth took place on Friday evening se'nnight, when it was unanimously determined to tender the suffrages of the reformers to Captain Plumridge again, should the arrangements relative to his late discomfiture allow of his presenting himself at present to the constituency, or to sit in the House of Commons as the representative of this borough.

A journeyman locksmith escaped from the late railway accident unhurt, but his mind was so affected by the shock, that since his return to the workshop his reason has departed, and he has not uttered a single word. He works on continually, doing as much in one day as he formerly did in several.—Galignani's Messenger.

BRISTOL.—ST. MARY REDCLIFF CHURCH.—A meeting of the Architectural Society was lately held, at which several parishioners of St. Mary Redcliff attended to take into consideration the improvements now going on in that parish, and the best measures to be adopted for the restoration of Redcliff church—S. S. Wayte, Esq., in the chair. A memorial to the council was adopted, praying that the first four houses on the south side of Phippen-street may be thrown back the several distances of twelve, seven, three, and two feet, so as to form what is called a trumpet-entrance. The society also recommended the adoption of plans for the improvement of the exterior of the church, for restoring the eastern window and Lady-chapel, and for the construction of pews to accommodate a much larger congregation than the edifice will at present contain.

YORK.—On Tuesday afternoon week, the Lady Mayoress entertained a large party to tea at the Mansion-house, in honour of the Wesleyan Missionary Anniversary. We understand that cards of invitation were sent to the principal members of the Wesleyan Society, and that all the ministers were present.

BATH.—On Saturday last a man, apparently about 32 years of age, respectably dressed, and carrying with him a roll of parchment, supposed to be some deeds concerning a marriage settlement, applied at the Three Cups inn, for a private room, stating that he wanted to "do some writing." He continued in the occupation of the room till between 9 and 10 o'clock P.M., on Monday night, when he left the inn, saying that he had business with a party at the White Hart. The man, however, not returning by half-past eleven o'clock, suspicion was excited, and it was discovered that an oval silver tea-pot, worth 7*l.*, a pair of silver sugar-tongs, and one plain silver spoon, bearing the initials "R. J. L.," had been stolen from the room. The rascal has not since been heard of.

CHATSWORTH.—Extensive ornamental improvements have been long in progress in the interior of this splendid mansion, and are now completed preparatory to the expected arrival of the Duke of Devonshire from Italy. The rooms have been recently lined with the new painted leather, superbly relieved in different colours, intermixed with a profusion of gold (a fashionable style of decoration now in vogue in Paris). On the first glimpse, the exterior presents a magnificent appearance, from the window sashes and frames being gilt on the outside—at once a presage of the wealth and splendour of its noble proprietor. The conservatories and grounds are no less objects of eager curiosity. The principal one is the largest in the kingdom, being 360 feet long, 70 feet wide, and 70 feet in height. Its arrangement is somewhat similar to that of a church, having a middle and two side aisles. The centre is arched with a waggon-headed ceiling much more lofty than the sides, all of glass, and here the splendid palms are gradually extending their graceful limbs, and will, it is expected, in course of time, reach the top. The water-pipes used in warming this conservatory extend in their ramifications to the enormous extent of seven miles. The fountains are unrivalled. The jet d'eau of the principal one is projected to the incredible height of 80 feet, the supply being derived from the neighbouring mountains, which form so noble a back ground to the scenery of this princely domain. The Lion Fountain, so called from the finely-sculptured lions, is after the style of those at Versailles. At the request of visitors this fountain is set in full play, and the water, passing through the lions' mouths, dashes downwards, to form a series of broad table-falls, which have a very elegant and brilliant effect. We must not omit to mention that in the grounds there is a curious device to entrap the unwary, consisting of a copper tree, which, being without foliage, presents a withered appearance. A cock being turned, a hundred streams are suddenly jetted from its branches, and the unlucky wight upon whom this joke is practised is baptized in a manner to cause considerable merriment.

THE TRUCK SYSTEM.—The select committee appointed to inquire into the frauds committed upon the working-classes by this oppressive system met last Wednesday, and elected Lord Ashley to be their chairman. They adjourned until Wednesday, the 25th inst., on which day they will commence their labours, by instituing an inquiry into its extent and effects, as practised in Bradford, Yorkshire, and the surrounding district. —Times.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY.—The first annual meeting of this society, which originated from a meeting of chemists and druggists, held last spring, to oppose the Medical Reform Bill of Mr. Hawes, M.P., was held on Tuesday at the Crown and Anchor tavern, Strand, when the chair was taken by W. Allen, Esq. F.R.S., president of the society. The council announced in their report, that in an interview with Sir James Graham they had received the assurance that no measure should be introduced into Parliament affecting chemists and druggists, without due notice being given to the president. The total receipts were 5165*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, whilst the expenditure was 1147*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*, leaving a balance of 3017*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*, of which 3000*l.* stock had been purchased, whilst 1026*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* remained in the hands of the treasurer. There had this year been received subscriptions from 14 life members, 982 members, and 976 associates. The society had received 775*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* per Cent. Consols, transferred to it from the Druggists' Association in 1815, and there remained a further sum of 96*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* to be transferred. The library, museum, and evening meetings, were progressing in a satisfactory manner.

THEATRICALS IN THE UNITED STATES.

(From the New York Papers.)

The summer season not having fairly opened yet anywhere, we have little to tell relating to theatricals, other than to chronicle the whereabouts of the actors.

The Seguin troupe appear likely to succeed at the Park for a few weeks. They had a good house the first night, a poor one the second, and a tolerably good one the third night. They are a singular instance of an operatic company being successful without having one really great singer among them. Seguin is the best. They are all capital musicians, but none of them have a first-rate voice. Mrs. Seguin is a beautiful musician, very correct, and very cold; but her voice is thin, and in its upper notes wiry and harsh. Still the whole of them combined caused the opera of "Norma" to be received with considerable applause.

Mrs. Sutton and Nagel are giving concerts with great eclat at Mobile, where Browne has taken his last benefit before coming north. Barton and Mrs. Richardson, and Bill Chapman, are also there.

Fanny Elssler had not left Havana at the last accounts. She was drawing good houses at the Tacon, which she has again taken on her own account.

Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam have left New Orleans, on their road to the north. The Italian troupe have not succeeded well there.

Forrest is in Boston playing a round of tragedy. Clara Fisher is also there, with a company containing Miss Lee, the dancer; she is making money. A new drama called "Harry Lorrequer," has been got out there. "Love" is also there.

Miss Turnbull, Madame Stephan, and Sylvain have reached New Orleans, from Cuba, where they were only tolerably successful.

A. Adams, Wemyss, and Harrison are playing in Baltimore with Mrs. Lewis.

Burton had a good benefit at the Chesnut-street Theatre, Philadelphia, the other day. He brought out "Bubbles of the Day," which was highly applauded. None of the theatres are doing much in Philadelphia.

Butler, the tragedian, the pretty Miss Reynolds, Lambert Thayer, and Mrs. Lewis, are playing in Washington.

Jim Crow Rice has just closed a fine engagement in Boston.

Chippendale, Billy Williams, Mrs. Knight, &c., are all at the Park, where they are great favourites.

Thorne at the Chatham, and Mitchell at the Olympic, are doing a first-rate business.

The Bowery is going down, Miss Cushman's is going up, and Niblo will open rich shortly.

Braham is at Philadelphia, on his way to the west.

The following are the most celebrated promenades of the chief nations of Europe and Asia:—the Bois de Boulogne in France; the Garden of the Dead at Constantinople; the Gardens at Kensington; the Prater in the suburbs of Vienna, situated on one of the islands of the Danube; the Wood of the Falcons at Moscow; and the Prado in Spain.

Jullien and Koenig are indefatigable in their exertions; an entire new selection of beautiful quadrilles and waltzes have been put in rehearsal to be performed at Lady Howard's, the Countess of Dowis's, Lady Clay's, and Mrs. Stadholme Brownrigg's balls, for which occasions their excellent orchestra is retained. Koenig, in addition to his charming performances on the cornet-a-pistons, is also an expert violin player, which instrument he now generally takes up in the waltzes, and infuses a spirit in the Deutschere quite a la Strauss.

At the last meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society, held on Saturday, it was stated by Sir George Staunton, Bart., that a magnetic observatory had recently been erected and furnished by the Chinese at Pekin, on the same principles as those recently constructed by the British Government at different parts of the world according to the recommendations of the Royal Society. This is one amongst many other instances of the probable results that may be anticipated from throwing open an intercourse with this large, and in many respects intellectual country. Captain Blackwood, R.N., of her Majesty's ship Fly, 18 guns, who is about to depart in command of an expedition to Torres Straits and New Guinea, was formally introduced to the Society.

The Council of the National Anti-Corn Law League, as appears from their report, has contemplated the means, not only of expressing, but of extending, the principles of its members. The plan announced is to map out England and Wales into twelve districts, in each of which a lecturer will be stationed, for the purpose of promoting free-trade principles by oral instruction, the dissemination of tracts, and the enrolment of members of the League. A legal and efficient organization may thus be obtained; but the exercise of a sound discretion will be requisite in the selection of agents.

The Chandos Testimonial.—The grand Buckinghamshire festival was held on Wednesday, at Aylesbury, by the farmers of that county and other friends connected with agriculture, for the purpose of presenting to his Grace the Duke of Buckingham a piece of plate, as a testimonial of their admiration of his public principles, and a tribute of respect and gratitude for his services whilst Marquis of Chandos, as one of the representatives of his native county. The costly and exquisitely executed record of respect and gratitude weighs 1800 ounces, is four feet six inches in height, and is valued at £2000: it was on Tuesday afternoon conveyed from Messrs. Green and Ward's, the silversmiths, of Cockspur-street, to the George Inn, Aylesbury, where it was exhibited on Wednesday morning, in an ante-room, to a large number of the inhabitants of the town and the surrounding districts. The dinner took place at the George Inn, but there being no room within the house sufficiently large to accommodate the guests, a temporary banqueting hall was erected in the area capable of accommodating six hundred persons, the number for which the committee had issued tickets, although having applications for a hundred more. His Grace, who had been anxiously looked for by the crowds who filled the town, arrived by special train at three o'clock, and was escorted from the terminus to the hotel by a numerous body of the gentry of the county, and was, during his progress, loudly cheered by the crowd.

Chimney Sweepers.—Agreeably to the will of the late Captain South, the anniversary dinner to upwards of 100 apprenticed sweeps in the cities of London and Westminster, took place at the Yorkshire Stingo on Monday. The boys in their appearance looked cleanly, and behaved with perfect decorum. In addition to the new shilling obtained from the Mint expressly for the occasion, a Testament, through the able management of Mr. Cromin, the master or churchwarden, was given to each boy. After dinner, "God Save the Queen" was sung by a few professionals, and the boys then dispersed highly gratified by the kindness evinced towards them by the gentlemen present. Previous to the dinner a sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Short, rector, in the parish church of St George-the-Martyr, Queen-square.

New Fire-escape.—A public exhibition of this important, but simple invention, was made on Monday afternoon, from 172, Fleet-street, of a new fire-escape. The exhibition proved most satisfactory, men and boys descending from the top of the house into the street, by means of the apparatus, with the greatest ease, safety, and despatch. The experiment was evidently so safe and pleasant, that amateurs volunteered, though the height from which they descended was frightful to contemplate. The idea is most simple, and may be described as follows:—Let a strong rope be fastened by its middle to any fixture in the uppermost part of a house, and let the two depending lines be connected together by a strong belt moving upon swivels, and the party wishing to effect his escape has only to throw out of the window the two extremities of the cord, which are laid hold of by any two parties in the street — they shall stand apart, occasioning an angle—and the party has only to buckle round him the belt and throw himself from the window, and he descends in perfect safety. The gravity of weight of the man descending is counteracted by the fact that this belt must draw together two persons standing wide apart, and who are possessed of great leverage. The idea is most simple, and what it is most essential not to omit mention of is, that a man can be hoisted up with as much facility as he can be made to descend.

Extraordinary Attachment.—Captain Beaver, of the Niagara militia, was possessed of a duck so much attached to him, that the poor bird actually plucked and roasted herself for his dinner, having previously eaten a quantity of sage and onions.

Chudleigh.—A coin, about the size of a ducat of gold, with a strong alloy of copper and silver, was discovered here much corroded, in a lime-ash floor. Similar coins have been found near Dartmoor. On the one side, in a circle and triangle, are a globe and cross, with the inscription around—"Gottes geben man soll lob." On the reverse are three crowns, intermingled with three fleur-de-lis, and around are the letters "Hanns Krac Wickelin (o. Winckelin) R. V."

Caution to Equestrians.—On Monday morning a gentleman on horseback, having occasion to alight at the residence of a friend in Gloucester place, left his horse in the care of a boy who had followed him some distance. On leaving the house the gentlemen could not find either boy or horse, and after walking about the spot for upwards of half an hour, and making numerous inquiries after his missing steed, he ascertained that a boy had been thrown from a horse in the Newroad, and had been taken in a senseless state to the hospital. On further inquiry he succeeded in finding his horse at a livery-stables in the neighbourhood of St. John's Wood, with a dislocated shoulder and both the animal's knees severely cut. The boy, it appears, had ridden the horse along the New-road, when, either from fright or mismanagement, the animal had thrown its rider and then galloped off furiously, till, in attempting to pass between two carriages, it came in contact with the wheel of one of them, and was thrown down. The boy has received several severe injuries, and the horse, a valuable blood mare, is entirely spoiled by the accident.

Northampton.—Contracts have been issued by the Government for 60,000 pairs of army shoes, and 8000 convict ditto. Of these no less than 30,000 have been contracted for in this town. The contractors are Messrs. Groom, 10,000; Bryan, 10,000; and Gee, 10,000. The remainder are dispersed over Raunds, Daventry, Wellingborough, and Kettering. The order will be of great service to the older, inferior, and most distressed class of workmen.—Mercury.

Will of the late Duke of Cleveland, K.G.—The will of the late Harry Duke of Cleveland has been just proved in the Prerogative Court, by the executors, Henry Lord Brougham and Vaux, Thomas Metcalfe and G. B. Wharton, Esqrs. The personal property has been sworn under £1,000,000, upon which a stamp duty of £13,000 had been paid. The property has been bequeathed principally to his family, consisting of the present duke, Lords William Powlett and Harry Vane; Ladies Sara Merick (who is abroad), Arabella Darden, and Augusta Milbanke, with the exception of some legacies and annuities to his servants. Lord Brougham and his executors are bequeathed £1500 each. The late duke's personal estate is the largest left by any peer of his elevated rank since the late Duke of Sutherland, whose personal effects were sworn as amounting to more than £1,000,000: all sums beyond which amount are not subject to probate duty. The dowager duchess is handsomely provided for under the late duke's will.

Right of Property in Wind.—Water-mills were at one time, particularly on the Continent, included among the regalia or rights of the crown; and on the introduction of windmills, this assumed right was extended over air as well as water. A whimsical instance of the attempted exercise of this privilege is on record. It seems that the Augustine monks belonging to the monastery at Windsheim, in the province of Overyssel, having desirous of erecting a windmill in the neighbourhood; but the lord of the soil opposed their project, on the extraordinary assumption that the wind in that district belonged to him. Upon this the monks applied to the Bishop of Utrecht, who decided, in a towering passion, that no one had power over the wind in his diocese but himself. And thereupon he immediately granted letters patent to the good monks.—Guide to Trade.

International Copyright.—The subjoined remarks on this subject are extracted from a speech by Mr. Cornelius Mathews, at the dinner given to Mr. Dickens, in New York, on the 19th of February: "The conflict between a paid literature and an unpaid is a fierce one while it lasts; it cannot last long. The one relies on the feeble and uncertain impulses of authorship; the other is driven on by all the restless interests of trade. What is the present condition of the field of letters in America? It is in a state of desperate anarchy — without order, without system, without certainty. A new work reaches this country, well worthy of being printed by some prominent house, furnished to the libraries, and put in the hands of a liberal circle of readers, in due course of trade. This would be proper and natural. On the contrary, twenty, yea, fifty, or a hundred hands are thrust forth, spasmodically to clutch the first landed copy: it is followed, watched to its destination; violent hands are, perhaps, laid on it to snatch it from its first possessor: it is reprinted; early copies are despatched into the country; new editions follow, in pamphlet, in book, by chapters in a thousand newspapers; the land is vocal with the unrestrained chuckle of the daily and weekly press over this new acquisition; while no other writer, whatever his merit, if his popularity be but a degree less, is listened to. What hope is there here for the native author? As an American I feel this, and I avow it."

Puseyism.—The Bishop of Worcester has issued a letter to the Rural Dean of Birmingham, in which he forbids the public use of the term "Puseyite" as applicable to those entertaining tractarian opinions.

At the meeting of the Home Missionary Society, held on Tuesday in Exeter-hall, it appeared from the report that the society had 147 agents, who preach in nearly 600 towns, villages, and hamlets, and that no less than 10,000 children are instructed in their schools. Their expenditure has this year exceeded their income above £2000, but a legacy of £5000 has, by the favourable issue of a law-suit, been placed at their disposal.

On Tuesday afternoon, between two and three o'clock, three dashingly-dressed young men, apparently foreigners, entered the shop of Mrs. Parker, jeweller, Edward-street, Portman-square, and requested to look at some silver candlesticks; two or three pairs were placed before them, but they made some objection to the patterns, and they then expressed a wish to see some brooches. They examined a number of them, but made no purchase, and soon after their departure it was discovered that one of the brooches, set round with diamonds, and worth £120, had been stolen. One of the shopmen, on receiving intimation of the robbery, followed the party, but unfortunately did not succeed in capturing either of them.

Naval and Military Bible Society.—The annual meeting of this society was held on Tuesday at the Hanover-square Rooms, the Marquis of Cholmondely in the chair. The meeting was well attended. On the platform we noticed General Ord, Admiral Hawker, Major Anderson, the Rev. J. Cumming, and several other ministers of the church. The object of the society is to distribute the Bible, either gratuitously or at a very much reduced price, amongst soldiers and sailors. The report presented a statement of the last year's finances, whereby it was announced that the income of the society for the past twelve months had been £2809 15s., whilst the expenditure had been £2818 11s., and that the balance, including the surplus of the preceding year, now in the hands of the treasurer, was £22 10s. 7d. The report further stated, that there was a sum of £477 8s., due for books which had been supplied to her Majesty's troops, but that there was at the same time the amount of £292 5s. 10d. owing to the Queen's printers for the purchase of books. A series of resolutions in furtherance of the objects of the society were unanimously agreed to.

The Creole Negroes.—The New York Express contains the following letter from New Providence, furnishing the intelligence that the negroes of the Creole had been formally set at liberty:—"Nassau, New Providence, April 16, 1842.—A special session of the Admiralty Court convened this day to hear the charge of piracy against the seventeen negroes imprisoned from the Creole. The Attorney-General made his motion for delay of trial, on the ground that it was impossible to obtain the necessary evidence here, and offered for the perusal of the court a number of affidavits of the captain, mate, and crew and passengers of the Creole, showing that sufficient evidence could be procured from the United States, if time was allowed. After an examination of the testimony offered, the court replied that were the captain, crew, and passengers, as set forth in the affidavits, here present to testify in this case, they should consider them as not entitled to belief or credit, and should charge the jury to that effect; and that no evidence could be procured to convict the prisoners at the bar, for they were perfectly justified in the course pursued on board the Creole, and were now about to be set free. The Chief Justice then addressed the negroes something in this style—"It has pleased God to set you free from the bonds of slavery; may you hereafter live the lives of good and faithful subjects of her Majesty's government." They were then set at liberty by proclamation.

On Whit Monday, an open air meeting of the Chartists of Southampton took place in the Marsh. The object appeared to be to vote a memorial to the Queen, to request her Majesty to discharge her present Ministers, to dissolve the Parliament, and to choose Ministers who would adopt the Charter. The speakers did not think that the memorial would be of any service, but they were anxious to try every fair and legal means to carry the Charter before they resorted to other measures. The speakers declared that the Chartists are determined to resist the payment of the Income Tax. A person named Knowles delivered a speech on what he called the first principles of government. He advocated the immediate destruction of the hereditary portion of the Constitution; declared that most of the present members of the House of Commons were more fit for the plough-tail than for senators; and denounced the payment of the interest of the National Debt.

British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance.—The annual meeting of the above Society was held at Exeter-hall on Wednesday. Earl Stanhope in the chair. On the platform were a great number of gentlemen, amongst whom were the Bishop of Norwich, J. S. Buckingham, Esq., Dr. Oxley, Rev. C. Stovel, and several delegates from America, &c. The report, which was very lengthy, was read by Mr. Green, the secretary: it stated that the society greatly had increased in numbers during the past year, both in the metropolis and the country. A number of excellent speeches in behalf of the Society were delivered by the Bishop of Norwich, Mr. Buckingham, and other gentlemen, one of whom, named Peck, narrated the following interesting incident:—"In the month of June 1837, a woman named Wright, a very dissolute character, whilst drinking at the bar of a gin-shop in Drury-lane, offered to sell her child, a little boy, about two years old, which she then held in her arms, for a quartern of gin. A man named Myers, who is a waterman, then and now residing in Feathers-court, Drury-lane, took the wretched mother at her word, paid for the gin, and received the child from her arms. Since that period up to the present time, Myers, who is a very industrious man, although he has at times experienced great privations, has wholly maintained the child, to whom he is greatly attached; he has taught the child christened in the names of its mother and himself. Since the day the purchase and exchange were made the unnatural mother had never expressed any solicitude about it, and had latterly been lost sight of altogether." Mr. Peck stated that he had made efforts to get the boy into the Blue Coat School, but without success. The thanks of the meeting were voted to the noble chairman, and it separated.

The anniversary festival of the Philanthropic Society was celebrated on Wednesday evening, at the London Tavern. The Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer presided, in the absence of his Grace the Duke of Richmond, who was prevented from taking the chair by the recent death of his mother, the Duchess Dowager. There were about 150 gentlemen present; and, though the attendance was much smaller than was anticipated, there have been but few anniversary dinners at which a more sympathetic interest in favour of the objects of the particular charity appeared to pervade the company, or where the appeal to the liberality of the assembly met with a more ready or abundant answer. It was stated in the report read by the secretary that during the past year, no fewer than 118 criminal boys had been admitted, and 65 boys and 71 girls, who were the children of convicted parents; but it was also stated, that the Society was not enabled to carry out, from want of funds—though those funds were on the increase—the objects it had in view to the full extent which its directors could desire. The subscriptions amounted, during the evening, to little short of £2000.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The French papers are totally devoid of interest as regards political news; but the suppression of Le Temps by a decision of the Correctional Tribunal, is the subject of grave articles in some of the opposition papers, and has inspired serious misgivings about the future. The paper thus suppressed was one of those that may be said to have contributed most to the success of the revolutionary movement of the 27th July, 1830.

The Moniteur announces that the judicial inquiry into the causes of the Versailles Railroad (left bank) accident, began on the 9th, the morning after the catastrophe, and that numerous witnesses had been heard both in Paris and Versailles. After hearing the engineers and the persons who escaped, the whole proceedings will be submitted to the Seine Tribunal, to decide any or what course is to be pursued. The Left Bank Railroad resumed its service on Saturday. Several ladies were in the carriages. The following alterations had been made in the trains:—

1. The discontinuance of the four-wheeled locomotives, and the use of the six-wheeled engines only.
2. The baggage waggons, usually placed behind the train, are now placed between the engine and the passengers, and, independently of this precaution, an additional waggon, loaded with stones and sand-bags, follows the baggage one.
3. The speed has been slackened.
4. The doors of the carriages can now be opened by the passengers.

THE ACCIDENT AT MEUDON.—Men under the superintendence of police-officers have been employed in sifting the ashes at Meudon, and every article thus obtained is carefully preserved. The operation has produced fragments of linen, laces, and other parts of dresses, 20 gold rings, a considerable quantity of money in silver and gold, and parts of watches, chains, and ornaments; gloves, canes, umbrellas, and various other things, which may, in many instances, be recognised as having belonged to sufferers. Already one gentleman has found among these relics a chain and medallion which belonged to his young wife, to whom he had very recently been married. One of the chief clerks in the office of the Minister of the Finances has ascertained the loss of a young person to whom he was affianced, by seeing among these remnants the case of a watch he had presented to her. A mother has also found the fragment of a box, and a ring belonging to her only daughter, who went on Sunday to Versailles with her cousin, but neither of whom has returned or been heard of. One of the most afflicting results of the late railroad accident is the case of M. Brioche, a merchant of Nantes. He has lost both his legs and both his arms, and remains a mere trunk with the head upon it. In the endeavours to draw him out of the fire, the hook of the pole which was used caught him by the mouth, which was dreadfully lacerated. Nevertheless, he has recovered his senses and his speech, and is able to give a relation of the horrors he has undergone. He was accompanied by the nephew of M. Sicard, a merchant of the Rue Thibeautodé, and a traveller of the house, who had arrived only three days before from Nismes, both of whom were by his side, but perished in the flames.—Galignani's Messenger.

We learn by a letter from Castel Sarrazin, in the Tarn-et-Garonne, that, on the 4th inst., the river Garonne became so swollen, that the extensive plain of Castel Sarrazin was completely overflowed, and the inhabitants of the houses upon it driven up to the roofs. The Mayor went out in a skiff, with provisions for their relief. The current was so strong, that several boats were driven with such violence against the trees, that they were stove in and sunk.

PORTUGAL.—A commission has just been appointed by the Portuguese Government, to take into consideration the whole question of the reduction of duties, which is to form the subject of the supplemental article to the commercial treaty. The commission consisted of Joaquim Lanches, a cloth manufacturer from the Alemtejo; Florido Ferrez, formerly Finance Minister; and Leita Sampayo, one of the tobacco contractors. The new list of Peers, thirty in number, had been approved by the Queen in Council. The list had been judiciously drawn up so as to include a fair representation of all parties. The most remarkable nominations were those of Count Bemfin, Count das Aretas, and Silva Carvalho.

NAPLES.—On the 8th of September, 1841, an insurrection took place at Aquile, in the kingdom of Naples, in which Colonel Tanfani, commander of the province, a gendarme, and a receiver of taxes, lost their lives. The insurgents held the town during 24 hours, but reinforcements having arrived, they retreated into the country, 400 in number, and were ultimately dispersed. A political military commission was immediately instituted to try the persons implicated in the conspiracy, and after proceedings which lasted nearly eight months, 116 were brought to trial in March last. A letter, dated Aquila, the 24th ult., states that the trial continued during 40 days, and that the commissioners, after taking eight days to deliberate, returned a verdict of guilty against 55. Eight were sentenced to death, six to hard labour for life, seven to 30 years' imprisonment and hard labour, and thirty-four to 25 years' close confinement. Three of the first were shot on the 22nd ult. The execution of the five others, amongst whom figures Baron Falconi, had been suspended, and it was even hoped that they would be reprieved. The Marquis Dragonetti, a member of the Neapolitan Parliament in 1821, was among the 30 whose innocence was recognised. Six new arrests were made during the debates, and 31 still remained to be tried.

PRUSSIA.—A private letter from Posen expresses serious fears for the consequences of the projected visit of the King of Prussia to St. Petersburgh. There has for some time existed a treaty between Prussia and Russia for the reciprocal surrender of deserters from those states respectively. The term of the treaty has expired, and a proposition for the renewal of it has been made to the Prussian Government on the part of the Emperor Nicholas. "If it be acceded to," say our letters, "the king will have for ever destroyed the popularity he has gained, for there are in the Prussian states at this moment no fewer than 50,000 deserters, or refugees from Russian Poland. For the sake, therefore, of the king's own popularity and welfare, as well as on the score of humanity, let us hope that his Majesty will not commit an error so great as to renew the treaty now happily at an end."

HAMBURGH.—A meeting of the British residents of this ill-fated city, was held at the Consulate on the 12th instant, when it was unanimously agreed that a petition be presented to her most excellent Majesty the Queen, and an appeal to the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, praying that her Majesty would be graciously pleased to sanction and approve an appeal to the British nation, in order to alleviate the general sufferings caused by the late calamitous and destructive fire. Colonel Hodges alluded to the absurd calumnies and wanton injuries inflicted upon some of the English by the mistaken inhabitants for exertions which should have been met with thanks. It appears that the Senate gave orders to blow up some houses to stop the progress of the fire. Some English workmen, belonging to an English machine manufactory, were selected as the fittest persons to perform this duty. They were joined by some English sailors, who volunteered their services. Their object was misconstrued by the people into a hostile attack on their houses. It is stated that one of the workmen employed by the engineer was supposed to be plundering; the workmen and the sailors were attacked, driven away, and it is feared that some of them were seriously injured, if not killed. It is perhaps hardly to be wondered at that the state of despair to which the population here was reduced, by the fearful event by which this town has been visited, should have distracted the reason of some part of the mob; but it is gratifying to observe that the authorities of the town fully acknowledge the services rendered by the English resident in Hamburgh.

The following letter has been addressed by Dr. Sieveking, Senior Syndic of the city of Hamburgh to Colonel Hodges:—

"Hamburgh, May 12, 1842.

"Sir,—Though unable to appreciate by any official report the whole extent of the obligations under which a considerable part of the city of Hamburgh has been laid during the late awful event by the spirited exertions of your countrymen, the Senate thinks it a sacred duty to commemorate, at this early period, their names. By the very exertions which ought to have commanded popular gratitude, Messrs. Lumley, Giles, and Thompson, have incurred the persecution of a deluded mob. They have been particularly pointed out to the Senate as the men who assisted in planning with technical skill, and who, without adequate means of execution, volunteered, with heroic intrepidity, in carrying out a system of explosions, though not equally effective in all, yet in some important instances, gloriously successful. I am authorized by the Senate to anticipate a public testimonial, to which they are so justly entitled, by these lines addressed to their country's representative. The feelings of sympathy which unite the inhabitants of this city and her Britannic Majesty's subjects will, I trust, receive additional strength from a catastrophe to which the exertions of Englishmen have so much contributed in assigning a limit; and which not only from an intimate connexion of interests, but from the noble motives of humanity, will, I have no doubt, be considered by the commercial metropolis of the world as a domestic calamity. I have the honour to remain, with sincere regard, Sir, your most obedient, humble servant, (Signed)

"To G. Lloyd Hodges, Esq., "K. SIEVEKING
Her Britannic Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, &c."

In this country the appeal in behalf of the unfortunate population was anticipated and most liberally responded to. £10,000 were sent over in dollars and money by the steamer, subscribed by some of the public companies, merchants, bankers, and others, in the course of three days after the news of the catastrophe was known in London. Among the subscribers we are gratified to observe that our most gracious Sovereign has ordered £200 to be forwarded as her contribution. The Queen Dowager has also given £150, and Prince Albert £100 towards the relief fund. The King of Hanover has contributed 100,000 dollars for a similar benevolent purpose.

The King of Denmark has given the munificent subscription of £7500 to the relief of the sufferers by the fire.

In France, the subscription opened for the sufferers by the fire, at the head of which are some of the great commercial establishments, amounts to 61,000f., or nearly £2500. The Bank of France has besides subscribed 15,000f., or £600.

The exact position of the Hamburgh insurance companies is still unknown. It is hoped that three out of the four will be enabled to pay in full. In the course of a few days this question will be decided one way or other, and the certainty, whichever way the result will turn, will put an end to doubts and anxiety which are at present prejudicial to all interests.

From the best information received by the last mail from Hamburgh, the loss of the three principal fire offices in London are £300,000 sterling, £200,000, £150,000,—a sum much greater than was at first anticipated, but which will be paid in the course of this week. The losses of the Hamburgh fire-office and the Prussian fire-office in Hamburgh, are much heavier than the above.

Sixty-one Prussian pioneers are now in the city, paid, fed, and clothed at Prussian expense. They are to remain for three months, to assist in clearing away the tottering walls and rubbish, and, indeed, considerable progress has been already made therein. Many streets—streets, alas! without houses—are sufficiently cleared to admit foot passengers; and already the merchants have assembled again in their splendid new Exchange.

A private letter from Munich of the 11th inst., states that the utmost exertions were being made at Berlin, Frankfort, Augsburg, and, in fact, throughout Germany, to collect subscriptions for the sufferers by the late calamitous fire at Hamburgh. It was feared that many of the German insurance companies would be seriously compromised by that event. It was said that a company at Gotha would lose 10,000,000 florins.

GREECE.—Letters from Athens of the 28th ult. state, that several violent shocks of an earthquake were felt in various parts of the Peloponnesus; on the 18th, at Sparta, the shocks lasted from 25 to 30 seconds each. The inhabitants ran terrified out of their houses. On the same day, and in the course of the night, four or five other slighter shocks were experienced. Beyond the Eurotas an immense rock fell from Mount Menelas, near the village of Dwuchas. An old tower situate in the town of Magoules was thrown to the ground. At Mistra the soil trembled with more violence than it did at Sparta, and a portion of the Hellenic College and several houses were destroyed. The water of the springs and wells became turbid, and an enormous rock, having detached itself from the summit of old Mount Mistra, rolled with terrific noise into the town. At Calames the first shock, felt at half-past 9 o'clock, lasted between 40 and 50 seconds, and there were ten others from that hour until midnight at intervals of three-quarters of an hour. Most of the houses were damaged, and several in the neighbourhood actually gave way. Upwards of 50 dwellings were thrown down at Areopolis, and 15 towers crumbled at Œtylus. Many persons were buried under the ruins of their houses in the province of Maina. At Antrousa several churches fell in. On the 24th ult., at about 4 o'clock, A.M., another shock was felt at Patras, which lasted a minute and a half.

EGYPT.—ALEXANDRIA, April 26. Since the 22nd inst., when I wrote you by the Liverpool, nothing of importance has transpired, which is fortunate, as the French steamer only arriving last evening, and the mail closing again to-night, has left me very little time. The Pacha is still in the Delta, and nothing is positively known of his projected return to Alexandria. The Nile steamer had not gone back to Constantinople, from whence a report has reached us, said to emanate from highly-respectable authority, that Samy-Pacha's mission related to a demand made by England, for permission to march 25,000 men through this country to India, for service in Affghanistan. Several months ago the report was current here, that such a demand had been made by Colonel Barnett to the Pacha, and by the latter referred to Constantinople; but the probabilities were so much against it, that no one here believed it. The quarter through which the report has now reached me entitles it to mention, without pretending to vouch for its accuracy. The public health continues good, and we are free from alarms of plague. There is no commercial news beyond a sale of beans, doubtless most flattering to the minister at the price he still upholds of p. 36. There have been three trifling failures during the last few days, but of no great extent.

INDIA.—Extract of a letter from an officer of the 33rd Regiment Native Bengal Infantry, dated Camp Rummager, Punjaub, March 10, 1842:—

"I wrote you on the 18th of last month, from which you would learn of my sudden march from Meerut for Ferozepore, where we remained till the 22nd, when we again marched with the following troops:—A battery of 9-N horse-artillery guns, her Majesty's 3rd Light Dragoons, 1st Regt Native Cavalry, 33rd Regiment, 6th Regiment of Infantry, and a troop of 3rd Regt. of Irregular Cavalry, with a convoy of nearly 1700 camels loaded with military stores, and nearly £100,000 in treasure—a very serious charge to escort through the Punjaub. We are now hastening forward to reinforce the troops at Peshawar, where we expect to arrive about the 1st of April, when, if all assemble, our division will muster only about 25 guns, 10 000 men, including 1500 cavalry. Our first business will be to force the Khyber Pass and relieve General Sale's brigade, which has been blockaded in the fort of Jellalabad since November last. This will be a tough job. The pass is strongly fortified, and occupied by several thousands of the Affghans. We can only trust in a merciful Providence and do our best. But I am sorry to say we are but wretchedly equipped in every way, both as to carriages, supplies, and every comfort for officers and men, the regiment having been hurried forward without the requisite preparations. The few men who were pressed to carry the sick have all deserted, so averse are they to go so far from home. How we are to carry our wounded when we get into action, God only knows. It is a most cruel business for an army to be obliged to contend with such difficulties; still officers and men are not losing heart, but are keeping up their spirits in a way most creditable to their courage. Whatever may be the result, it will rest on the government. For my part, I cannot see the wisdom of undertaking such expensive operations at so great a distance, without reserves or adequate magazines, or supplies. What, too, is the advantage to be gained? Already more than two millions have been wasted, and our power, instead of being strengthened, is weakened, even to the risk of losing all India. If the wars is to be persevered in, the army must be rendered more efficient, and that immediately. I never in my life marched more uncomfortably, even when an ensign. Every officer is reduced in luggage, clothes, &c., to the lowest possible scale, in consequence of the scarcity of camels, which cannot be procured either for love or money. In our mess we have not a bottle of wine nor even ale to drink—our allowance being only a very limited quantum of weak brandy and water. A bannock of wheat flour and some tea is all we have for breakfast. This is roughing it with a vengeance, after thirty-two year's service; but, thank God, I am, notwithstanding, at present in good health, and contented in mind. If mercifully spared to return from camp, I shall all the more enjoy the ease and comforts of home, and be able to retire for good, which I long to do."

PHYSIOLOGY

It is an admitted axiom among physiologists, that to the peculiar formation of the cerebral organs, the mental faculties owe their character. Nor is it less confidently asserted, that the influence of these peculiarities is in a striking degree hereditary, as shown in the descendants of such as have exhibited any peculiar property in connection with these highly important functions. These truths are in a far more obvious character, manifest in the physical structure of the human race, and exhibit themselves to the world daily; for, as in vegetable, so in animal life, the shoot invariably partakes of the vigour or delicacy of the parent stem. To sustain or re-invigorate the physical powers of the body, by enabling the natural streams of vitality to flow on their course without obstacle, must be an object of great importance, as it is obvious that any interference therewith, must to such an extent divert them from their legitimate purpose, and so deprive the system of a portion of its natural support, thus enfeebling if not prostrating its energies, and so rendering it unable to fulfil its wonted duties. That both physical and mental vigour may be maintained for an extraordinary duration of time, we have many evidences on record, and that the means of accomplishing this object are now within our reach, the many singular proofs of the power of the preserving tea, as made up by Old Thomas Parr, is a guarantee of such value, as should not be lost sight of without mature reflection.

WAGHORN'S OVERLAND ROUTE FROM INDIA.

We are enabled through the courtesy of Mr. Waghorn, to present our readers with a detail of his route from India to England; and as the subject involves considerations of vast importance to this country as well as to Europe generally, we have selected it for illustration in our present number. This gentleman has now long been known to the world as the indefatigable and persevering author of the overland route to India. Brought up from an early age in the pilot service of the East India Company, and having distinguished himself in the Arracan expedition, he was in the year 1827 recommended by Lord Combermere to the Court of Directors as a proper person to open steam intercourse between this country and India. To this he devoted himself; and in 1829 his views had attracted so much public attention that he was selected by the Company to take out despatches, and report upon the route by the Red Sea. For his successful accomplishment of this duty, he received, on his arrival at Bombay, the thanks of the Governor General in Council; and the circumstance of his having proceeded down the Red Sea in an open boat, when disappointed of his steamer, the Enterprise, at Suez, was particularly adverted to, as indicating the zeal with which he had applied himself to the service of the public. Since the year 1831, the endeavours of this gentleman to accomplish his object, by the formation of establishments in Egypt, for the passage of mails and passengers, have been unceasing, and are at length crowned with perfect success. Upon one occasion, in the year 1830, it is recollected that he succeeded in getting a mail from Bombay to London within 60 days, and the rapidity of his method so impressed the public, the Government and the Board of Directors, with the advantages to be derived from his line of route that steamers were forthwith placed at his disposal for facilitating his plans; and so successfully had he availed himself of the resources opened to him as well by the patronage of the Government at home, as by his personal intimacy with Mehemet Ali, that the Indian mail of July 1841 passed from the post-office of London to the post-office of Bombay in 30 days and 10 hours. There can be no question that this gentleman is eminently entitled to the gratitude of his country, or, we may justly say, of all Europe, for the genius, zeal, and self devotion by which he has so materially shortened the distance between two points of the globe, so important and so essential to the welfare of each other.

The overland mail being now in course of transit from India, we shall commence our task with its arrival at Suez, on its way to Europe, and trace it station by station until its arrival at Marseilles, or perhaps London, resting our narrative for the week at the precise locality in which it may be presumed to be found at the time we go to press, and resuming the journey from that point in our next publication. We shall assume the travellers by this route to have arrived at Suez, by the regular steamer or sailing vessels, on the Red Sea, engaged for the purpose: the fare by the former is £80, and about half that sum by the sailing boats to Mocha. At Suez (No 1.) our travellers will find themselves received, upon landing, by persons attached to the Hotels belonging to Mr. Waghorn's establishment, and in which every accommodation that the wayfarer may require is at hand, and the female servants of the hotels being English, our country women will necessarily avoid much discomfort and anxiety. The regular stay at this place is usually limited to 24 hours either way, and the persons travelling by this route are entitled to apartments, &c., gratuitously. The engraving (No 2) represents the hotels of Messrs. Waghorn, at Suez.

There are three modes at the option of the traveller, by which the journey of 83 miles across the Desert to Cairo may be performed, namely, by small spring carts or omnibuses, which usually accomplish the journey in from 16 to 24 hours. For a place by this conveyance, and for a camel sent with the traveller's baggage, £8 is paid to the proprietor of the hotel, who has the entire management of the stations. Another mode is by donkey litters, or donkeys, for each of which about 10s. are paid. These animals will perform the journey with ease in from 30 to 8 hours. And the third mode is by means of light camels, which go from point to point, in from 20 to 30 hours. We are now therefore about to start for the Desert which, although preserving many of its original features of dreariness and monotony, has been divested of all the terrors with which its name was formerly associated. Thanks to the energy, perseverance, and tact of the indefatigable projector of this important line, resting places have been erected at intervals of from 10 to 12 miles throughout the whole distance, where the traveller will find liquid to slake his thirst, and in three of them livens for his repose. The others are chiefly adapted as stations for the animals employed in the journey. After advancing 12 miles on the Desert, one of the latter edifices is reached, and the horses changed. The engraving No. 3 will convey an idea of the station.

All arrangements being again complete, the escort moves forward and a further journey of 11 miles brings it to a tavern built for the convenience of the human portion of the cavalcade (No 4). At this place, also, English women are in attendance upon the travellers, and every usual European accommodation is afforded. After a short stay for rest and refreshment, the company again set forward, passing alternately two other similar stations, or, it may be, resting intermediately by the way, after the fashion of the native despatch bearers, as shown in the engraving No. 5.

Proceeding from the fourth station, our travellers, after a march of 10 miles, reach the terminus of their first day's journey across the Desert, which is called the Great Hotel, and where accommodation for 120 persons is provided. The conduct of this establishment is entirely under the control of the agent of Messrs Waghorn; and the traveller is agreeably surprised by the attention shown to his comfort, and the excellence of the arrangement, by which this once-dreaded journey is rendered as little irksome as if travelling in the most civilized parts of Europe. The view (No. 6) is that of the Great Hotel; and as the mails in transmission may be calculated upon as now being on the Desert, we shall here leave the travellers, and resume the line in our next number.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, May 22.—Trinity Sunday, or the Feast of the Holy Trinity, is the next after Pentecost, or Whitsuntide. It is a custom of ancient usage, for the judges and great law officers of the crown, together with the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and common council of London, to attend divine service at St. Paul's Cathedral—Battle of Prague, between the Prussians and Austrians, 1757.

MONDAY, 23.—Trinity Monday. Trinity Term begins. The marine corporation known as the Brethren of the Trinity house, according to their charter, meet annually on this day to choose and swear in a master, wardens, and other officers for the year ensuing—King Charles II. embarked at the Hague, for Ireland, 1660.

TUESDAY, 24.—Queen Victoria born, 1819 (kept on the 19th inst.)—Holiday at Custom House, Excise, and Stamps and Taxes Offices.—The Royal Exchange endowed by Sir Thomas Gresham, 1574.—The British Queen steamship, one of the largest in the world, launched, 1838.

WEDNESDAY, 25th.—The name of Mr. FOX struck out of the list of Privy Councillors by the King (George III.), 1798.—Rev. W. Paley, Archdeacon of Carlisle, an eminent theologian, died, 1805.

THURSDAY, 26.—Corpus Christi.—St. Augustine, Archbishop. He died at Canterbury, A.D. 607.—Lord Durham arrived at Quebec, and landed in state as Governor-General of the Canadas, 1838

FRIDAY, 27.—Venerable Bede. This day is inscribed in the English calendar with the name of Bede, an Englishman in priest's orders, a prodigy of learning in an unlearned age, who died A.D. 735.—Dr. Dodd hung for forgery, 1777.

SATURDAY, 28.—Chaucer died, 1434.—Cardinal Beaton assassinated, 1546.—William Pitt born, 1759.—St. Domingo evacuated by the English, 1798.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS beg to announce their intention of giving monthly wrappers, for the convenience of such of their subscribers as may desire to preserve their copies for binding. Of these, the first issue will be gratis, but those attending will bear a trifling charge to defray the actual cost. A title-page and index will also be given at the end of the year.

The Colosseum Print will be ready for delivery to regular subscribers for six months at the expiration of that period, as before announced. We think no other guarantee should be required for its excellence than the good faith we have shown by our present efforts to deserve confidence.

We regret it should be necessary to apologize for the many inaccuracies of our first number, as well as the disappointment we occasioned to many of our country friends by the delay which, however unpleasant to them and unprofitable to parcelers, was, in the case of such a first number, positively unavoidable.

As the circulation of this weekly journal is only surpassed by that of one newspaper in England, advertisers will see the importance of appearing in its columns; and as, from the space occupied by illustrations, our text is necessarily confined, we must, in the present and future numbers, limit our advertising columns to two pages only To insure insertion, advertisements must be sent to the office by two o'clock on Thursday.

T. B.," and several others will understand our second paragraph as more particularly applying to their enquiries upon the subject of a guarantee.

" A Wesleyan Artisan," Vickers-lane.—We are obliged for the suggestion; but our correspondent will perceive his views have been anticipated.

" Wm. Dalby," Chichester.—We cannot prudently accept his offer, as by his own showing there would be five to one against us.

" Robin Hood.—We should be happy to oblige, but the length of his communication, and the utter impossibility of our devoting half a day to unravel it necessarily precludes insertion at present. This need not deter him from another effort.

" Do Evilette."—We are much gratified by the encomiums universally bestowed upon our first number, and beg to assure our correspondent that the principles of "no party" there assumed we do not intend to swerve from. The "Song of the Exile" is too long. If he would oblige us with matter more condensed, we should have pleasure in finding room for it.

" J. C., Newbury.—His suggestion is welcome, as all will be from one so practised in the matter treated of. We shall always be happy to attend to his hints for improvement.

" E. G. M.," Glasgow.—As far as possible we have attended to the suggestion of our friend.

" Verbum Sat, Cambridge," will observe his wishes have been attended to. Shall we hear from him again?

" Several of our correspondents must remain unanswered from mere want of time to attend to them this week. We shall have more leisure as we get more organized.

All communications for THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are to be addressed to the Office, 198, Strand

On Sunday next, the 29th of May, in addition to numerous racing and other Illustrations, this paper will be embellished with a portrait of the winner of the Derby, from a drawing by Charles Hancock, Esq.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1842.

THE disclosures made by the appendix to the first report of the Commissioners appointed "to inquire into the condition and treatment of children employed in the mines and collieries of the United Kingdom, are so revolting to humanity—so utterly opposite to any idea we had hitherto entertained of the treatment to which human beings on this side of the Atlantic were subjected—that it is hardly possible to approach the subject with patience. We, of England, have been for many years thrusting ourselves forward in every possible way that could savour of ostentation, as champions of the oppressed, defenders of the helpless, and protectors of the whole human race; and we are now, on our own showing, exhibited to the world as empty braggarts, and shallow pretenders to virtues which we talk of, but do not possess. We, as a people, have been weighed in the scale and are found wanting. We have listened to the cries of the slave afar off, but we have shut our ears to the moaning of the slave at our feet! We have trumpeted our humanity in the face of the world till the very echo has become sickening, for we now unwillingly recollect that "a still small voice within" has been momently giving the lie to our assumption of the virtue.

At this moment of festivity and enjoyment, when the youthful Sovereign of a mighty empire is happy in the possession of her people's love and her courtiers' adulation, we are reluctant to throw the gloom of reality over the bright and laughing influences of the hour. But we have a duty to perform—there rational enjoyment in the court; but there is irrational suffering in the mine! While the children of the Sovereign (as yet too young to be conscious of their elevated position) are tended with all the affection of parental, and all the servility of mercenary, love, the children of a numerous class of her subjects are, for want of legislative protection, deprived of even the semblance of either. This is a contrast in condition, never originally contemplated by Church or State; and sure we are, that unless some remedy be applied, and applied at once, the stability of both will soon be endangered by the disease. "The schoolmaster is abroad," and people think of these things; and the result of their deliberation must be a determination that such atrocities shall not continue to disgrace the national character.

WE feel it due to the public that we should acknowledge with unqualified feelings of gratitude and satisfaction, the astonishing and unprecedented favour with which the first number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has been received. It was natural, and just, that we should feel sanguine as to the success of an experiment so hazardous as regarded expense, and apparently so difficult in execution, or we should not have attempted it; but we confess that, in the reception we have met with, the most extravagant estimate for the sale of our first number has been exceeded, and we have now the pleasure to announce that as regards NUMBER and ACTUAL Sales, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is already THE SECOND WEEKLY JOURNAL OF THE EMPIRE!

Of the peculiar views with which the principles of this paper are identified, we have already spoken, and feel it unnecessary to add to profession when confidence can only be merited by performance. This however we may, in justice to ourselves and for the satisfaction of our readers, explicitly declare, that not only will all advertisements of an objectionable tendency be rejected from our columns; but that details of circumstances which, by any possibility, might render this Illustrated Paper objectionable to the purest mind, shall also be studiously avoided. We trust to be able to maintain for this journal the character of a newspaper, without pandering to tastes we would fain see starved into reformation.

Our desire is, that this paper may long maintain its lofty position—our ambition is, that it shall deserve to do so; and we know that by this avowal we enlist all right-minded and reflecting newspaper readers under our banner. When we refer to the time required for machining a paper crowded with illustrations, and state that the bona fide sale for last week exceeded 26,000 copies—a number which might have been doubled could we have anticipated the demand unsupplied—we trust we shall stand absolved from any charge of delay or disappointment that might, by any possibility, have been avoided in the bustle and excitement consequent upon such a publication for the first time. Like other well-managed machinery, we are now in working trim; and we confidently hope to go on rapidly, yet smoothly, in our unprecedented career of triumph. We tender thanks to our numerous agents in town and country for their efficient aid, and regret that any should have felt inconvenienced through not receiving a sufficient supply of the paper.

MONEY MARKET.

CITY, SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

The official notice of the reduction of interest on Exchequer Bills has been received to day, but it has not as yet had the effect upon the Stocks that was expected, although the natural consequence of such a measure must be to throw more capital into the funded debt This has been long expected, but many capitalists were more disposed to anticipate a reduction of the Reduced Three-and-a-Half per Cents. The British Securities improved yesterday afternoon ¼ per cent., in consequence of the above, and have maintained themselves to-day, notwithstanding that the demand for money is not abated. Consols are 92¾ to 92½; ditto for the Account, 92⅞; Reduced Three per Cents, 91¾ to 91¾; Reduced Three-and-a-Half, 99¾ to 100; New Three-and-a-Half, 100¾ to 101; Long Annuities, 12⅝ to 12 7-16; Bank Stock 167½ to 168; India Stock, 249 to 250; Exchequer Bills 36 to 38; India Bonds 19 to 20.

Dutch and Brazilian Bonds are the only Foreign Securities which have attracted attention to-day, and the prices are—for the latter 67¼; and the former, the Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 52½ 53; the Five per Cents., 100¾

The quotation of Mexican is rather lower, being 36½.

In the Share Market, York and North Midland have been sold at 93¾; Manchester and Birmingham, 28; Birmingham and Gloucester, 54; Great Western, New, 64½, Fifths, 6¾; Cheltenham and Great Western, 21; Eastern Counties, £4 11s. 8d.; and Northern and Eastern, 43⅝.

UNION-HALL.—On Saturday, a seaman, just paid off from the Daphne sloop of war, was brought up under the following circumstances:—It appeared that he arrived in a fly from Gravesend the previous night, and was set down in the Borough, completely helpless from intoxication. He was carried on a stretcher to the station-house, and, when he came to his senses, he found that he was robbed of all the wages he had received at Chatham, after three years' service in the Mediterranean. He added, that he wanted to get round to Portsmouth, but had no money to get there, as he must go to sea again, having lost all instead of going down to Scotland to see his friends.—Mr. Cottingham said that this was a striking instance of the improvidence of sailors, and asked the defendant why he got so drunk?—The defendant replied that for three years he had been constantly at sea, and when he got on shore he was determined on enjoying himself: but that he had paid dearly for it. He was advised to apply at "the Sailors' Home," and they would render him some assistance to get to Portsmouth. He was then discharged.

STANNARIES' COURT—DUCHY OF CORNWALL.

BEFORE HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

APPEAL.—THOMAS v. VICE AND BENNETT.

The early hour of eight o'clock on Saturday having been fixed by Prince Albert, the Lord Warden of the Stannaries' Court, for hearing an appeal in the case of Thomas v. Vice and Bennett, his Royal Highness arrived at Somerset House shortly before the time appointed. The Prince had been preceded by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Langdale, the Master of the Rolls, Lord Brougham, Vice-Chancellor Wigram, and Baron Parke.—The Prince having been conducted to his robing-room, by Mr. Gardiner, the auditor of the Court, was received by the Lord Chancellor and the other Judges present.—At a few minutes after eight his Royal Highness entered the Court, habited in his splendid robe of green velvet, collared and trimmed with white ermine, and lined with crimson satin; and carrying in his right hand his crimson velvet cap, turned up with white ermine. Mr Gardiner carried the purse before him, and an officer of the court bore his train. His Royal Highness bowed graciously to the persons present as he entered, and took his seat in an elegant gilt chair placed on a raised platform, the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls sitting on his right hand, and Lord Brougham, Vice-Chancellor Wigram, and Baron Parke on his left. His Royal Highness looked remarkably well The Prince was also attended by the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Portman, Sir H. Wheatley, Mr. Pemberton, and Mr. Anson, members of the Duchy of Cornwall. The title of the case having been read, the Solicitor-General, who appeared on behalf of the appellants or defendants, rose to address the court in support of an appeal against a decree of the Vice-Warden. Mr. Earle addressed the court in support of the petition, and Mr. Barlow followed on the same side.

The Solicitor-General having replied, the Court took time to consider their judgments.—Prince Albert then took his departure, shortly after two o'clock: his Royal Highness having sat in his court for more than six hours.

THE SOUTHEND COACH ON FIRE.—On Monday, the Southend coach, after being snugly stowed upon the Eastern Counties' Railway, began coquetting with a spark, which had migrated from the engine, eventually taking it up as an outside passenger; and as the vehicle was part and parcel of the train, of course, like a hot-headed gentleman, it "took fire." The intruder began to play sad havoc among the luggage on the roof thereof; but at length a sailor discovering the danger, sprang aloft, and soon cleared the deck of the burning commodities, but not, before the flame had peeped into the interior, to the discomfiture of the unconscious John and four insides, who were comfortably chatting over the journey, and actually laid scorching hands upon a letter in a hat suspended above them.—Essex Herald.

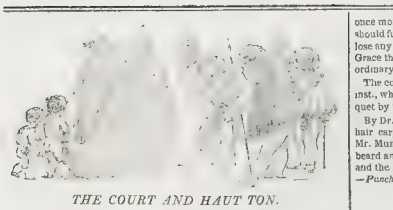
The traffic on the Great Western Railway is rapidly increasing. This increase is chiefly in the passenger traffic. The third class carriages are now made on an improved and more comfortable plan. The Box Tunnel a few mornings ago, presented a most splendid and singular appearance, caused by the shining of the sun directly into it, so that the light was visible from the other extremity, and giving the walls a brilliancy "as though the whole tunnel had been gilt." This circumstance will occur again in the fall of the year. At this time of the year it appears about five o'clock in the morning.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.—Money was very plentiful in the City this morning, and the man at the crossing near the Bank carried off a large sum at the clearing. Mohair stock was not very buoyant, but gloves were easy at eighteen-pence a pair and upwards. Company's tea was was wishy-washy, at a spoonful for each person, and one for the pot; but coffee rose rapidly when placed upon a hot fire. Coals were nominally heavy, but were found much lighter on being weighed; and eggs, though they looked promising yesterday, opened very badly this morning. In spices there was very little done; but a party suffered greatly who had been keeping too close an eye to pepper.—Punch.

We understand that very extensive improvements in the Post-office department are now making by the Right Hon. Lord Lowther for establishing a morning as well an evening mail, by railroad, to places where letters and newspapers are at present received but once a day; and in some cases, in consequence of there being no post-office or receiving-house in the vicinity, but once in two days. A morning and evening mail will be established between London and Gosport, through Portsmouth, by the South-Western Railway, and also to the Isle of Wight. A great many towns in the western and northern parts of England and Scotland, are to have the benefit of this arrangement, which will come into operation early in next month.

The Prussian papers state that public prayers are offered, and collections ordered to be made in all the churches in Prussia for the relief of the sufferers.

The King of Prussia, it is said, has contributed 25,000 dollars towards the relief of the sufferers of this city. His Majesty has taken the utmost interest in their misfortunes.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY.—Thursday being the day appointed for celebrating the birth of our beloved Sovereign, the morning was ushered in with the usual demonstrations of loyalty and attachment. At 10 o'clock the Horse and Foot Guards were reviewed in St. James's Park by Prince Albert. His Royal Highness arrived at the Horse Guards a few minutes past 10 o'clock, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Wellington, and a brilliant staff of general and field officers. The Prince wore the uniform of a field-marshal, and appeared in excellent health and spirits. His Royal Highness was loudly cheered by the vast multitude which had assembled in the Park. Immediately after Prince Albert arrived the bands of the different regiments played the national anthem. The scene at this moment was one of great animation, and cannot be described with effect. The uniform of the Horse Guards is somewhat altered, instead of wearing feathers, the cap is ornamented with long flowing white horse-hair, which has a very pretty appearance. The troops went through their evolutions with great precision, and we understand that Prince Albert expressed to the officers his entire satisfaction at their appearance and discipline. His Royal Highness left the ground attended by his suite, short y after 11 o'clock, for Buckingham Palace. At one o'clock the Park and Tower guns were fired, and in the evening the club houses and her Majesty's tradesmen illuminated. The letter-carriers of the General and Penny Post Office, as usual, appeared in new dresses. The Queen held a drawing-room at St. James's Palace on Thursday, and being the celebration of her Majesty's birthday, it was more than usually brilliantly attended. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the principal members of the Court, left Buckingham Palace before two o'clock for St. James's. The royal cavalcade was escorted by a detachment of the Horse Guards. Her Majesty and her illustrious Consort were loudly cheered as they passed through the Park. The different branches of the Royal Family, Foreign Ambassadors, Cabinet Ministers, Great Officers of the Household, and those having the privilege of the entrée, arrived in full state shortly after one o'clock. The fineness of the day attracted a great crowd, who appeared much delighted with the gorgeous spectacle. The Court will leave Buckingham Palace for Claremont on Saturday, there to remain till the Derby day at Epsom, when her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert and the whole of the Court, with numerous royal and distinguished visitors, will honour the Downs with their presence. The anniversary of her Majesty's birth, which is Tuesday, the 24th instant, will be kept at Claremont, upon which auspicious occasion a large party, consisting of many of the illustrious members of the royal family, several of her Majesty's noble and distinguished friends, and the members of the Court, will assemble to celebrate the day.

Her Majesty enjoys her accustomed good health, and, with the Prince and the Royal infants, has taken her usual airings during the week.

The ceremony of laying the first stone of the Victoria Tower will now, it is said, take place in August, and it being the intended royal entrance to the new House of Peers, if her Majesty should not perform the ceremony, Prince Albert will act for the Queen on the occasion.

It is confidently expected that her Majesty and Prince Albert will honour the Spitalfields ball in the splendid costume of the fancy dress ball, which example will be followed, no doubt, by the greater portion of the company.

The Queen has been graciously pleased to contribute ten guineas towards the funds now raising for the erection of a new organ in Dedham Church.

The Queen Dowager has forwarded to Mr Erasmus Porock £145 to be distributed among the local charities, &c., at Brighton.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, as Lord Warden, has appointed to hold his first Court of Appeal for the Duchy of Cornwall this day (the 21st instant). His Royal Highness will be assisted on the occasion by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Brougham, and Mr. Baron Parke. The court sits as early as eight in the morning.

The Duke Bernard and the Duchess of Saxe Weimar, and Prince Edward and the Princesses of Saxe Weimar attended divine service on Sunday morning in the Royal German Chapel. The Rev. Dr. Kuper officiated.

Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence is occupying the Earl of Errol's apartments in St. James's Palace, during the repair of his house in the Ambassador's court.

The Sheik of the Druses has left Mivart's Hotel for Woolwich, in order to be instructed in the artillery practice observed in the British service.

Lord Emlyn, who is about to marry the Hon. Miss Cavendish, Maid of Honour to the Queen, is in his twenty-fifth year, and is nephew to the Duchess of Buccleuch and the Countess of Harewood. Miss Cavendish is second cousin to the Duke of Devonshire.

A monument is about to be erected to the memory of Rear-Admiral D'Urville, at Paris; and the Geographical Society have opened subscriptions for the purpose.

The repairs in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, have commenced, and will be finished in the ensuing summer. The rich stained glass of the great western window, which has not been repaired for the last 70 years, is intended for restoration by Mr. Willement, and will cost alone an outlay of £2000 or £3000.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert visited the Suffolk-street Gallery last week, and purchased a picture of Mr. J. W. Allen. So judicious a partiality for the works of this truly English landscape-painter is an excellent compliment to British artists.

Prince Albert's appointment as Colonel of the Fusileer Guards is worth to his Royal Highness £2000 a year.

The Master of the Household, the Hon. C. A. Murray, on Wednesday, ordered a suit of apartments at Buckingham Palace to be prepared for the use of his Royal Highness £2000 a year.

The Master of the Household, the Hon. C. A. Murray, on Wednesday received several illustrious foreigners, who are expected to arrive on Monday or Tuesday next, on a visit to her Majesty, who will come to town express from Claremont to receive her Royal visitors.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Countess de Grey and suite left St James's-square, on Wednesday afternoon, for West Park Bedfordshire whence they proceed to Liverpool, where they will embark on board a government post-office steamer (this Saturday) evening for Kingstown. Mr Arthur Magenis, his Lordship's private secretary, left town for Dublin Castle on Thursday.

In the list of the guests at her Majesty's fancy ball, which was given by the court newsmen on Friday se'nnight, it was stated that the various members of the Fitzclarence family were present. This was not the case; for although honoured by her Majesty's command, the invitation was gratefully declined.

Mr. Lister, of Newcastle, had the honour to sell to her Majesty, a few days ago, a remarkably fine piece of plate, ornamented with rubies, pearls, and turquoise. Her Majesty was graciously pleased to express her approbation of the plate. Prince Albert also honoured Mr. Lister by purchasing a very fine undoubted sword of the time of Edward III., also one of the period of Henry V; besides other articles of value.

The Court Journal announces that the Duchess of Sutherland intends giving a masque, in which the splendid pageant of Thursday week will once more figure in all its fairy enchantment. If, as we hope, her Grace should fulfil her hospitable intention, the scen effect will not, we are sure, lose any of its attractions. It was also stated, that it is the intention of his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch to give a fancy dress ball on a scale of extraordinary magnificence. All this looks well for trade.

The corporation of the Trinity House have an entertainment on the 23rd inst., when the Duke of Wellington, Sir R. Peel, &c., will honour the banquet by their presence.

By Dr. Reid's new plan for ventilating the House of Commons, a porous hair carpet will be required for the floor; to provide materials for which Mr. Munts has, in the most handsome manner, offered to shave off his beard and whiskers. This is true magnanimity—Muntz is a noble fellow! and the lasting gratitude of the House is due to him and his hairs for ever. —Punch.

THE THEATRES.

We have not space to enter into details of the various amusements provided for the holiday folks during the week, and shall therefore content ourselves with brief notices of the theatres on Monday night.

DRURY-LANE.—The holiday folks crowded the theatre to suffocation. The performances consisted of "Macbeth" and "Acis and Galatea."

COVENT-GARDEN.—The performance selected by the German company for Whit Monday was Mozart's opera of "Die Zauberflöte," which went off successfully, and many of the pieces, amongst others the beautiful duet, known in England by the name of "The Music Heart," were encored. The theatre was better attended than it has been for some time.

HAYMARKET.—A very full audience was attracted to this house to witness the inexhaustible "Lady of Lyons," to which Mr Kean and his wife shared the loudest applause throughout. The afterpieces were "A Lover by Proxy," and "The Pretty Girls of Stilberg," both of which continue great favourites.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—The chief feature in the performance at this theatre was the revival of a little piece called the "Picturesque and Beautiful," which has not been played for several years. The introduction of tableaux vivans, representing the celebrated picture of Mary Queen of Scots in the grand costume of the period, is particularly attractive.

NEW STRAND.—The manager of this pretty little house put forth an entirely new bill, the performances commencing with a long piece, called "Maximus and Sentiments of William Muggins," adapted by Mr. Selby from a tale written by Lamb, which appeared in a recent two numbers of a weekly paper. The second novelty was a farce called "Somnambulism," and third a new burlesque on "Macbeth," which did not meet with the most favourable reception.

MISS KELLY'S THEATRE.—Miss Kelly's new and neat theatre reopens with continued spirit, though we are afraid not quite with the success her efforts deserve. Since our last visit her entertainments have been varied. "Blue Devils," "The Sister of Charity," and "More Blunders than One," formed a capital bill for the holiday people.

SURREY.—The Whitsuntide entertainments at this theatre had to boast of very great attractions. The first and greatest of them was a grand historical and allegorical equestrian spectacle, called "Napoleon the Peasant General, Prince, and King." It is a free translation from a French piece of the same name, and, as a grand military and equestrian spectacle, it "getting up" of this piece is in a style of classical splendour, which does not exceed in the taste, talent, and liberality of the present management. The piece was given out for repetition amidst loud and deserved shouts of applause. It was followed by some splendid scenes in the circle, in which the "Seven and Twelve-year-old" display of horsemanship was seen to great advantage. The entertainments of pony races with piggy jockeys followed, and the whole wound up with a comic drama in two acts called the "Sprig of Nobility," or, brought up to the Bar." The house was crowded in every part.

VICTORIA.—The proprietors of this favourite place of public amusement produced for the amusement of the holiday folks a new drama of considerable interest, entitled "Jane Paul; or, the Victim of Unmerited Persecution." The principal character in the drama was most ably and cleverly sustained by Miss Vincent. The piece was successful enough to be announced for every evening.

CITY OF LONDON.—The entertainment for the Whitsun holidays at this theatre were, to the language of the bills, "An Original Eastern Spectacle" called the "Massacre of Cairo, or the War in Affghanistan," and "Zozimus, the Indian Maid." The second piece, entitled "The Maiden's Vow, or the Soldier's Return," was an adaptation from the French drama of "The Maid of Croissy," the dialogue changed to suit the circumstances of the Affghan War. It was a very trifle, and was followed by an affair called "The Murderer's Revenge," of which the less said the better.

SADLER'S WELLS.—A new equestrian attraction has been added to the usual amusements at this theatre, by the addition to the establishment of the whole of the stud, and all the principal assistants of the late much-lamented Mr Andrew Ducrow, who made their appearance here for the first time on Monday night. In order to bring the whole strength of the united companies into play, a new piece, entitled "Harry of England, or the Trumpeter's Horse, and the Conquest of Harfleur," written by Bourcroft, was produced with a great deal of scenery, dresses, and appointments. Scenes in the circle followed, and the evening's amusements concluded with the popular farce of "The Lottery Ticket."

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—The fêtes for the season commenced at this place on Monday. Since the close of last season great improvements have been made in the general arrangement of the grounds, which now bear a very splendid appearance, the turf being in full verdure, and the trees and shrubs luxuriant in foliage. A lance gallery has been constructed for the accommodation of those who choose to be seated during the fireworks, and a roof has been thrown over one of the galleries, so that at least 1000 persons can be protected from rain.

GREENWICH FAIR.—The river, on Monday, from the Adelphi pier down wards, presented a most animated appearance. Some thousands—it may not be exaggeration to say 500,000—passed down the river during the day. The Thames, as usual, was crowded with every craft of every tonnage and description. Upwards of 80,000 persons landed and embarked at the Watermen's Floating pier, and about half that number at the "Second-pier," which has been erected at a vast expense for the accommodation of steam boat passengers. The Greenwich Railway came in for a fair share of the holiday profits. It is believed that upwards of 100,000 persons went up and down the line in the first and second class carriages. In the town of Greenwich, hilarity, confusion, and mischief seemed to be uppermost. The fair was well thronged by all parties, good, bad, and indifferent; and it may be safely predicted that a proportionate harvest was reaped. In the beautiful parks it was almost impossible to catch a glimpse of anything save a waving sea of heads. At sunset, the park, the fair, the town, the taverns, eating houses, and other places of refreshment, were filled with company; and the steamers and the railway trains were wending down and bearing away myriads of Londoners. On Wednesday the greatest contrast was observable upon the river to the two preceding days. The sons and daughters of pleasure appeared to have exhausted all their smiles, and no holiday face of nature, and the income-tax of the town of Greenwich appeared to be altogether repealed. The day was very bleak, with the wind from the E.N.E., and not a gleam of sunshine peered forth to gladden the hearts of her Majesty's subjects during the whole of the day. The absence of sunshine was marked by a corresponding absence of "small change," and a "winter of discontent" reigned in the seats of the steam-boat proprietors, shopkeepers, and locomotive dealers in cigars and brandy balls. The fair terminated without anything beyond the usual casualties.

On Wednesday night, between two and three o'clock, a boat, containing five persons, was upset in the Pool by coming in collision with some barges. Five young men, named Edward Calcot and George Stanley, met with a watery grave. The other three were fortunately saved by another party who rowed up at the moment. They were returning from Greenwich fair. It is a singular fact, that Calcot was saved from drowning no less than three times last summer.

About half-past seven on Tuesday night, great alarm was manifested on the river between Waterloo and Blackfriars-bridges, in consequence of a collision between the Vivid and Era steam-boats. From the statements of the Thames police it appears that the Vivid was on her passage up from Greenwich, loaded with passengers, and was making her way to the Waterloo-bridge pier on the Hungerford, when, upon being opposite Arundel-street, the passengers on board were suddenly alarmed by a tremendous shock, followed by a crashing noise as if the vessel was going to pieces. From the alarm and confusion which prevailed a considerable time elapsed before the cause could be ascertained, and still a considerable difficulty exists arising from the contradictory statements. It, however, appears that the Era, which had been bringing passengers from Vauxhall, was at the moment passing the Vivid, and was making for her moorings on the Arundel-street, when she struck the Vivid on her starboard bow, the Vivid having, at the first instance, sunk her stern into the Era. From the time at which the collision happened it was deemed advisable to put in shore, and the Vivid accordingly ran in the mud, and by means of boats landed her passengers many of whom got a severe ducking. The Era, at the same instant, came to her moorings, but, from the damage which she sustained, went down in the course of the night. As far as can be ascertained no lives were lost, unless any person fell off at the time the collision occurred.

EAST RIDING CRICKET CLUB.—On Wednesday last, about thirty gentlemen assembled at Beverley, for the purpose of enjoying the noble game of cricket. The ground is situated in the centre of that far-famed pasture, Westwood, commanding an extensive and beautiful view of the surrounding country. Two tents were pitched on the occasion, in one of which an excellent luncheon was provided by our old and valued friend, Mr. William Barrell, a long time caterer for the cricketers of former days. If we may judge from the first meeting, there is every prospect of the present club's outvaluing that of bye-gone times. The members are young and active, and many of them practised cricketers from the public schools of Eton, Westminster, Rugby, &c. &c. We heartily wish such an assemblage every success; and there can be little doubt of it, with a secretary so active and enthusiastic, and a committee so efficient and full of energy.

COUNTY OF GLOUCESTER ARCHERY AND CRICKET CLUB.—We understand that the Archery Meeting of this Club, on the Lansdown Course, on Wednesday, the 31st inst., in aid of the progress of furnishing the Cheltenham Gardens, has been appropriated to that purpose.

The tea plantations of Assam, it appears from the report of the company, will soon grow tea enough to supply the demands of all nations. By the end of 1845 they will produce 850,000lbs. of tea, the annual value of these will be £382,050; the charge of their cultivation, £33,100.

FIRE AT HAMBURGH.—A meeting was held in the Egyptian Hall, at the Mansion House, on Friday, for the purpose of raising subscriptions for the sufferers by the late disastrous calamity. The Lord Mayor presided, and a committee was appointed to carry the objects of the meeting into effect.

The authorities of Hamburgh have requested Mr. Lindley, the Exchange Engineer, whose exertions contributed materially to save a great portion of the town, to furnish plans for the rebuilding of the city. Mr Lindley has sent over to this country for a copy of the plan proposed by Sir Christopher Wren for the rebuilding of London after the great fire, to aid him in making out his design.

OPERATIVE EXERTIONS.—Captain Baldock, on moving the address last night, stated that the loss by the destruction of the Tower was not above £150,000, including the building, which, it seems, was in so bad a condition as to be worthless. There were 84,000 stands of arms in it, 4000 stand were saved, and 12,000 were before the fire, good for nothing. The exact loss was 78,000 stand of arms.

The Cowes Regatta is fixed for the 17th of August; four silver cups are to be given by the members of the squadron. The yachts are all getting ready for the season, and there is every prospect of its being one of the best for many years.

DARTMOUTH. A special officer from the General Post-office has been sent down here to report on the facilities offered for the establishment of the necessary offices and conveniences in the event of Dartmouth being finally chosen as the packet station, which there is every reason to believe will be the case.

MINCHINHAMPTON. This ancient parish church, of which a curious representation is in "Sir Robert Atkyns's Gloucestershire," is now being taken down, to be rebuilt on a larger scale, by Mr. Foster, architect, of Bristol. Towards this good work, the patron, David Ricardo, Esq., has munificently given £2000, and the rector, the Rev. Charles Whateley, £500; the principal inhabitants have also freely contributed. Many vestiges of bygone days have already been brought to light, and it is expected many more will be developed during the progress of the work, which is rapidly advancing.

LAUNCESTON.—The County Assize Court in this town is about to be pulled down, and a Market-house and Savings' Bank erected on the site. A double advantage will thus be gained—the removal of a very dilapidated and unsightly building, and an erection in its place which will be an additional ornament to a town already rich in objects of interest.

UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION.—Monday evening Major Shadwell Clarke presided at the usual meeting of members. Mr. Tonna read the minutes of the previous meeting, which were confirmed. He then read several communications from individuals connected with the society, and also a list of presents lately received. These presents were arms used by the enemy at Cabul, Affghanistan, Ghuznee, and the Khyber Pass, such as Affghan cuttasses, pistols, rifles, blunderbusses, carbines, matchlocks, bayonets, horse trappings, &c. They were all presented by Colonel Carmichael Smith, to whom a unanimous vote of thanks was passed for his donation. Mr. Alfred laid before the meeting samples of his newly-invented marine glue. Two blocks of wood were joined by this glue, after which they were immersed in water for a quarter of an hour, then taken up, and knocked for a long time with the greatest force against a stone floor, without being separated. Mr. Spilsbury exhibited and described a patent water-colour preservative, for rendering drawings in water-colour, crayon, or black-lead show-boards, Berlin patterns, &c., washable with soap.

SOMETHING RICH.—A portrait-painter in New York has hit off the likeness of a gentleman so exceedingly like life, that he has to shave it at least twice a week.

CRANIOLOGY.—A science that virtually professes to discover how the interior of a house is furnished, from a mere examination of the inequalities upon the roof of it.—[Sir Claudius Hunter being told by Delville that he had the bump of locality very largely developed in his cranium, innocently replied, "Ah, indeed! that's likely though, for I was fourteen years colonel of the local militia."]

The New York Morning Herald of the 9th mentions a rumour that the President, thwarted in all his plans, intended to resign his office.

The British Museum has kept up its interest to visitors during the holidays; the number of visitors on Whit Monday being 16,254; on Tuesday, 3290; and Wednesday, 3955. The total number of visitors exceeded those of last Whitsun holidays by nearly 7000. Notwithstanding the large concourse of persons on Monday, there was not a single case of damage or disorder; nor was a single person refused admission on the ground of intoxication.

STRAWBERRY HILL & HORACE WALPOLE.

Verily it would seem no slight task to present the readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS with a fitting account of the "renowned seat of Horace Walpole," and the "most distinguished gem that ever adorned the annals of auctions," were we to form an idea of the justice due to its intrinsic merits from the 250 4to-paged catalogue issued by George Robins, the prince of puffing auctioneers, whom we are informed the Earl of Waldegrave so condescendingly honoured in "selecting to sell by public competition the classic contents" of this twenty-four days' wonder.

But, as 'tis said, in the labours of the gold mines much washing and sifting is necessary to separate the baser earth from the more precious metal, so shall we exterminate, like chaff before the wind, the verboseness wherein the man of lots has revelled; thus presenting our readers with that portion comprising, as the seven-shilling catalogue informs us, the "really genuine repast for the lovers of literature and the fine arts," of which we are further acquainted "by-gone days furnish no previous example," and "it would be vain to contemplate in times to come."

Let us, however, quit the magniloquence of the "illustrious George," and fumble awhile among those dusty records, without the duly signing, sealing, and delivering of which, never would have been heard that hammer's sound, haunting at each successive stroke the groves of Twickenham—and scattering in a thousand directions that collection which Horace Walpole spent a life in accumulating and worshipping.

"Made classic by the muse of Pope"—

Strawberry Hill is called, in the old documents relating thereto, Strawberry-hill Shot, and was originally a small tenement, built in 1698 by the Earl of Bradford's coachman, by whom it was let as a lodging-house. Colley Cibber was one of its first tenants, and there wrote his comedy entitled "The Refusal, or the Lady's Philosophy." The natural beauties of the scene, and fortunately they survived the "improvable capabilities" of Walpole, occasionally tempted persons of higher rank than the facetious play-wright to adopt the place as a summer residence. It was occupied successively by Dr. Talbot, Bishop of Durham, and the Marquis of Caernarvon; then it was leased to Mrs. Chevenix, the noted toy-woman, who let a part of it to Pere Courayer, a well-known French divine of the times. Of this Mrs. Chevenix, Horace Walpole bought the remainder of the lease in 1747, and in the following year he purchased the fee-simple of the estate, which he thus humourously describes in a letter addressed to his friend Mr., afterwards Marshal Conway, the only human being for whom he ever felt as great a regard as he entertained for his china josses and mandarins.

"You perceive by my date that I am got into a new camp, and have left my tub at Windsor. It is a little plaything-house I have got out of this Chevenix's shop, and it is the prettiest bauble (the auctioneer has since dignified it with the name of a gem) you ever saw. It is set in enamelled meadows, with filagree hedges;

A small Euphrates through the piece is roll'd,
And little fishes wave their wingsin gold.

Two delightful roads that you would call dusty, supply me continually with coaches and chaises; barges as solemn as barons of the Exchequer, move under my window; Richmond-hill and Ham-walks bound my prospects; but, thank God, the Thames is between me and the Duchess of Queensbury. Dowagers, as plenty as flounders, inhabit all around; and Pope's ghost is just now skimming under my window, by a most poetical moonlight. The Chevenix's had tricked the cottage up for themselves Up two pair of stairs is what they call Mr. Chevenix's library, furnished with three maps, one shelf, a bust of Sir Isaaac Newton, and a lunar telescope without glasses"

Such is Walpole's description of the toy he bought of Mrs. Chevenix, and which, by a principle of association that seems to have constantly haunted him, he set about converting into a curiosity museum. What the place resembled before his alterations, adaptations, and contrivances, there is no means of learning; but it is now a miniature gothic gimcrack, composed of round towers, long galleries, yellow and blue chambers, starred boudoirs, bodkin like pinnacles, and gingerbread battlements covered with a now worn-out coat of rough-cast stucco, overlooking the Thames from one side and a dusty road from the other. We had heard much of this "gem" before the sale induced us to visit it; but having seen Chatsworth and Blenheim, have no difficulty in persuading ourselves that there really is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous.

Strawberry Hill, however, was the place that exactly suited the tastes of Walpole: it was situated in a neighbourhood of celebrities. Almost upon its threshold lived, in a small cottage forming part of the estate, Franklin, the printer of the "Craftsman," who had been imprisoned more than once for Pulteney's attacks upon Horace Walpole's father. The very suggestiveness of the association of ideas to which he became an enthusiast, afterwards induced Walpole to establish a private printing press. "Can there," he says in one of his letters, "be an odder revolution than that the printer of the 'Craftsman' should live in a cottage of mine, and the author of the 'Craftsman' write a panegyric upon a house of mine?" alluding to the ballad by the Earl of Bath, which we shall give our readers hereafter. Garrick was another of his neighbours: "the spirit of the whispering-gallery," whom Walpole admitted possessed great social resources, but confessed at the same time that he liked his wife better. Paul Whitehead, the poet, and Admiral Byron, who discovered the Patagonians, and published the narrative upon which the shipwreck in "Don Juan" was partially founded; these, with Hudson, the painter, Mrs. Pritchard, the actress, and last, but not least, Kitty Clive, dwelt right and left of him. Mrs. Clive appears to have been an especial favourite; she had a budget of anecdotes about the players and dramatists that must have amused Walpole, and have helped him wonderfully through the twilight, when it was getting too dark for him to arrange his last purchases of china, or work away at his niches and pedestals. He loved the sex for gossip, but not a whit beyond, and must have shrunk from the idea of a Mrs. Horace Walpole—if ever it presented itself. He would as soon have seen a bull in his china shop as have taken a wife to grace his Gothic halls. In one of his letters to Lord Hertford he says, "The Duchess of Bedford asked me before Madame de Guerchy if I would not give them a ball at Strawberry? Not for the universe! What! turn a ball, and dust, and dirt, and a million of candles, into my charming new gallery! I said, I could not flatter myself that people would give themselves the trouble of going eleven miles for a ball (though I believe they would go fifty). 'Well, then,' says she, 'it shall be a dinner.' With all my heart, I have no objection; but no ball shall set its foot within my doors."

The lack of constitutional vigour to become a politician, and the fear of mixing too much with men of letters and of the world, led Walpole to fall back upon his baubles, and the society of a few old ladies, who took all his criticisms for granted, were charmed at his wit, astonished at his antiquities, and deferential to his aristocracy. The clique was composed of my Lady Suffolk, Lady Diana Beauclerk, and the roystering Clive. With the Marquise du Deffand, the old, blind, but clever leader of French society, he became acquainted late in her life. Her devotion for him appears to have been very great, and is sometimes expressed in her letters with the warmth and a tenderness which Walpole, thinking absurd in a person of her years, frequently reproved very harshly.

His chief male acquaintances were Field-Marshal Conway and Gray the poet. The latter realized Walpole's notion of a poet: he could talk about Greek sculpture, Roman urns, and Egyptian mummies; was erudite, cautious, and with a fine chaste enthusiasm and a private fortune; which to Walpole was a grand point, for he wanted all his money for nick-nacks, and was never known to have shown the least generosity of disposition, excepting when his cousin Conway was in disgrace, with whom he offered to share the income of his sinecures.

Besides Conway and Gray, it appears Mason the poet, George Selwyn, Lord Edgcumbe, Lord Strafford, Richard Bentley, with Sir Horace Mann, and a few others, were among the friends whom he occasionally received, or with whom he corresponded. In person, Horace Walpole was short and slender, but compact and neatly formed. His laugh was forced and uncouth; and even his smile was not the most pleasing. His walk was occasionally enfeebled from the gout, which, although his life was marked by temperate habits, attacked him as early as his twenty-fifth year. He was fond of sitting up late "scribbling my painters," as he says in one of his letters, or gossiping with the ladies. In his rambles he was generally attended by a favorite little dog, the legacy of the Marquise du Deffand, which indolence and overfeeding had rendered so fat, it could scarcely waddle. His favourite beverages were coffee and iced water. He was considered effeminate in his attention to his person, which he once explained by saying, "My back is the same with my face, and my neck is like my nose." Occasionally he chatted through the long evenings at Mrs. Clive's, who was regarded as his chere amie, but there is little doubt the charms of her conversation formed the chief attraction. She presented him with a mother-of-pearl card-case, which formed part of the Strawberry Hill Collection, and he wrote the following lines, which were inscribed on an urn erected to her memory:—

"Ye smiles and jests still hover round
Thalia's consecrated ground
Here oft the natal-day-loving flame,
A matchless actress' Clive her name.
The scene made wit, her retired
And shed a tear when she expired."

Two years after Walpole had taken up his abode at Strawberry Hill he was nearly killed by the accidental discharge of a highwayman's pistol, who had robbed him. He has given a humorous description of the affair in The World, a paper to which he communicated several numbers. Among the many foreigners who visited Walpole, was the celebrated Abbe Raynal, who was accompanied by several Frenchmen of rank. They were standing at one of the windows, looking at the prospect to the Thames, which they found flat, when one of them, thinking that none of the guests overheard him, exclaimed, "Everything in England only serves to recommend France to us the more." Walpole and Mr. Churchill were both within hearing; and the latter, stepping up to the groun, replied, "Gentlemen, when the Cherokees were in England they still lived on their favourite train oil."

Quit we then Horace Walpole Earl of Orford, and strolling through his favourite retreat, mark out for our readers the most interesting of the thousand and one glittering curiosities that have slept almost in silence and obscurity for nearly half a century, to be awakened by the hammer of the auctioneer, and sold by his puffs. Could it be permitted for the punctilious collector, who would never allow more than four of the British public to tread the sacred precincts of the temple of his idolatry on any one day, now to behold the hourly desecration of a thousand footsteps—could he but witness its Gothic screens and stained glass windows, its gorgeous armour, costly tapestry, and priceless missals,—its pictures and sculptures, its bronzes and carvings, its urns and vases, its enamels and miniatures, that while he lived could only be gazed at through a glass, but now branded with the "Lot" of the auctioneer, and pawed by the mobs that daily assemble at his abode enough "to press a royal mansion down;"—could he behold all this, and know that what he spent a life in gathering together is now being dispersed to pay thedebts of a spendthrift descendant, his ghost would skim across the lawn, as he says Pope's did, but doubtless in no such poetic mood, and take itself to the chapel, there to anathematize all concerned in the destruction of his household gods.

Passing the hall and passage, and ascending the staircase to the armoury, we find in a niche the suit of armour worn by Francis I. It is a small suit of polished steel, and inlaid with gold. Walpole says, "It must have been used for tilting: it is not strong enough for battle." He is also said to have remarked, smiling, "You see little men may be great men." He was himself small in stature.

In the star-chamber, which is a small ante-room leading to the Holbein-room and Great Gallery, we find but one object of interest—It is a bust of Henry VIII., executed by Torregiano for his tomb. Passing from thence to the Holbein-chamber, so called from its chiefly containing the paintings and carvings of Hans Holbein, we come to the red hat of Wolsey, the haughty primate, who, not content to wear the beaver of a cardinal, twice sought in vain the papal chair, and whose restless ambition alternately won and lost for him the highest favours of his Sovereign. But the collection is rich in relics of the bluff King Hal, whose gallantry is conspicuously set forth in the little clock of silver gilt which he presented to Anne Boleyn on the morning of his marriage. It is richly chased and engraved, and ornamented with fleurs de lis, &c. On the top is placed a lion bearing the arms of England. The weights are chased with the initials of Henry and Anne within true lover's knots. One bears the inscription, "The most happye," the other, the royal motto. Poor Anne Boleyn! she little thought, when Catherine gave place to her, she would so soon have to give place to another. Married in a garret at the western end of Whitehall, and four years afterwards this poor object of Henry's eternal love was sacrificed on the scaffold at the Tower. The clock still goes, but the last hour it should have tolled was poor Anne's fatal knell.

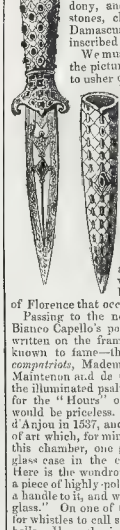
Next let us speak of Henry's dagger—a fitting weapon for one who never spared a man in his anger nor a woman in his lust. It is about a foot long; the handle and sheath are superb, being of chalcedony, and set with nearly a hundred and forty stones, chiefly rubies interlaced with gold. The Damascus blade is wrought in open work, and is inscribed on one side with Arabic characters.

We must pass the miniatures of Zincke and Petitot, the pictures of Rembrandt, Hogarth and Sir Joshua, to usher our readers into that Grand Gallery where-in is deposited the richest treasures of Strawberry, and where Walpole would not have given a ball for the universe. The bust of Vespasian and the Roman eagle, from their massiveness, are among the foremost objects that attract attention. Among the pictures is the portrait of Lady Falkland, in white, by Van Somer, which suggested to Walpole the incident of the picture walking out of its frame in the Castle of Otranto."



A peep round the drawing-room at the extremity of the gallery, shows us some of the best of the stained windows, and above the rich mosaic chimney-piece are arranged a goodly row of silver beakers, valuable for their weight of metal alone, beyond the china of Sevre and the Faenza of Florence that occupy the same apartment.

Passing to the north chamber, we find on the one side Bianco Capello's portrait, by Vasari, with her singular story written on the frame, and on the other another one better known to fame—the fascinating Nimon de l'Enclos. Her compatriots, Mademoiselle de la Valiere, and Mesdames de Maintenon and de Grammont are near her. In this room is the illuminated psalter, the work of Julio Clovio, which, but for the "Hours" of Anne of Brittany, preserved at Paris, would be priceless. It was executed by Clovio for the Prince d'Anjou in 1537, and is a small, thick M.S., executed in a style of art which, for minuteness, surpasses belief. Before we leave this chamber, one glance must be bestowed upon the little glass case in the corner, which is full of the marvellous. Here is the wondrous speculum of the renowned Dr. Dee, a piece of highly-polished cannel coal, of a circular form, with a handle to it, and worthy of being called "the Devil's looking-glass." On one of the shelves stand the four silver owls, used for whistles to call servants before the introduction of handbells. Here also is the pipe-case of the Dutch admiral, Van Trump, in which he carried his pipes when he put out to sea, it is formed of tortoise-shell, and curiously inlaid and studded with silver.

Entering the tribune we meet with some of the most valuable objects of the collection. The cabinet and glass-cases are loaded with trinkets and relics. Among the latter, gleaming with gold and jewels, is the missal painted by Raffaelle and his scholars, for Queen Claude, wife of Francis I. It is covered with torquoises and rubies, and the sides are chiefly composed of two enormous cornelians, the one an intaglio of the crucifixion, the other a relievo.

Of the numerous trinkets, perhaps the most curious is one of the seven mourning rings given after the death of Charles I. The motto, "Prepared be to follow me," is inscribed around the inside of the ring. The famous Florentine boar, the Jupiter Serapis, and the hunting-horn of rich Limoges enamel, we can only mention; and as space compels us to draw to a close, we shall finish our notice with the silver bell made by Benvenuto Cellini for Pope Clement VII. It is a mass of carving in the highest relievo, representing antique masques, serpents, flies, grasshoppers and various insects, covering its surface; the Virgin and child, with angels, at the top; and a wreath of leaves and lizards at the base. Walpole says of it—"One of the pieces in my collection which I the most highly value, is the silver bell, with which the Pope used to curse the caterpillars, a ceremony I believe now abandoned. For this bell I exchanged with the Marquis of Rockingham all my Roman coins in large brass. Cellini was one of the most extraordinary men in an extraordinary age. His life, written by himself, is more amusing than any novel I know."

Before quitting the house, we must pause to admire the splendid picture of Sir Joshua, representing the three Ladies Waldegrave, which is the most valuable painting of the collection. Walpole observes, "Sir Joshua gets avaricious in his old age. My picture of the young Ladies Waldegrave is, doubtless, very fine and graceful, but it cost me 800 guineas."

We shall not stop to bestow our contempt upon the trumpery crockery which obstructs our egress, and proves that the secret of Walpoles taste was quantity, not quality; but we must hasten to the rostrum where George Robins's eloquence is made piquant by the running observations, or rather the running commentary, of his "facetious friend in the white neckcloth."

But the sale is over for the day, and Redbreast, glowing with satisfaction at the amount he has drawn from the pockets of his audience, and puffing, as is his nature, from the effects of his exertions, descends from the rostrum, and ensconcing himself in the "little back parlour," is fully persuaded, as he revolves in his mind the biddings of the day, that every lot of the auctioneer, as Walpole's father said of every man, has its price.

The verses by the Earl of Bath, that Walpole called "a panegyric," and to which we have before alluded, cannot be better accompanied than with the following tribute to the Prince of Auctioneers:—

STRAWBERRY HILL v. GEORGE ROBINS.

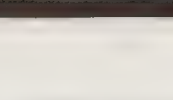
STRAWBERRY HILL.	GEORGE ROBINS.
Some cry up Gunnersbury, For Nose some declare, And some say that with Chiswick House No villa can compare. But ask the Beaux of Middlesex, Who know the country well, If STRAWBERRY HILL—if STRAWBERRY HILL Don't bear away the bell?	Some they cry up Caversham, For Topics some declare, And some say that with Shuttock Hall No other can compare, But ask the Jews and brokers all. Who know our hero well, If Robins George at Knock'ems down Don't bear away the bell?
Some love to roll down Greenwich Hill For this thing and for that; And some prefer sweet Marble Hill, Though sure, 'tis somewhat flat: Yet Marble Hill and Greenwich Hill If Kitty Clive was to tell, From STRAWBERRY HILL — from STRAWBERRY HILL Will never bear the bell!	Some love to hear Jones's Patter o'Dialogues, for that, And some go to the Rotary mart Where they often catch a flat, Yet hath at George's auction Ge him but leave to sell, At "going once" and "going twice" Will bear away the bell.
Though Surrey boasts its Oatlands And Claremont lent to pin, And some prefer sweet Southcote's, 'Tis but a dairy farm, For ask the genial Brunsar, Who does to taste excel, If STRAWBERRY HILL—if STRAWBERRY HILL Don't bear away the bell?	Though some may boast of Lofchild, Or Allen Davis slum, And others cry up Southgate, Yet still we think of them Who, "instructed" by Lord Wallsgrave The classic store to sell, By Robins's mill from Strawberry Hill, Do bear away the Bell.
Since Denham sung of Cooper's There's scarce a hill unsung But what in song or ditty Is turned to fairy ground. Ah, pence be with their memories! I wish them wondrous well, But STRAWBERRY HILL beats all STRAWBERRY HILL Must bear away the bell!	Since first George Robins' mast-head sale, There's not a seat been found But what by nothing parsnops He'd turn to fairy ground Good luck attend the purchasers, We wish them wondrous well, No feather sure will grace their cap, But many a little bell.
Great William dwelt at Windsor, As EDWARD did at Shene, And many a Gaul and many a Scot, Have found him full as bold On lofty hills like WINDSOR, Some heroes ought to dwell; Yet little folks like STRAWBERRY HILL,— Like STRAWBERRY HILL as well!	George Robins sells up Strawberry, Where Walpole dwelt of old, And folks say that at Strawberry The Wallsgrave was sold.* On such a noble lot as this We think not for her dwell, But, leaving George and Strawberry Hill, But him and it farewell!

* We do not know whether this alludes to the noble lord or Sir Joshua's picture.

THE INDIAN MAIL.—The following notice has been posted up at the General Post office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, and at the branch receiving-offices in Lombard-street, Charing-cross, and Blackman-street, Borough:—"Notice—The next mail for India, &c., via Marseilles, will be made up at the General Post-office on the 4th of June. The next mails for Malta, Greece, the Ionian Islands, Egypt, and India, via Falmouth, will be despatched from the General Post-office on the 31st of May."



LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.—Monday, May 16

[Sittings at Nisi Prius, before Mr. Baron Parke, at Guildhall.]

LAWSON AND OTHERS v. MANGLES AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Thesiger, Mr. Sanders, and Mr. H. Hill were counsel for the plaintiffs; Mr. D. Hill and Mr. James appeared for the defendants.

The plaintiffs are the assignees of Messrs. Shepherd and Drew, who formerly conducted the Star Hotel at Southampton, and this was an action in which they sought to recover the sum of £953 4s. 2d. from the defendants, Messrs. Mangles and Hutchins, the amount of their election account with the bankrupts on the occasion of the last contest for Southampton, in which it may be remembered that the defendants stood on the Liberal interest and were beaten by Lord Bruce and Mr. Martyn. The defendants, in answer to this demand, pleaded payment of £200, and denied their liability ultra that sum. The question therefore was, whether any and what sum was due from either or both of those gentlemen beyond the £200; and it appeared that a former action having been brought against Mr. Hutchins alone, that gentleman had pleaded in abatement the non-joinder of Captain Mangles therein; before this that action was abandoned and the present one commenced against both the candidates. In support of the plaintiffs case, the bankrupts and their whole establishment were called, and from their account it appeared that several rooms were engaged at the Star by the agents of the Whigs prior to the dissolution of the Parliament, from that time (29th of May) to the termination of the election, whenever that might happen, for £250. One room was devoted exclusively to the committee, but that and all the other rooms were shown to have been constantly used for electioneering purposes, including breakfasts, luncheons, dinners, tea, and supper, during the whole of the time from the 29th of May to the 1st of July, on which latter day the election took place. Independently of this item, the rest of the bill was devoted to eating and drinking, and wound up with

Ribands	..	..	..	..	..	..	£1 15 0
Laurel	..	..	..	..	..	..	0 10 0
Broken windows	..	..	..	..	..	..	0 18 0
And broken glass, &c.	..	..	..	..	..	..	0 0 0

In order to connect the defendants with this demand, various pieces of evidence were adduced, by which it was sought to be shown, that both were cognizant of the existence of the "general election account," and of the expenditure incurred by the occupants of the several rooms—to which it appeared that eatables and drinkables to the extent of £120., or thereabouts, had been supplied on the last day of polling alone. The system, indeed, was carried to such a pitch, that drawers, who said "the tap ran faster than they did," and landlords too, volunteered expressed their fear that it was "too much," and about four o'clock one man said that "our rooms and the passages were covered a foot deep with the supplies." Mr. Hill, in addressing the jury for the defendants, took occasion to remark, that they ought to require as strong proof of liability on the part of the defendants to pay this bill, as they would had they been trying the validity of the election, supposing Messrs. Mangles and Hutchins had been returned; for the evidence as to the "treating" was quite sufficient, if brought home to a member, to unseat him on petition. Under these circumstances the bankrupts were bound to make out some clear orders for the supply, in respect of which this action was brought. Was the plaintiffs had failed to do so, for every item in the account to have been managed by the head-waiter in the most profuse and reckless manner, without the sanction or knowledge of the candidates, who, as soon as they were applied to, had positively ordered that such a system should be abandoned. His learned friend then summed up the evidence, and explained the law to the jury, and left it over in their hands to say whether both or either of the defendants were liable, the pleadings being so framed as to admit of their apportioning their verdict. The jury, however, almost directly returned a verdict for the plaintiffs against both defendants jointly, for the sum of £453 4s. 2d., being the whole balance claimed from the defendants.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—Tuesday

[Before the Recorder.]

Charlotte Drake, aged 17, was indicted for stealing six silver spoons, a watch, and other articles, the property of Samuel Syred; and William Tolhurst, 20, and Margaret Berry, 43, were charged with having received part of the same, knowing it to have been stolen. The prosecution was conducted by Mr. Doane, and the prisoners were defended by Messrs. Bodkin and Payne. It appeared from the evidence, that the prisoner Drake lodged in the house of the prosecutor, and took an opportunity of opening a box, and stealing the property named in the indictment. The only article alleged to have been received by the other prisoners was the watch, and the only evidence against them was admissions alleged to have been made by them to a constable of the D division of police, of the name of Tolhurst. This witness, who therefore must have appeared to have constituted himself in a most unjustifiable manner, stated, upon his cross-examination by Mr. Phillips, that after Gowland and Berry were locked up at the station-house, he went to their lodgings and made a minute inventory of valuable property which had nothing whatever to do with the charge preferred against them; and that with respect to a great portion of that property, he had made no mention of it to his inspector, nor to any other person, in further attendance that day he still retained possession of the property. The Recorder summed up at some length, and after making some severe observations on the conduct of Tolhurst, left it to the jury to say whether they could place any reliance upon his evidence with respect to the prisoners Gowland and Berry. The jury returned a verdict of guilty against Drake, but acquitted the other prisoners. The Recorder said the conduct of Tolhurst was a very improper one, that he should not be allowed his expenses; at the same time, he thought it was a case which ought to be thoroughly investigated by the police commissioners. It was highly improper for any constable to go to the residence of persons charged with any crime, and carry away a quantity of valuable property which had no reference whatever to the charge preferred against them; and it was still more suspicious when it appeared that he had given no account of the property taken, to his superior officer or any other person. He could only speak of the case as it appeared before the court, and he did not wish to prejudge the accusable conduct, but he could not help expressing his opinion, that it was a proceeding which ought to be inquired into, and he had no doubt a proper investigation would take place. The general conduct of the police was most praiseworthy, and it was necessary, in the case of any misconduct on their part, that where individual cases of misconduct were detected, they should be most rigidly investigated. Mr. Phillips said it was the intention of the parties to indict the constable for a robbery; he could assure the court there was a deal more property taken than had been mentioned. Tolhurst said that, whatever might be the impression of the court, he had no doubt that he could give a satisfactory explanation of his conduct. The Recorder said he should not prejudge the case, but he would advise him, when the inquiry did take place, to be prepared to show that he mentioned the circumstance of having taking a quantity of valuable property from the prisoners lodgings, and that he had given a list of the articles to his superior officer in order to prove that they would be forthcoming at the proper time. The learned Judge postponed passing sentence.

POLICE.

Marlborough-street.—Too much Punch, or a Ring too Much.—Complaint having been made to Mr. Maltby by Miss Nelly Taylor, a smart little Irish lass, that she had received a "punch" on her shoulder while on a visit to her aunt in Cambridge-street, Mrs. Byrne, the pawnbroker, was constrained to appear in this court to answer to the charge. The complainant deposed that she was dispatched to the chandler's shop for a candle. Returning back with her short six, she rang the bell twice for admittance. The bell was answered by Mrs. Byrnson, who, finding the ring was for the aunt occupying the room opposite, put into a passion, and very ungallantly threatened to "rap the door in her face" she ever came with two rings more. Complainant's aunt, hearer of these words, came out of her room to defend her niece: Mrs Byrne rushed forward to take the part of her son; and after the ladies had tired their tongues in scolding, complainant was just going into her aunt's room when she received the punch aforesaid, by which, though she admitted it did not do her much damage, the candle nevertheless sustained a compound fracture by being knocked out of her hand. Mrs. Byrne, attended by her son Jerry, a lanky young man, who evidently thought no "small beer" of himself, here entered upon her defence. "Your worship, I'm four years in the house, and have always had two rings." Son.—Order, order. Mrs. Byrne.—That is, the two rings is for my son, which is the same thing. Son.—Hear, hear, hear. Mrs. Byrne.—But this young woman will ring twice, and when I told her that was not her aunt's ring she called me a lying old bigot. Mr Maltoy.—But did you strike her first? Mrs. Byrne.—How could I when I was in my own room? Aunt.—Our mats touches, there's only a yard between the doors. Son. Order, order. It's only twenty seven inches. Mr. Maltby.—You seem to be particular as to the distance; pray, have you measured it? Son.—I have; after the row. Mr. Maltby.—Then, as you were present, I'll hear anything you have to say. Son.—I will, certainly. The complainant then went to the court and jury, touching the matter in question between these parties, shall be the truth. Mr. Maltby.—I suppose you have been a witness before now? Son.—Oh, no; but I am well acquainted, as you see, with the nature of these things. Now, your worship, anybody as wants me comes with two rings, and on that very day I was called away in the middle of my profession three times when I wasn't wanted. The first time was to the cat's-meat man in the morning; the next time was to the milkwoman in the afternoon; and the third time was to this young woman with her candle. Now, each of these people ought to have given only one ring. Aunt.—One rung for the Joneses in the garret. Son.—Order, order. The knocker's for the Joneses. Mrs. Byrne.—Two rings is for us, one ring's for you, three rings for the Browns in the back parlour. Aunt.—I see two knocks and rings is for the Browns, and two rings and a knock for the —— Mr. Maltby.—Well, no matter. Would it not be better if one of you found another lodging? Son.—Impossible I can move. My business lays on the Continent. The people of Paris would not know where to find me. Mr. Maltby.—Pray, what is your business? Son.—Leather breeches-maker. Aunt.—Order. He's a tailor. Son (furiously).—I deny it. I'm a breeches-maker, and no tailor. I can bring witnesses from England, Ireland, and Scotland to prove I'm no tailor. There's my card, and that will settle the business. Mr. Fitzpatrick took the card, and found set forth in large letters that J. Byrne made leather breeches and trousers, and in small letters repairs were neatly executed. Son. That's the way with this woman. When she wants to take away my character she calls me a tailor; she says I'm only a mistaken scurvy tailor, when all the world knows I'm a leather breeches-maker. Mr. Fitzpatrick.—There's no disgrace in being a tailor, Son.—Perhaps not; but there's a vast difference between a tailor and a breeches-maker. Mr. Maltby considering the assault proved, fined the mother ten shillings. "There's the money, said the son, in a rage, "but the case shan't rest here. I'll carry it into another court; I'll not let it drop till I make this woman aware of the difference between a tailor and a leather breeches-maker like me." So saying, the breeches-maker bounced out of court.

Marylebone.—A Bite at a Peach, or how to cure Fits.—On Wednesday, a respectably dressed young man, named Charles Davis, was brought before Mr. Long, charged with having assaulted Mrs. Eliza Peach. Complainant stated that, on the previous evening, she went to the Eyre's tea-gardens, Bayswater, accompanied by a female friend, and that after sitting for some time in the crowded room, she fainted, and was carried out into the grounds by two or three persons, who imagined that a branch of fresh air would revive her; she was placed upon a seat, and as soon as she "came to," she found that she was bleeding from a severe wound which the prisoner had inflicted upon her finger with his teeth She afterwards saw him in custody. Mr. Long.—Was the prisoner known to you? Complainant.—Quite so, your worship. Mr. Long.—When he came up to you did he make any observation? Complainant.—Nothing, that I know of, Sir; I was nearly insensible when I was removed from the room. Mr. Long.—How do you know that it was the prisoner who bit you? Complainant.—There can't be any mistake about it, Sir; for when I recovered a bit, he had my finger then in his mouth. Mary Cox proved that she saw the prisoner bite complainant, as she had described. Mr. Long (to the prisoner).—This is very extraordinary conduct of yours. What have you to say to it? Prisoner.—The lady was sitting outside, fainting, and I certainly did bite her to bring her round. I could have had no ill-feeling towards her, and am sorry if I have done her any harm. Mr. Long.—What could have induced you to resort to so strange a mode of cure? Prisoner.—I have known it to do good, Sir, in many instances, and have often cured my own wife of fainting fits in a similar way. Mr. Long gave him to understand that the biting of ladies fingers was no joke, and inflicted upon him the penalty of 1*l.* or the assault.

Worship street.—On Tuesday, Joshua Newborn, a young man about 25 years of age, whose swarthy visage was tattooed like a native of New Zealand, was placed at the bar before Mr. J. Bingham, upon a charge of being drunk and disorderly during the police. Mr. Bingham asked if he understood English? Serjeant Farbert said the prisoner was a Londoner, born near St. Luke's Church; but it appeared from his own account of himself, that he had been made prisoner by the New Zealanders, and had passed several years amongst them, after having succeeded to be tattooed like one of themselves. The prisoner's narrative was the following effect:—About 11 years back, he was a boy on board a whaler called the Marquis of Lansdowne, but during an outward voyage was seized with typhus fever, and put with others on board a schooner, to be conveyed to port. He and his companions, however, fell into the hands of the savages by whom the vessel was all, in a short time, destroyed and (we understood him) eaten, except himself; but he having been reserved till the last, his life was spared, upon his consenting to be marked and to live with them. He accordingly underwent the painful process of tattooing, preparatory to which, however, they administered to him some narcotic, to render him less sensible to the pain of the operation. He was with them nearly ten years altogether, and frequently engaged with them in their battles with hostile tribes, after which contests the prisoners were commonly killed and eaten by the native captors. He had no wife amongst them, but had formed one since his return to England, and has lately been exhibited as a New Zealand chief at places of public amusement. A police-constable of the N division stated, that while on duty at a late hour on Monday night, he heard an extraordinary kind of yelling in Hoxton-square, and proceeding to the spot found the prisoner dancing about, and disturbing the neighbours with his wild and terrific cries. The prisoner, who was drunk, instead of desisting, and going away as desired, set his witness and other constables at defiance, and after a violent resistance was lodged in the station-house. Sergeant Lambert said, that he was exceedingly violent at the station-house, and vowed vengeance against the constable who took him there, threatening to feast upon his heart, and "lick his chops with his blood;" and during the greater part of the night he appeared to be dancing the war-dance in the cell, and screeching at the top of his voice. The prisoner, whom the New Zealanders had named "Moika Makoura," the meaning of which he stated to be "the tattooed spirit, now expressed his sorrow for his disorderly conduct. He very seldom drank spirits, but when he did, he said it made him quite wild; and a friend whom he met on Monday had made him drink some. Mr. Bingham told him he must be aware that such conduct could not be permitted; and if he got drunk and committed himself even in New Zealand, he would have to bear the consequence of his misconduct. He must pay five shillings for getting drunk. The prisoner, who had no money, was locked up until the close of the business, and then discharged.

The Payment of the Chelsea Pensioners.—During the last day or two, a circular issued from Chelsea Hospital has been sent round to the several officers on half-pay of the rank of captain, offering them an appointment of superintendent as regards the payment of those persons who have been in the army, and for length of services, who are in a receipt of a pension, the old system of paying the pensioners at Chelsea Hospital and Oxford Market being now in the course of being discontinued. The alteration in the system has been occasioned from the circumstance that, hitherto, the pensioners, upon receiving the reward of their hard and honourable services, become the dupes of the many that latest the places of payment To abolish an evil which the police cannot grapple with the following plan is about to be carried into effect: The superintendent is to have under his control a thousand pensioners, whom he is to visit monthly at their respective residences, for the purpose of paying them their pensions, and for which he is to receive, independently of his half-pay, 4*s.* 7*d.* per day; he is also to receive the sum of 2*s.* daily, for the payment of the rent of two rooms; 3*s.* per day for the providing forage for his horse; 10*s.* per month for stationery, &c.; the formal bye-laws printed; 2*s.* per day for the incidental expenses of an attendant, who is to be a discharged sergeant, an allowance for rations, &c., the whole of which, independent of his half-pay, will be somewhere about £160 per annum. Other regulations are to be adopted, but which at present are not sufficiently defined. Upon the plan being carried into effect, a notice will be sent to the whole body of pensioners, who, in return, will have to forward their address to the officer who is appointed to pay them. The new pian will also have another beneficial effect, that of actually ascertaining that the person who is entitled to the pension is still living, as well as of his place of residence; for on no account is he to receive the money at any other place than where he is living.

The Killeagh mills, in the county of Cork, were totally destroyed by fire on the 11th instant, the property was insured to the amount of £4000, which will cover the loss.

Printing.—Charles the Second's parliament passed an act that only 20 printers should practise their art in the kingdom About six shillings current was past for one and a half hour's reading in 1685.

Snuff.—The editor of the American Traveller thinks that the best snuff in the world is a snuff of the morning air.

It is stated in a recent letter from the United States, that a vessel is now loading cotton for China.

A Patriarchal Magistrate.—A French journal publishes the following police regulations, issued by the Mayor of Lorris, near Montargis:—"Police regulations relative to public balls —We, Mayor of Lorris, having considered the improprieties which prevail in the public ball-room, have ordained and do ordain as follows: Art 1. Having considered the accidents which have occurred from the manner in which dancing has been conducted for some time past, it is expressly forbidden from this day forward to dance the galop, under a penalty of from 5*f.* to 10*f.*, to be paid by the musicians who shall play such a dance. 2. Having remarked how many young females fall whilst dancing the figure called pastorelle, and not having it in our power to suppress the foresaid figure, it is forbidden to turn so quickly, to jump, or to strike with the two feet.—Roi Lay, Mayor."

A celebrated coachmaker in Oxford-street has received orders for two of the most elegant and fashionable town carriages to be made for the court of Russia that this country can produce We are told that the style and elegance of the whole reflect great credit upon the artists of our country.

Great difficulty is often experienced in calculating the number of stamps which should be placed on heavy letters. The best way to do this is to ascertain the highest number of ounces a letter exceeds, and then double the next higher figure above that number, which will give the number of pence which is charged for the pre-paid postage of that letter Thus a letter weighing above four oz., and under five oz., by doubling the five it gives the correct amount of postage, 10*d.*, which is very agreeable on such a letter The postage of letters not weighing more than a half-ounce is one penny; not weighing more than an ounce 2*d.* The postage on letters above an ounce advances 2*d.* in arithmetical progression. No sum is charged for postage that is expressed by an odd number above 1*d.* Thus, there is no such postage as three, five, seven, or nine-penny, &c., postage, as many suppose.

The Public Asylum.—It is a great solid building, spacious, and well ventilated; or this also there is a quasi, or society of ladies of the first families, who devote themselves to teaching the female malefactors. It is painful and almost cardiac to see the real ladies in Mexico familiarly conversing with, and embracing women who have been guilty of the most atrocious crimes, especially of murdering their husbands, which is the chief crime of the female prisoners. There are no duels as among them, and probably not one who has committed a premeditated crime. A moment of idiosy during intoxication, violent passions without any curb, suddenly aroused and as suddenly extinguished have led to these fatal results. We were first shown into a large and tolerably clean apartment, where were the female prisoners who are kept apart, as being of a more decent family than the rest. Some were lying on the floor, others working some were well dressed, others dirty and slovenly. Few looked sad; most appeared careless and happy, and none seemed ashamed. Amongst them were some of the handsomest faces I have seen in Mexico. One good-looking common woman, with a most joyous and benevolent countenance, and lame, came up to salute the ladies I inquired where she had done. She rendered her husband perfectly hors mode the brick floor.' Shade of Lavater! It is some comfort to hear that their husbands were generally such brutes they deserved little better! Amongst others confined here his the wife, or rather the widow of a governor of Mexico, who made away with her husband We did not see her; and they say she generally keeps out of the way when strangers come. One very pretty and coquettish little woman, with a most intellectual face, and very superior looking, hemmed in next relation, of Count ——s, is in goal on suspicion of having poisoned her lover A beautiful young creature, extremely like Mrs. ——, of Boston, was among the prisoners. I did not hear what her crime was. We were attended by a woman who has the title of mayordoma, and who, after some years of good conduct, has now the charge of her fellow-prisoners; but she also murdered her husband.—Life in Mexico.

The Streets of London.—The greatest improvement that ever took place in an equal space of time is the introduction of the system of paving the streets with wood A common cab which in ancient days clattered and thundered along in a hurricane of noise and a deluge of mud, now glides peacefully on "with a soft and gentle motion," till you fear that you are, by some unaccountable process in a horseless carriage hung with the most limber of springs, and lined with the softest cloth. It only on being suddenly emerged at the end of your journey that you find out the delusion. Omnibuses are now quite inoffensive vehicles, not unlike Venetian gondolas in the noiselessness and uniformity of their motion. There is a long line of wooden pavement in Oxford-street, which always puts us in mind of the Clyde. In sailing in certain states of the wind down that noble estuary, you are in water as calm as a mill-pond, and locked in all round by sheltering hills and beautiful projecting islands. Pleasure it is to watch the vessel gliding at its own sweet will, without a ripple on either side, as she cleaves her course, as evenly, and under her own impulse, as if placed in her speed, that you almost doubt whether she is not motionless as some white-wing'd swan asleep on some island lake; and yet the movement of her easy progress is perhaps increased by the sight of a great black-bodied, white crested sea, howling and tumbling beyond the clear palluoid water on which you are at present gliding. Shorter grows the distance between you and the tumultuous agony of waves and breakers every minute, till at last slap forward the vessel dashes into the tunnel, and creaks, and pitches, and jerks, and bubbles, and reels, and quivers, till you have an impression that some detestable demon of the storm, or rather spirit of evil, has walked down your throat, and is in the very act of turning you inside out Such and so great is the difference you experience when the omnibus leaves the wood pavement, and crashes and jolts along the hard and uneven causeway, or ploughs and struggles along the stone-covered Macadam It is the reward of Macadam must erase a detestation of the great concrete of mud, and dust, and noise, which constitutes his road, and sott tinglings of an affection more than paternal to the sylvan nymph who comes "from Scottish or Norwegian hills," to make our streets as level as a drawing-room floor, and as noiseless as a soiree at the insurrection for the deaf and dumb.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Interior of a Convent.—The most interesting part of the convent was the chapel, in a corner of which is a large glass coffin, containing the embalmed body of Donna Clara, dressed in a rich robe of blue silk and silver. The body had remained two hundred years under ground, before it was taken up and placed in the coffin it now occupies. The marks of the hot oil are still plainly visible on the dry, parchment looking face of the corpse. When first the curtain was withdrawn which concealed the dried-up remains of the lady whose beauty and misfortunes had just been related to us, a deep feeling of interest and sadness seemed to come over (at whole party; nor would it be possible, I think, for the merriest or most thoughtless person to have viewed the sunken features of this lady, with her thin, bony hands crossed upon her breast, without a momentary pang of sorrow—reflecting that the unsightly object now looked upon had once outshone all rivals in this far famed land of beauty; and that this highly-prized but fatal gift had brought its possessor such pain or sorrow as to cause the grave. The coffin-lid had destroyed the beauty we have now each their splendid tomb; and a sad reflection, and differing only in this: that against the former is often uttered a curse, in remembrance of his many cruel acts; at the latter, a silent tear falls at the recollection of her beauty, her virtues, and her woes.—Marquis of Londonderry's [illegible]

Guilt.—Guilt, though it may attain temporal splendour, can never confer real happiness. The evil consequences of our crimes long survive their commission, and, like the ghosts of the murdered, for ever haunt the steps of the malefactor The pathway of crime, though seldom those of worldly greatness, are always those of presumptuous and peace.—Sir Walter Scott.

A Dog's Attachment to His Master.—The following well-authenticated anecdote may be considered a fair illustration of both the affection and power of reason in an animal. In crossing the mountain St. Gothard, near Airola, the Chevalier Gaspard de Brandenberg and his servant were buried by an avalanche. The ebevalier's dog, an Alpine spaniel, who fortunately escaped the snow, ran howling to a neighbouring convent, and after great perseverance gained admittance He continued to howl and move restlessly towards the door, and at length induced the people from the ebbonous houses to follow him. He led them directly to the spot, and commenced scratching away the snow, and after some hours the chevalier and his domestic were taken out safely Sensible that to the fondness and sagacity of this creature he owed his life, the gentleman ordered, by his will, that he should be represented on his tomb with his dog; and at Zug, in the church of St. Oswald, where he was buried in 1793, they show the monument, and the effigy of the chevalier with the dog lying at his feet.—Sporting Magazine.

UNITED STATES.

Extract from a letter, dated Washington, 26th April, 1842:—

"Business here throughout the country is depressed beyond precedent. The causes are to be traced to the untoward state of our political affairs, the unfortunate scruples of the President, and the war now waged between him and the party which placed him in power. The Whigs in Congress are disheartened, and they are almost unequal to the efforts requisite to carry on the government, and to do something to revive the public prosperity, while counteracted and discouraged by so embarrassing a predicament as the President has placed them in. However, we look forward to better times, still hoping that Congress will not adjourn without accomplishing something to produce them. One of our sources of anxiety, and with many the most serious of all, has assumed a favourable aspect: I allude to our differences with England. There is a general, and, I believe, well-founded impression, that these will be amicably adjusted by Lord Ashburton's mission. The spirit which prompted this voluntary special mission is appreciated by all considerate people with us, and has strengthened the desire for accommodation. Lord Ashburton's deportment also contributes to this end. He goes much into society, and lives in that hospitable way which has ever distinguished the British ministers.

"We have had, as you know, Boz amongst us. He is now on his tour in the West, having, I see, reached St. Louis. He was excessively, perhaps inordinately, feted in Boston and New York. Here he received all kindness, attention, and hospitality, but in a private way. We were exceedingly pleased with him. He won upon everybody by his frank, cordial, unpretending manners, all stamping him "a thorough good fellow." Mr. Dickens has taken, I believe, copious notes of men and things, and we shall be curious to see what he makes of the "go ahead" portion of John Bull's American progeny. Nothing unkind will he say, I am sure, for it is not in his nature. I wish he could have seen more of Virginia and the South, but his time, or his engagements, did not permit it." So far our correspondent.—Other advices state that a special agent has been, or is about to be, sent to England to endeavour to negotiate for the new loan wanted by the federal Government. It is also rumoured that General Cass, the American Minister at Paris, has received letters approbatory of his conduct in his correspondence with M. Guizot, respecting the question of the right of search. He may receive the sanction of President Tyler's cabinet, but that is very different from his being supported by the approbation of the Congress, or the people.

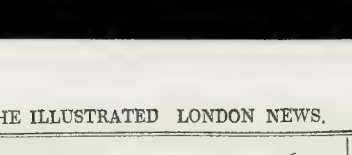
MATRIMONIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

From among the numerous miniatures sent in reply to the matrimonial advertisements in last week's papers, we have engraved the two following: the originals, in elegant gold frames, were taken possession of by Mr. A. Donis. He informed us that the majority of the communications, as far as he could see, and he had examined no less than 275 of them up to the time of our going to press, were from ladies who had previously tasted the sweets of matrimony, and all exhibited a great anxiety to engage in marital bonds without delay. Surely this speaks volumes in favour of wedded life. All describe their personal charms as highly fascinating; of those we have engraved, the first styles herself a young widow without encumbrance. The other we suspect to be a lady of a medium age and anxious to settle.

Both may be communicated with through the medium of our publisher.

To the advertisement headed "CAPITAL SPEC," no answers have been received. The party is still open to negotiation, and begs to intimate that references will be given and required.—None but principals need apply.

DREADFUL CONFLICT WITH THE POLICE.—The Cork Examiner contains the following account of a desperate encounter between three policemen and a number of the peasantry. The district where this occurred has been heretofore very peaceable; it is within the county of Tipperary, and upon the borders of the county of Cork:—"A party, consisting of three of the police stationed at Kilbenney, near Mitchelstown, were on patrol about eleven o'clock on Wednesday night, when they were met by a party of between twelve and eighteen armed men, and apparently on some desperate intent. On the police challenging them, they answered very roughly, and immediately attacked the police. Their arms not being loaded at the time, they could badly defend themselves. Two of them were desperately beaten, and now in the barracks, with very little hopes of their recovery. One of them named Strap, made a desperate fight, but was thrown over a bridge near the place. He held his assailant so firmly as to drag him over with him, and gave him several stabs with his bayonet, from the effects of which, it is supposed, he must have died; he also kept firm hold of his gun, and although his skull was fractured in three different places, he succeeded in keeping it from him. Robinson, another of the police, also made fight, but was knocked down by a blow of a hammer, and his skull dreadfully fractured. The other policeman endeavoured to discharge his carbine at a fellow who attacked him, but missed fire—he then made off to the barracks for more assistance. Two countrymen, who lived near the spot, rushed out of their house and gave the police every assistance; they knocked down several of the fellows in fact, but for them the two police, would have been murdered on the spot. The neighbouring police, with Mr. Bourke, the sub-inspector, have been out all day endeavouring to trace them, but without effect. This has caused a great sensation in Mitchelstown, which is a peaceable quarter of the country.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT TO PLYMOUTH.—It is currently reported that it is the intention of our most gracious Queen and her illustrious Consort to visit the government establishments at this port some time during the summer. It is highly probable that the distinguished honour will be in July, at which time the Albion, 90, now building, will be ready for launching.

The President, 60, Captain Broughton, was paid off at Portsmouth on the 14th inst. When this ship left Valparaiso, on the 30th of January, the squadron in the Pacific was disposed of as follows:—The Dublin, with the flag of Rear Admiral Thomas, and Basilisk, were at Callao; the Champion was on her passage thither, calling at the intermediate ports, the Actæon was at San Blas, collecting freight, and will most probably arrive in England at the end of next month; a large freight may be expected by her. The Curacoa was at Guaymas. The President had 35 days' passage to Rio, at which place were lying the Isis, Fittern, Rose, Crescent, and Partridge. The Pearl was at Buenos Ayres; the Ardent at Bahia. The Brazilian authorities, instead of assisting our minister and officers in suppressing the slave-trade, were doing all they could to thwart this object; and their conduct was getting very insultong. There were seven French men-of-war and a United States frigate lying at Rio. The American squadron, consisting of the Delaware, 66, Potomac 44, and two sloops, were at the River Plate. The President returned to England 23 men short of complement. Second-class boys were much wanted on foreign stations, as, from the difficulty of filling up the vacancies, few ships were completely manned. All was quiet in Chili, and under the new President all parties were quiet. On the departure of Admiral Ross from Valparaiso his flag was saluted by the Calliope frigates, and by the French and American Commodores, &c., with which whom a most friendly intercourse has been always maintained during the Admiral's command on that station.

The Geyser steam frigate, owing to some alterations she is undergoing, will not be ready for sea till about the beginning of June. It is expected also that some change will be made in her armament, and several further experiments are intended before the nature of this change is finally determined upon. The report that the Geyser will proceed to China appears also to want confirmation. Her destination is at least uncertain, and it is said that no other ship will be for some time despatched to the Chinese seas.

The seamen and marines of the Cleopatra, on being paid off, voluntarily subscribed £4 11s. 2d., for the benefit of the Dreadnought hospital-ship. It was a spontaneous act, and therefore the more to their praise, as no agent for the charity solicited their subscriptions.

The New York Albion of January 22, informs its readers, that the pilotage of her Majesty's ship Illustrious, 72 guns, in and out of the harbour, on her recent visit to land the Governor-General of Canada, amounted to 600 dollars. She drew 24 feet water. This very high charge arose in consequence of Captain Erskine having two pilots, he being, as we believe, under the impression that such was the usage of the port. The United States vessels of any draught of water content themselves with one pilot. This information may be of use to others of the Queen's vessels coming into this anchorage.

Major-General Christopher Hamilton, C B., has arrived at Limerick, and assumed the command of the troops serving in the south-western district. Lieutenant W. J. Hamilton, of the 98th Regiment has been appointed aide-de-camp to the Major-General.

The depot of the 32nd Regiment is to be quartered at Parkhurst Barracks, where it is understood the depots of the whole of the regiments serving in Canada are to be stationed.

ROYAL ENGINEERS.—On Saturday a detachment of the Royal Sappers and Miners embarked from her Majesty's Royal Arsenal for Canada, to fill up the vacancies in the different companies on that station; they consist of some of the finest men in the service, and left their native shore amid the hearty cheers of their comrades.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

VESSELS DESTROYED BY FIRE.—PETERHEAD, May 13.—On Thursday morning last, the brig Enterprise, Captain Lowrie, belonging to Peterhead, and lately arrived at that port from Sunderland with a cargo of lime, was discovered to be on fire, and an alarm was instantly given. From inquiries made it appears that in consequence of the unlevel state of the ground on which she was lying previously to her being hauled into a discharging berth, and which the state of the tides prevented being done sooner, she strained considerably, and having become leaky, the water communicated with the lime, and set the vessel on fire. As the usual means of extinguishing the fire were in this case useless, the whole of the hull of the vessel was, about noon, destroyed. Her rigging and sundry stores were saved.

ROTTERDAM, May 14.—Captain Grist, of the Hoop, arrived here from Copenhagen, reports that on the 13th of April, in latitude 33, longitude 54, he fell in with a wreck, apparently a ship or barque, abandoned, waterlogged, and on fire, surrounded by a number of burning bales of cotton.

A new dock was opened last week at Middlesbrough, in Yorkshire, when eleven ships were launched into their respective drops. The dock occupies an area of nine acres of water space, and was constructed at an expense of £100,000. This town in 1829 contained 40 inhabitants; from the increase of commerce, the census of 1841 gives its present population at 5423!

SUMMER TIDE.

'Tis summer with us:—summer when the heart
Of nature pants beneath the genial sun!
Al. things that bud and blow in tinctures run
To seek the dews, or welcome every start
Of rain from thunder-clouds. With day begun—
When dewy morning stands from night apart,
To shake out sunshine from her golden hair—
The festival of nature speeds: Oh! share,
All ye who can!—share, ere its reign depart,
The season's joyousness. Bees, birds, and flowers
Put forth their brightest tints beneath the glow
That sends me hence, to search for shady bowers,
Where I may swathe beside some fountain's flow,
With cooling anadems my burning brow.

CALDER CAMPBELL.

Delicacy in literary composition has been properly, though concisely defined to be "the graceful and beautiful added to the just and good."

A Commercial Traveller left an article of his wardrobe at an inn, and wrote to the chambermaid to forward it to him by the coach. He received the following answer—

"I hope, dear sir, you'll not feel hurt,
I'll frankly tell you all about it;
I've made a shift of your old shirt,
And you must make a shift without it.'

EVERYBODY'S COLUMN.

LYRIC.

Ask me not how much I love thee!
Do not question why!
I have told thee a tale
In the evening pale
With a tear—and a sigh!

I told thee, when Love was hopeless,
But now he is wild and sings—
That the stars above
Shine ever on Love,
Though they frown on the fate of kings.

Oh, a king would have loved and left thee,
And away thy sweet love cast;
But I am thine,
Whilst the stars shall shine—
To the last—to the last.

BARRY CORNWALL.

NO SURRENDER.

Some are in the habit of shouting "No surrender!" but I say we should all surrender; we should surrender our passions, and our prejudices, and our uncharitableness towards others. We should seek to win as much as we can from the common humanity of our adversaries. The good and the wise will pursue this course, and they will succeed: whilst the treacherous, the arrogant, and the intolerant will dwindle far behind, in the march, and will perish of self-contention, instead of coming up to win the laurels.—Bamford.

MAMMON.

Look, again, at another sin—our humiliating worship of wealth. Before the idol of Mammon we bend with a ceaseless, degrading adoration. I know that this has been a sin in all ages, but does it not peculiarly mark this period? Even our language proclaims it. When we ask the worth of an individual, we have no reference to his moral or intellectual acquirements, but to the amount of riches he may possess. The impression seems to be growing stronger, that the acquisition of wealth is the most important business of life, and that he is best fitted for intercourses of the world who possesses the most sagacity in heaping it up. The consequence is that the standard of morality has been gradually sinking to a lower rob. In the excitement produced through our land by the acquisition of sudden fortunes, strict and stern integrity has been too often forgotten. How frequently, for instance, do we see individuals rolling in wealth, and "faring sumptuously every day," when their unpaid creditors, whose claims the law has cancelled, are perchance suffering privation! How often do men mount up to fortunes by means which draw upon them the withering scorn of all who value integrity and right! But yet it is a melancholy fact that there is a tone of feeling prevailing through society, which induces it to call such things by soft and lenient names, and even to look with favour upon the skilful perpetrator of an equivocal act.

ALL THE DIFFERENCE.

Old Mr. Lefevre, the father of the present Speaker of the House of Commons, and the principal founder of Currie and Co's house on Cornhill, illustrated the theory of banking one day to a customer in a significant manner. The customer in question was one of those men who find it very convenient to have bad memories. His account was almost always overdrawn, and whenever spoken to on the subject his answer was the same—he really had forgotten how it stood. At last, Mr. Lefevre, who had watched his opportunity, caught him one day at the counter, and said to him, "Mr. ——, you and I must understand one another something better than we seem to do. I am afraid you do not know what banking is; give me leave to tell you. It's my business to take care of your money; but I find you are always taking care of mine. Now, that is not banking, Mr ——; it must be the other way: I'm the banker, not you; you understand me now, Mr. ——; I'm sure you do!"—Banks and Bankers.

TRUTH AND RUMOUR.—BY LAMAN BLANCHARD.

As Truth once paused on her pilgrim way,
To rest by a hedge-side thorny and sere,
Few wanderers there she charmed to stay,
Though hers were the tidings that all should hear
She whispering sang, and her deep rich voice
Yet richer, deeper, each moment grew;
And still, though it bade the crowd rejoice,
Her strain but a scanty audience drew.

But Rumour close by, as she pluck'd a reed
From a babbling brook, detained the throng;
With a hundred tongues that never agreed,
She gave to the winds a moaning song.
The crowd with delight its echoes caught,
And closer around her yet they drew;
So wondrous and wild the lore she taught,
They listen'd, entranced, the long day through.

The sun went down: when he rose again,
And sleep had becalmed each listner's mind,
The voice of Rumour had rung in vain,
No echo had left a charm behind.
But Truth's pure note, ever whispering clear,
Wand'ring in air fresh sweetness caught,
Then, all unnoticed, it touch'd the ear,
And filled with music the cells of thought.

TASTES IN DANCING.

To our fastidious eye there is nothing more unmanly than to see a great tall fellow shuffling and sliding along the floor, his arms dangling like those of a scarecrow, and his face screwed into that nottoniess, meaningless insipidity, which more than the loud laugh, indicates the vacant mind. We can well understand and value a Saturday night at sea, when the monotonous duty of ship-board is relaxed, and the only means of taking a walk is permitted to the sailor, viz., to dance heartily on a narrow gangway. There is mirth in an Irish jig—there is vigour in the Highland fling—but what is there in a French posture-maker? Why a baboon would beat him hollow and be every whit as intelligent a partner. But how the feelings change when we behold the rosy cheeks of well-tutored younglings, their cheeks glowing a rosy accompaniment to their eyes' bright sparkle, while their flexible limbs are motioned by dulcet harmony. We can excuse the vigorous awkwardness of a boy's reel by the redeeming twinkle of a girl's ankle, and form to ourselves groups of beauty and elegance from their position.

SOUND REASON.

An honest farmer in the neighbourhood of Doncaster, who had formerly been a staunch supporter of the Whigs, was taunted the other day at one of the market tables in this town, with having turned his coat, in giving his support to the Conservative candidates. "Why," replied he, laconically, "I think I had better turn it, than have it torn from my back." There was much serious reflection in the reply.—Doncaster Chronicle.

THE HOUR OF DEATH.

In all ages the hour of death has been considered as an interval of more than ordinary illumination; as if some rays from the light of the approaching world had found their way to the darkness of the departing spirit, and seem ed to it an existence that could not terminate in the grave, but was to commence in death.—Curran.

TOO BAD.—"Ma," said a little urchin peeping from beneath the bed clothes, "lie still, my dear," said the mother, "until your sister comes from church—she has got the comforter on for a bustle."

LITERATURE.

THE VOYAGES OF CAPTAIN JAMES COOK. New Edition. Illustrated. Parts I. to VII. Smith, Fleet-street.

The voyages of our celebrated circumnavigator, whose name has been, for the last half century, as a household word amongst the people of this country, would hardly now appear to require a notice from the press to direct public attention to the history of them. Such has long been among the standard works of English literature, and will preserve their interest as long as English literature exists. The publication before us has, however, the great advantage over its precursors, that subjects have been chosen for illustration by the successors of Captain Cook in his perilous expeditions, which have not appeared in any of the early editions of his Voyages: independently of which, the narrative is broken into detached portions, enabling the reader to proceed at his leisure, and to halt without danger of losing the thread of the detail, when resuming his task. Many of the embellishments in this edition are from drawings made by the late unfortunate Admiral Dumont d'Ueville, who, in L'Astrolabe, traced the route of Cook round the world, and was preserved from the united dangers of the ocean and uncivilized man, to perish in the midst of civilization and festivity, in the catastrophe of the Versailles railway, a fortnight since. Of the Voyages it is now unnecessary to speak; and but few words will suffice to express our admiration of the manner in which this edition issues from the publisher.

The illustrations are liberally scattered throughout the work, and, for the most part, beautifully executed; and particularly so are those in which any new subject is chosen for embellishment.

THE HAND-BOOK OF NEEDLEWORK. By MISS LAMBERT. Murray, Albemarle-street.

This curious and really valuable, as well as ornamental, volume has but just reached us in time for a passing and necessarily brief notice. We should not do justice to it, or to our fair readers by so disposing of it, and will therefore return to the subject in our next; meantime we extract the following passages from the chapter on "Needlework of the Queens of England," which will afford a fair specimen of the style in which the whole is written:—

"The late Queen Charlotte was exceedingly fond of needlework, and was solicitous that the princesses should excel in the same amusing art. In the room in which her Majesty used to sit with her family, were some cane-bottomed chairs, and when playing about, the princesses were taught the different stitches on this rude canvas. As they grew older, a portion of each day was spent in this employment, and, with their royal mother as their companion and instructress, they became accomplished needlewomen.

"The Queen herself embroidered the dresses which the princesses wore on the fête given on the occasion of the Prince of Wales coming of age. These dresses were in white crêpe, embroidered with silver; they were exceedingly elegant, and so, we are told, were the wearers. Her Majesty likewise embroidered a dress in Dacca silk for the Princess Royal, which was tastefully and beautifully executed. Several sets of chairs, some of which may still be seen at Frogmore and Windsor, likewise show the superiority of the royal needlework. These were the labours of her younger days, but her Majesty afterwards amused her leisure hours with the cutting and netting, and the amount of work so done is perfectly marvellous. Towards the close of her life finer works were thrown aside, and her Majesty, taking altogether to knitting, the poorest of her subjects (as we are informed on indisputable authority) profited by these—the labours of a queen.

"The Princess Royal, Queen of Wurtemberg, devoted much of her time to needlework. Among the principal ornaments of the handsome palace of the King of Wurtemburg at Stuttgardt, are the beautiful and elaborate specimens of needlework, covering chairs, sofas, screens, and other articles of furniture, all specimens of the skill, patience, and taste of the late lamented queen. The Princess Sophia particularly excelled in needlework, and it was also the favourite occupation of the Princesses Augusta and Amelia.

"The Princess Mary, Duchess of Gloucester, daily amuses herself with her needle; and scarcely a charity bazaar is held to which she does not contribute some of the work of her own hands. We believe that her Royal Highness refuses even any assistance, however trifling, in the labours she once undertakes.

"The work done by the late Duchess of York, at Oatlands, is now widely dispersed. The Duchess was the projector and arranger of all, but she was assisted in the execution by her ladies and protegées Her labours are so various and of such magnitude as almost to defy belief. Berlin patterns were then unknown, or but just invented, and her designs were all drawn on the canvas. In one of the antirooms at Buckingham Palace are a sofa and six elbow chairs, the work of her Royal Highness. The backs, seats, sides, and borders, both inside and out, are entirely of needlework. The pattern on the back and seat of the sofa is a basket turned on one side, out of which flowers are falling, so arranged as to extend over the centre; these are surrounded with a border of various leaves, in different shades of green; amongst which are the ivy, vine, shamrock, and thistle. The flowers and borders are in tent stitch; the ground is in Germanstitch. There is a deep border in front of the sofa and chairs, in maroon, with a kind of Arabesque, or rather that style of border much used in the time of Louis Quatorze; the ground of this is different, but extremely rich, and the colours in it are so thoroughly brought out that the effect is perfect. The ends of the sofa, both inside and outside, are worked to match. The ground is now a cream colour, but we suppose it to have been white; the chairs match the sofa, and they are alike beautiful in taste, design, and execution; they are all done in silk. There was also another set of furniture worked by the Duchess of York, consisting of chairs, ottomans, and sofas, in tent stitch, drawn out on satin, and we do not know of any work in filture previously to this date.

"Did we not fear to intrude on the sacred threshold of Queen Adelaide's retirement, how much might be said of her extended and useful labours. Her introduction of needlework as a fashion, and in a king it a requisite to those ladies who were the invited guests at her court, caused many to admire, and in time become skilled in that which was only taken up for convenience. The splendid works which in all be cited of many ladies of the present day would never perhaps otherwise have been in existence; and, through this, thousands in the humbler ranks of life have been and are supported, not to mention that much ingenuity and taste are daily called forth which might have been unknown.

"We understand that her Majesty and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent are admirers of needlework and patronise it."

A HAND-BOOK FOR THE ARCHITECTURE, SCULPTURES, TOMBS, AND DECORATIONS OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY; with Illustrations. Bell and Wood, Fleet-street.

Few works have issued from the press decked out in such a guise of elegance as the little hand-book now before us. Its delicate binding emblazoned in colours and gold, in imitation of the original decoration of the Chapter-House; its tasteful interior exhibiting all that is beautiful or quaint in the architecture and sculpture of "the old abbey," and all that is poetical in its associations, claim alike an admiration that every professor of taste will not withhold. There is a typographic fitness about this book, a harmony of illustration and text, an attainment of neat elegance without formality, that may fairly set an example to works of higher pretensions. The author censures with truth those interpolations of bad taste and inferior art amongst the beautiful and perfect specimens of monumental sculpture, and criticises ably, and with reverence, the feeling, truth, or energy that distinguish the nobler attempts of the artist's hand with which this venerable fane abounds. He thus speaks of Roubiliac's monument of Lady Nightingale, and the tomb of Sir Francis de Vere:—

"Of the first, may we not say, without disparagement of the genius of its author, that it is a beautiful mistake? Yet it touches every heart, and when once seen is never effaced from the memory. The expression of the agonized husband warding off the blow which Death is about to strike, and of the wife, beautiful to the last, and the perfect execution of all the parts, are the works of genius only. But if sculpture and painting have each their own distinct principles of development, does it not seem Roubiliac has here fallen into the mistake of making a picture in stone! The sceptical may consult with advantage Mr. Millman's essay 'On the Comparative Estimate of Sculpture and Painting.' Then, too, the very perfection to which Roubiliac and his followers—Wilton among them—carried their imitation of nature, became a defect, and 'we are only reminded,' as Mr. Eastlake well observes, in his preface to Dr. Kugler's 'Hand book of the History of Painting,' 'that life and motion were wanting.' The whole conception of Death,

> 'The shape, which shape had none
> Distinguishable, in member, joint, or limb, emerging from the tomb as a skeleton, seems to me vulgar and melodramatic. As a most accomplished master, however, of his art, though his development of it was based on wrong principles, when all around him was a desert, or nearly so, Roubiliac must be worthy of our esteem. Allan Cunningham informs us that 'Roubiliac superintended the erection of the Nightingale monument himself, and it was frequently related of him, by Gayfere, the abbey mason, that he found him one day standing with his arms folded, and his looks fixed upon one of those knightly figures which support the canopy over the statue of Sir Francis Vere. As he approached, the artist laid his hand on his arm, pointed to the figure, and said, 'Hush, he will speak soon!'"

This work has evidently been the result of much consideration and no small degree of labour, as it embraces in a concise, yet lucid, form, almost, if not entirely, every subject that can be interesting to the housekeeper, or useful in point of knowledge towards the management of a family. It is no small matter to set up a beacon which shall guide the inquirer to the most desirable points from whence the domestic comforts of home may be attainable with economy and satisfaction, and this part of the subject is fully accomplished. But it is not only as regards our enjoyment of good eating and drinking that we are to look at this volume thousands of little matters of detail connected with the right government of a family are treated of in a manner equally pleasing and instructive. A chapter "On the Comparative Expenses of Living at Home and Abroad," will be read with advantage, as well as amusement; from this we shall extract a message written from Paris by a lieutenant on half-pay in the English service; the whole is worthy perusal, but we have not room for it:—

"You know that my income altogether does not exceed £120 a year. With this poor stipend, I fancied myself a very poor man in London; and having heard so much of the cheapness of France, I resolved on sojourning in Paris. I arrived here in the month of November, and after having visited a hundred lodging-houses. I at length obtained a very good bed-room, and a bed room only, for sixty francs (almost fifty shillings) per month. For three pounds a month, fifteen shillings a week, you know I had a very pretty sitting-room and bed-room in the vicinity of the University, and the good people of the house prepared my breakfast for me, and cooked my dinner if I wished to dine at home. The porter of the house in Paris at which I fixed my quarters, however, told me that nothing of this kind could be done for me there. I must feed myself; and, as it was very cold weather, laid in forty francs' worth of wood, which I expected would last at least two months, for in my London lodgings I paid ninepence per day for a good fire, and was at least seven or eight hours daily at home; whereas, it was evident that, as I must go out in Paris for my meals, I should be comparatively little at home. What was my astonishment, therefore, at the end of three weeks, although I had a fire only in the evening, to find that my wood was almost gone; and God knows I had never once been warm, for the d——d chimney smoked at such a rate, as all the Poem a chimneys do, that I was compelled to sit with my door wide open, to avoid suffocation. On the first morning after my arrival, I went to a café to breakfast; I had a cup of coffee, which, to say truth, was very good, a small loaf of bread, certainly not enough for a man of good appetite, and a slice of butter, of which it would take nearly a hundred to make a pound. The charge for this was eighteen sous, which, with two sous to the waiter, made a franc. In London I have frequently turned into a decent coffee-shop, and, on the upper room, which was visited only by respectable persons, had a large cup of tea and a roll and butter for fourpence halfpenny—just half what my breakfast cost me here. Then as to dinner. My first visit to a restaurant was rather an unlucky one for my purse; it was to the Frères Provençaux in the Palais Royal. As I knew nothing of the dishes, I resolved to be guided by two French gentlemen who took their seats at the same time at an adjoining table. I ordered what I heard them order, and had seven or eight different dishes, each far too copious for me; for I was not then aware that, in order to dine well at these places, without paying enormously, and to have some variety, there must be two or three persons together, and the order should be given for a single portion, as it is called, for the party. By this means, three persons may have five or six dishes, and pay no more than would be paid by one person. My bill, with a bottle of wine, came to seventeen francs—rather an expensive outlay for a sub. on half-pay. On the following day I went to a restaurant a prix fixe—that is to say, at a fixed price per head, and I had what I then considered to be a pretty good dinner viz., soup, four dishes, dessert, bread, and half a bottle of wine, for two francs. To this place I returned day after day, but I was soon disgusted with it; for I was informed that the cheap restaurateurs are in the habit of buying up what remains every day at the high-priced restaurants, and disguising it with sauces, or of purchasing the refuse meat and poultry in the markets. My taste for these restaurants a tant par tete was much lowered, also, by reading in the journals an account of the seizure of a quantity of horse-flesh, from the slaughter-houses for horses at Montfaucon, in the larders of several cheap restaurateurs, and of the condemnation of two scoundrels for killing a number of cats, and disposing of them at the low-priced eating-houses."

LONDON INTERIORS, with Costumes and Ceremonies. Mead, Bouverie-street.

This beautifully executed series of interior views of the most important public edifices of the metropolis has reached the eighth part, and continues to present itself with increasing claims to patronage. The engravings are exquisitely executed on steel, and the text to each illustration has evidently been collected with great attention and a strict adherence to historic truth. The views for the May number are, plate XVI., Middle Temple Hall, Benchers and Members at Commons; and XVII., Guildhall, the Lord Mayor's Banquet, 9th November. The cost of producing this work must be enormous, and yet it is published in one shilling parts. The sale ought to be immense, and must be so if the work is justly appreciated.

HANDY ANDY. By SAMUEL LOVER. Parts I. to V. Lover, Paternoster-row.

This most decidedly first-rate combination of broad humour and ludicrous blundering has reached the fifth part, and the wreath which the laughter-loving deity wove for the brow of the author is still unimpaired in its freshness and beauty. If to provoke folks to side-aching mirth should ever become a crime in the eyes of our legislature, Lover would most assuredly deserve punishment in the highest degree. The public has done little else but laugh since he introduced the gossoon Andy to its notice. We cannot extract this week.

BRADSHAW'S RAILWAY COMPANION FOR THE POCKET, and BRADSHAW'S MONTHLY RAILWAY GUIDE. W. J. Adams, Fleet-street.

In these days of rapid transition, when every moment has become of incalculable importance in matters connected with travelling, Mr. Bradshaw's railway publications cannot fail to be appreciated as eminently useful. By means of them the travelling public is informed of the precise hours of departure of the trains on every railway in Great Britain; the speculating public will find at one view, a list of shares, with the market value up to the last day of each month; and the general reader will acquire information which, if not immediately applicable, will ultimately be found useful.

BRADSHAW'S JOURNAL. Part VI. Strange, Paternoster-row. The sixth part of this agreeable miscellany has just reached us, and we have no hesitation in recording our approval, as well of its tone generally, as of the particular selections made for the information of the reading public. If the prior numbers are of equal merit, there can be no doubt of its sustaining a high character among the periodicals of the day.

CHRISTIAN EXAMPLES FOR YOUNG PERSONS, ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE PROVERBS OF SOLOMON. By Miss J. STRICKLAND. Third edition. Dean and Co., Threadneedle-street.

It is unnecessary to speak of the merits of any production from the pen of Miss Strickland. Public taste has already awarded to her a high place in the list of the benefactors of youth. To this, the third edition, a tale has been added, entitled "The Juvenile Firm."

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

PAINTINGS.

> "The work some praise,
> And some the architect."

"Whatsoever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable and grave, whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without, or the wily subtleties and reduxes of man's thoughts from within; all these with a solid and treatable smoothness to paint out and describe. Teaching over the whole book of sanctity and virtue, through all the instances of example, with such delight to those especially of soft and delicious temper, who will not so much as look upon truth herself, unless they see her elegantly dressed; that wherens the paths of honesty and good life appear now rugged and difficult, though they be indeed easy and pleasant, they will then appear to all men both easy and pleasant, though they were rugged and difficult indeed."—Milton, Preface to Second Book of Church Government.

What a noble pleading for the fine arts; and what a perfect description of all that is excellent in the choice of a subject; such a high standard as our worthiest artists might place before themselves, but could in idea only, for they well know, indeed, "it were a folly to commit anything elaborately composed to the careless and interrupted listening of these times." And even if they did select from such a list, it must be even a "subject as the publishing whereof might be delayed at pleasure, and time enough to pencil it over with all the curious touches of art, even to the perfection of a faultless picture;" the which time, private necessity, and want of national patronage, will not allow; but they, smothering somewhat the noble "instinct of nature and emboldening of art," subject the energies and powers of genius, and the delicate refinements of taste, to the popular cry and ignorant demands of the age. Yet, notwithstanding these all-binding fetters of public opinion, as artists among artists, our Dutch painters, in the extraordinary and almost interminable variety of their productions, have, as Reynolds long ago observed, dared to think for themselves; and however low the walk of pursuit chosen, have determined, with him of inventive art, as yet the greatest earthly master, our own all-time-honoured Shakspere, not to have their

"Art made tongue-tied by authority."

Painting, an art addressing the imagination and feelings by the representations of the choicest selections from all that is sublime and beautiful, majestic and lovely, terrific or soothing, rare or common, that can be grasped by mortal vision in created nature, must present, in proportion to the extent and number of works, the same infinite variety as its archetype, the which amazing diversity renders it so difficult for the observer mentally to classify the presented objects; but the arrangement of subjects in painting has, in some degree, been already effected, and the settled distinctions we shall endeavour to bear in mind during our hasty glance at this splendid exhibition. And first, the Epic, of which as nothing is now demanded so nothing is now produced; but we must except the terrific personification of the arrested plague, black and lurid, whose clenched and rivetted fists are doubly armed with quivering flashes of blue and pallid lightning, whilst he is borne sublimely away on a cloud pregnant with pestilence, in

294. 'Aaron staying the plague.' H. Howard. A conception worthy of Polygnotus. But this exhibition teems with works belonging to that department of art, where pure history is elevated, and touches the dramatic, however noble the fact, or however ordinary or simply human; and that section peculiarly English, of which West's 'Death of Wolfe' may be considered the foundation—a series of works marked with the most scrupulous attention, and minute research with regard to all that pertains to date, locality, costume, and custom; whilst masses of accumulated detail are wondrously arranged, with due subordination to the main object of the work—the illustration of some event of real history.

Of the above classes is the marvellous picture, 62, 'Play Scene in Hamlet,' D. Maclise. As every visitor will spend a small portion of time upon this work, we shall pass it, only hinting at the fault, that every object appears as if carved out of ivory. Nothing but Mr. Maclise's intense application to give the utmost finish to the parts, could have led him to overlook this blemish to the whole.

404. 'Edward the Black Prince thanking Lord James Audley for his gallantry in the Battle of Poictiers.' B. R. Haydon. Admirable for the choice of characters, and for their intensely eager and unaffected attention to the principal action, which is also well relieved and contrasted by the beautiful bit of incidental invention of the wounded common soldier, only supported and attended by his cara sposa. The armour is painted in a manner Rubens could not have excelled; the colour Venetian, with the exception of the execrable yellow drapery on the knight, which, independent of the choice of colour, wants grey demitint, and, by being too dark, interferes with the principal mass of light; and why has the knight such a fair and delicate skin, so as even to excel the lady in the opposite corner of the picture?

33. 'The Dance.' W. Etty. This picture cannot but increase Mr. Etty's already great reputation. The still life is perfect.

97. 'Scene from Twelfth Night.' C. R. Leslie. Essentially Shaksperian. Mr. Leslie should in future descend to no minor author, he is so completely at home here.

91. 'The Ford.' W. Mulready. An excellent instance how a great mind may from the most trifling incident raise a superb work.

136. 'Sisters.' C. L. Eastlake. The pure sentiment, tender feeling, elegant choice of attitude and drapery which so eminently distinguish Raffaelle's small works, are here concentrated, and united to a beauty of colour and delicacy of pencilling almost unapproachable. This picture forms a perfect companion in contrast to Giorgione's 'Gaston De Foix;' equal, and yet so different.

505. 'Œdipus cursing his son Polynices.' F. R. Pickersgill. A chaste and noble work. The solemn grandeur of Œdipus, the woe-distracted Polynices, the almost spectral trance of the sister, with clasped hands, which contrasts finely with the graceful pleading of Antigone, form a whole worthy of attentive consideration.

376. 'Una and the Lion.' H. Le Jeune. The lion, by its peculiar cut of jib, and sundry other almost indescribable niceties of distinction in feature, as well as the superb arrangement of his mane, is, we are instinctively led to consider, a study from that ennobled and ameliorated physiognomy which has for centuries been perpetuated in those splendid specimens of sculptural and plastic art so popular with those happy shopkeepers patronized by royalty, that they even cannot refrain from placing them over their shop doors and windows.

201. 'The Battle of Preston Pans.' W. Allan. A magnificent picture of past history—with a trifle too much cruelty in the immediate foreground.

In portraiture, Sir M. A. Shee, by numerous specimens, asserts almost equality in painting with Reynolds, whose place as president and whose station as an artist he so well supplies.

170. 'Portrait of Mr. Faraday.' T. Phillips. For character and expression, ease and dignity, truly superb; whilst it is painted with a grandeur of touch which bears witness of vast improvement.

520. 'Portrait of Martin Ware.' H. W. Pickersgill. A splendid head; a portrait, not merely a face; the individual's character acutely discriminate, as every lineament of the countenance bears witness.

532. 'Portrait of J. P. Burnard.' A. H. Fox. First-rate, full of immense promise.

We must not omit the lovely creation, 61, 'M. Beaulierre.' F. Grant.

In landscape the present exhibition not only maintains but adds to the high rank which the English school has won; and we would wish most earnestly to see the truly magnificent English landscape, 10, Sir A. W Callcott; the two beautiful views in Venice, 52 and 73, J. Turner; and one of the solemnly grand Highland scenes of Lee; with 525, 'Termination of the Ravine leading to Petra,' D. Roberts, and one of Stanfield's noble marine views, added to the national collection, and put alongside the Claudes and Cuyps, their true situations. Never should such works pass into private hands, when the English gallery wants samples and specimens of our best masters.

The British Museum.—The trustees of the British Museum have lately become possessed of a very beautiful collection of miniature paintings, probably by the hand of the celebrated Giulio Clovio, an artist of the sixteenth century, whose life is written by Varavi, and who was the best painter of small figures and ornamental decorations which modern art has yet produced. The paintings lately purchased by the trustees of the British Museum, eleven in number, are so many genealogical tables of the Royal House of Portugal, compiled in the reign of Don Juan III. of that time, who was a liberal promoter of the fine arts. He reigned 36 years, and died 1557, aged 55. In looking over these very remarkable productions of the Italian school in its most brilliant era, we were much struck with the numerous portraits which they appear to exhibit of all the most distinguished personages (besides many others of less note) of the families of Castile, France, Arragon, Burgundy, and England, particularly those of John of Lancaster, and his wife Constance, daughter of Peter the Cruel, whose great granddaughter Isabella married Ferdinand of Arragon. To the picture containing John Duke of Lancaster, and his wife, are attached the portraits of John II., King of France, and his descendants, Philip the Bold, John the Bold, Philip the Good, and Charles the Bold, Dukes of Burgundy, with the heiress of their fortunes, Mary, and her husband, Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, to whom she brought the splendid dowry of Burgundy, Flanders, Hainault, Holland, &c. The costumes of all these personages are extremely rich, and expressed with the most minute detail; and the whole collection, though not perhaps quite perfect, forms one of the most remarkable and fortunate acquisitions which have served to embellish this great establishment since that of the Elgin marbles. John III. of Portugal married Catherine, sister of Charles V., and Charles V. married Isabella, sister of John III. It was probably on the occasion of this double union that the paintings in question were executed.

The Horticultural Society. The first exhibition for the season of fruits, flowers, and culinary vegetables, took place on Saturday, at the garden of the Society at Chiswick. It was honoured by the presence of her Majesty the Queen, who came privately before the gates were opened to the great body of visitors, and retired at one o'clock, the hour at which the general admittance commences. Her Majesty was accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert and her usual suite, and was attended more particularly to view the gardens and the specimens exhibited by the Duke of Devonshire, through whose private door the royal party retired, after having inspected the exhibition. Her Majesty was pleased to express her satisfaction with the manner in which the gardens were laid out, and the general arrangements for the display of the flowers and fruits, and more particularly admired the grapes sent to the exhibition from Chatsworth. Her Majesty and Prince Albert looked remarkably well, and appeared much gratified by what they saw. Indeed nothing could exceed the splendour of the flowers or the beauty of the fruits; and it would be difficult for the arrangements for the exhibition to be more complete. The whole were arranged on platforms beneath spacious marquees, the awning of which not only protected the flowers from the heat of the sun, but furnished a cool retreat for the company. The heaths and azaleas were particularly good. The bands of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards, of the Blues, and of the Coldstream Guards were, as usual, in attendance, and played some well-selected airs, marches, overtures, &c. The company was very numerous, upwards of 10,000 persons having been present during the day, and scarcely any person of rank or fashion being absent.

The Court of Directors of the East India Company lately applied, we hear, to the Board of Control, for copies of all the papers and documents relating to the Affghan war, both as to its origin and conduct. The application was, it is added, refused. It may be necessary to explain, that though the despatches to the Governor-General of India on this subject bear the signatures of the secret committee of the Court of Directors, they were prepared by the Board of Control, and as the members of that committee are sworn to secrecy, the contents of those documents are unknown to the Court of Directors collectively, save at the pleasure of the Board of Control, which now, and for some years, in reality consists of a president only.

A letter, dated the 30th of January last, has arrived from Major Pottinger, from which it appears that "General Elphinstone, at the time after the murder of Sir W. H. M'Naghten, when the evacuation of Cabul and its neighbourhood was under discussion in the British cantonments, was so ill from gout and a wound, that all active measures had devolved on Brigadier Shelton; that Major Pottinger proposed marching from the cantonments to the Bala Hissar, or evacuating Cabul, with the sacrifice of their baggage, and fighting their way to the nearest British station. Brigadier Shelton declared the first proposition impracticable, and the council of war would not agree to the second; consequently, General Elphinstone acquiesced in the vote of the council of war, which was for the disastrous course adopted."

Thus, instead of regarding the disasters of Cabul as a proof of Affghan prowess, they must be looked upon as demonstrations of the incapacity of the British generals. This view is corroborated by the fact of Shah Sooja being enabled still to maintain himself in the Bala Hissar; and by the gallant defence of Jellalabad by Sir Robert Sale, where he, notwithstanding every difficulty, has maintained his position since last October.

A letter from Aden, of the 10th of March, says:—

"The India steam-ship arrived here from Suez at 2 p.m., on the 9th inst. She lay aground near Suez nine hours, but it was fortunately calm. She was detained at Mocha three days to take in a supply of wood, having expended her coals. One of the passengers, Captain Vernon, of the 15th Hussars, died for want of medical assistance, which has damped the spirits of the whole party. Dr. Bloxham, of the Clive sloop of war, belonging to the East India Company, has, since their arrival, kindly attended them."

Knaresborough.—On the evening of Sunday week, some miscreants, in a wanton and malicious manner, set fire to an extensive range of heather on the moors of Stainburn and Rigton, which was destroyed, together with an abundance of game. The immense volumes of fire and smoke were seen at a considerable distance, and caused much alarm among the country people, until the true cause became known.

A curious case is likely to give employment to the gentlemen of the long robe. The plaintiff, late an officer of the Dragoon Guards, and the defendant, a celebrated solicitor in the Adelphi, well known for his eminence in successfully defending similar actions to the one he himself is now figuring in as principal. The damages are laid at £5000. Some strange disclosures will, we understand, come out upon the trial.

Sidmouth.—Last week, a carpenter returned to his home late in the evening, in a state of intoxication, and on sitting down fell asleep. His wife believing his sleep was pretended, set fire to a portion of his dress and went up stairs; but in a short time, finding an unpleasant smell, she returned to the room in which she left him, and found that his head and arm were frightfully burnt, the tendons shrunk, and the flesh literally roasted; apparently he will be maimed for life.

Bristol and Exeter Railway.—We hear that tenders have been received for very nearly the whole amount of £500,000, authorized by the Act of Incorporation to be borrowed on debentures. There is every reason to expect that the line to Taunton will be ready to open before the 7th of July.

THE GRAVE OF GENIUS.

"Marvellous, yet true."

LONDON! What a myriad of varied feelings and associations start into ideal being at the mention of thy name! To the fortunate speculator, the rumed profligate, and the moral reformer, thy characters and features are indelible objects of remembrance, and to each alike vitally developed, palpable objects, which cease to resign influence over memory only when the mortal clay, having lost its living nature, assumes cognate form, and mingles with kindred dust.

A large city with its narrow streets, confined and crooked alleys, and poisoned atmosphere, may remain a hell as fun and as durable on our patriotic recollections, as those sacred affections which characterize the Mountaineer, and derive existence from the ever-remembered hill and glen; or the less enthusiastic, though equally exalted, feelings of the Lowlander, who finds his memory luxuriant in the remembrance of fertile beauty allied to the valley and the cave. It is not the spot, but its associative endearments which reign in our hearts.

The philosopher, with mind expanded, and the broad page of nature and truth before him, sees wisdom and mercy pictured in the creation and sustained life of every dweller on the surface of the earth, whether animate or inanimate. Flowers in the bud, in their green age, are a thing to be gazed on with pleasure; but when, as the after-growths in the ripe bloom of their gorgeously-matured beauty. Whether his survey of maternal objects be open to generalities, or restricted to minutiæ, the supply of intellective food is abundant, without intermission, and inexhaustible.

This is the every-day position of rational man, and these the demands which incessantly recuse him to the duties of the performance of his task, as an unit of humanity and a serviceable traveller in social pilgrimage. By conforming with the purpose of these demands, and having laboured for the eternal and temporal benefit of his fellow-creatures, he may then rest in peace: he has fulfilled his worldly destiny, he has lived not in vain!

Time rolls on; and on its wings are borne the seeds of change. Yet do I remember, as if there an occurrence of yesterday, that day when the performance of monastrous duties demanded my persona. attendance, as summ and vassor to the house of mourning, which led me into the knowledge of a train of circumstances, sufficiently commonplace in themselves, yet teeming with lessons of wisdom in their result to the hitherto untuated That my allusion may carry its realities to the reader's mind, and bear a form other than mere parable, I shall condense the events of which I gathered from the lips of the sufferer himself, in the following details

George Chisholm was born at Doone, a beautiful, but scantily pop ulated village, in Perthshire. His parents were of some little means and affluence in landed property, by their own industry and success in trade, and, at the time of George's birth, the autumn of 1815, they were, apparently, destined to enjoy, in peaceful retirement, the sweets of a laughing well-spring of happiness, that day when the performance within and without their immediate or family "world, and their business, daily increasing in its lucrative profits, held out prospect—by the honest accumulation of two establishments, one at Stirling and the other at Doone, some eight miles apart—of the old couple being enabled, in the lapse of a very few years, to give up their connexion in trade to some one of their sons, and retire from active life to enjoy the fruits of their early labours.

The good fortune of the old couple was the product of frugality in the management of their household and personal outlay, and unremitted industry, combined with attention to the wants of their customers. They practised the double calling of bread-bakers and victual dealing.

George was a sickly child, and indeed this must have been the constitutional characteristic of the family: for Mrs. Chisholm had been the mother of ten children; and now, only four of them remained—two sons, including George, the youngest of the family, and two daughters.

Ere nine months had set their seal upon this last-born pledge of affection, the head and prop of the family was confined, with and-dim illness, to bed. Mr. Chisholm appears to have been a man of feeble frame, for though scarcely in the prime of life, so far as years are a guarantee, he exhibited the physical debility of one who had attained a near approach to threescore years and ten

The entire care of watching over the father and child now devolved on the sorrowing mother. Mrs. Chisholm procured the best medical attendants and advice that the country could afford, in her desire to stem the progress of her husband's malady; but in vain. Before three months had passed, Mr. Chisholm the occupant of a sick-bed, a weeping family gave expression to the mourning of the grieving widow and her fatherless children; and the remains of Daniel Chisholm, a man of many virtues, were lowered into their narrow—the darkest—of dwellings.

After her husband's funeral, the bereaved wife withdrew herself, with the family, from the world, that she might derive vantage from the nature of her present woes, by being permitted the only consolatory indulgence which might have come to the business to one of her own workmen, who held authority as foreman over the others. He had been brought up in the line of life over which his master presided, but unfortunately he was, in every particular, a heartless blackguard, cloaking his sable deeds with the outward sanctity of religion, and thus imposing on the unwary victim. In little time he made the purpose with the whitery of the poor widow and the wreck of her trade It was a coward act, but strictly in keeping with the scoundrel's character. The fortunes, nay, the comforts of the family became involved with the base chance of rehearsal; their existence hung on the immediate discharge of Gemmil, the foreman; but already the blackguard had secured his retreat by seconding with all the ready money he could lay hands upon, and, in company with some reckless family, left the country. Having thus got rid of the trust-betrayer, the next duty was to ascertain, if possible, the full extent of the family hopes and fortunes; and, as Mrs. Chisholm had no knowledge of commercial matters, this task was intrusted to some legally qualified person, who decently could profit from the appointment, and concluded their labours after some two years' balancing and "adjusting" the poor widow found a woman that she and her family were utterly ruined! There utterly needless to dilate further regarding the matter: suffice it that the widow and her four children were thrown upon their own resources, and compelled to live upon the scanty subsistence from the receipt of a trifling annuity, joined with the industry of the three females at white seam sewing

For twelve months longer did the humbled family toil and live; but ere three moons had added their further testimony to the progress of time, the eldest daughter, Janet, a beautiful and amiable girl, endowed with noble mental powers, and high moral rectitude of character, sank into the arms of death, and in virtuous purity, beside her earthly father. The widow's heart was rent. Like a scorched flower she drooped, and ere a month had seen her crushed spirit seeking a resting-place in sympathy with her laid friend, the mother yielded, not unwillingly, to the widow's doom, and she also died. Another and another of the anointed family left this world of sadness, until the only remaining link that held the once-flourishing group to the earth, was the youngest child. Poor George was now, alone, the representative of that once joyous circle, which, but a few years prior, seemed to embrace all that renders life a boon and existence tolerable. Poor fellow! he was destitute; and his relatives, who had their fortunes first established by the liberality of his father, low revelled in ease and affluence, and left him to starve. But Providence is ever kind; and in generous offer of a home and comfort to the orphan by the parish dominie, John M'Crae, rescued the hazard from the consuming flame, and carried the dark-haired boy to kindly shelterings. George grew up t manhood the accepted child of Dominie M'Crae; for the schoolmaster had no family of his own, and his dame wife appeared equally hearty with herself in showing her affection for their adopted and interesting boy

The young man had reached his twentieth year, and being carefully tutored by his patron, he was an apt scholar, and served as assistant-teacher to his benefactor. But the connexion was not designed to last for ever; for shortly after George had reached his twentieth birthday, which was celebrated by much merriment often the full vigour of usefulness by the running of an artery during the excitement consequent on an "examination" of his school before the local authorities.

Having seen the remains of his adopted father duly sheltered in his own family vault, and having decently performed his duty to the widowed wife of his benefactor for some months, by preparing all the consolation under such sad circumstances that a young and warm heart can offer, George resolved upon leaving Doone and wending his way to London, as affording a wider field for his exertions in literature. Parting with his mother, and having offered the same and the gratitude at the graves of those he loved, George Chisholm left his native village, the scene of his early joys, and six days after reached London

To a stranger, even in search of employment, London is such an amount of novel variety, such an endless round of fine signs to be witnessed, gratis, in the metropolis, that the desire to testthe eyes is seldom satiated, until they have had free indulgence for a series of weeks. The excited mind, the curiosity and the glutton at the graves of those he loved, George Chisholm left his native village, the scene of his early joys, and six days after reached London

To a stranger, even in search of employment, London is such an amount of novel variety, such an endless round of fine signs to be witnessed, gratis, in the metropolis, that the desire to testthe eyes is seldom satiated, until they have had free indulgence for a series of weeks. The excited mind, the curiosity and the glutton of the shows, George Chisholm spent the first five weeks of his existence in a circuit of enjoyment. Having at length satisfied his thirst for the marvellous, he set about the purport of his visit, and Chisholm waited upon several of the principal publishers in town. Situations in connexion with the press are at all times difficult to obtain; and unfortunately, poor George had neither the authority of patron, nor the recommendation of influential friends, to sway the at best doubtful decision of the publishers' universally called forth something like—

"Oh, you are too young a writer: you ought to study the different styles of older authors, and, if possible, endeavour to gather some of their beauties by a course of reading."

The simplicity of rural life so sacredly drew out a reproof from the sensitive George, to the effect, that he was no scribbler, neither did he aim at plagiarism, however profitable it might be; and that he did not see anything approaching to honesty in accepting the language, the style, and the thoughts of another as his own. Such a retort was calculated to bring the glow of shame to the cheek of the presumptive blockhead who could amuse himself with such a senseless "experiment;" which appears to have been its result for the harmony of the collhearted mediocr was but imperfectly hid when, with blandest smile and assumed courtesy, the poor fellow was ushered by the fortunate and wealthy scion of letters to the door; and a half-suppressed sneer at the course unpolished entrance of the Scotsman was the last measure of kindness offered to the stranger.

There is a cruelty, not less refined than apparent, in the conduct of parties, boasting possession of the luxuries and comforts of fashionable success, when they permit the crude nature to ever balance that benevolence and kindness of demeanour which ever ought to characterize true refinement and good breeding.

At this very moment when honest indignation was seeking vent in warm language for the insulting usage he had met with, the poor fellow was starving' and the last might have been read by the heartless trifters, had they only looked upon his face. Yes; George Chisholm, the educated and intelligent native of his country, was craving employment when he ought to have been soliciting charity—for he was starving'. Oh! would the man enshrouded in power and affluence only consult effects before he attempts to estrange the sympathies existing with the feelings of his fellow-mortal; and when he cannot aid, let him not annihila.e with the hollow promise, or the cold comfortless denial Yet nobly did the pure nature of the unprovoked assault rise against the wrongs thus heaped upon him: for he now and then felt the influence of healing balm in the sympathy of real friends, administered to him in his cheerless caravan for a place; and many a generous token he received, which proved to him that the fields had not yet a little verdure left. There are noble hearts encased in robes of etiquette; and many were the hearty glances of condolence, not unmingled with the distressing word and the generous deed, awarded the stranger in his wanderings. Why should we regret the declines of humanity, and, so long as we possess the means refuse to confer as great an amount of happiness on our fellow -men as, consistence with us, we ought? We do not live for ourselves in this world, but for each other. It is, with all aid with each, a boundless duty to give best efforts in aid of those diffusive good soothing the sorrowing by kindness and the unmanly by timely support to the weak; helping the needy; and never allowing opportunity to slip when we might have rescued a fellow-creature from suffering but conceiving it to be an absolute duty due to the world and to ourselves, to be responsible agents, where we may, with all our heart, to evince the sincerity of our wish to leave the world better than we found it. This is our task; the neglect of its performance is criminal, and shall bear its proofs in fearful array against us at the hour of trial

It appears that while poor Chisholm was, thus, unsuccessfully seeking a situation, his only physical support for the entire day was a single roll and a cup of coffee! This was his allowance in the morning. The remainder of the day was spent in visiting the publishing offices; and, when waiting at some of the westend houses, so fast he might accomplish his call at the stipulated hour, previously served upon him some one of the numerous domestics, who were ever on the lounge The cravings of his stomach for the natural supply of food were answered by the poor fellow visiting a public well, and there, then and again, during the entire day, he drank water to excess, and thus meant literally to appease his hunger.

Ere knew sight of those schemes to sustain existence; for Chisholm kept his wants, his utter inability to meet them, and the fact that he was starving, scarcely buried in his own breast. I doubt not, had the family of his earning states been told open of his newly acquired friends, their friendship might have assumed a tone and bearing more substantially in accordance with the nature of his object; and, much less, of that fastidious delicacy which the position of the Scotsman would have been rendered apparent in the conduct of his acquaintances. But this unmanifested, no pressing, reason why they should exert themselves in pressing for a situation to the stranger, as a means of enabling him to earn a subsistence: for they were darkly ignorant regarding the actual state of poverty and destitution to which the unfortunate was reduced, so far as there was authority, they were purposely kept in darkness; for his proud heart could ill brook the publication of his necessities; and therefore, unseen, unknown, unpitied, he bore the pangs of hunger, and the misery of his existence, like one master with his accumulations, securely closeted in an own bosom

The feverish excitement, the anxiety, and the hunger in due time produced their trials, and George Chisholm, unable to fight longer against their united influence, sank in debility, the destined victim of disease, on a bed the ost he would occupy.

It was at this particular time that I was summoned to attend at the bedside of the young Scotsman. He resided with a widow lady, one of his own countrywomen. and had been her lodger ever since his arrival in London. The hour was somewhat late when I reached the house, and I was informed that the sick young man immediately, for she thought he was dying I remembered the fear of my visitor, she was a strict Presbyterian and a member of my own congregation; and I resolved instantly to obey her summons. I was not well fluted, by her dihood of nature, to console the physical sufferer, and to learn and look upon his sufferings; but I have ever acknowledged it to be a clergyman's especial and imperative duty to share with the sick and dying the manifold and pressing cares which, more or less, are the doom of every mortal at the "last scene of all

and the service due to the minister of a Divine Master are then the more essentially worthy of being efficiently performed at the expense of every other earthly consideration on the part of the servant, seeing that the time is pressing and the hour needful. I have ever found the hearty performance of this duty productive of the highest moral enjoyment.

As I have already said I consider it a duty to offer consolation, such as our sacred tenets afford, to the sick chamber, I at once accompanied my hostess to her home. The house was located in one of the numerous streets in the vicinity of St Paul's, and leading to the river. A walk of some fifteen minutes carried us to our destination, and we entered the door. All outside the building appeared to be kept in a state of commendable cleanliness and order, and, entering the interior, the neatness of the lane of alley, looked every way eligible as a comfortable place of residence for the inhabitants. The parlour into which I was led on my entrance from the street door, and (they being well lighted) we soon gained the top of two flights of stairs where I was ushered into the sick man's room. It was a clean and neatly-furnished apartment, but the appearance of the occupant of the bed was everything looked as if neither labour nor attention had been spared in giving to each article of furniture its requisite amount of industrious appliances, so as to preserve those neatness and order which I had observed in the house. I was not at all Mrs. Cameron to awake him, I sat down on one of the chairs, and devoted a few minutes to a survey of the apartment. There was certainly no superabundance of furniture in the room, but all could be had in requisite quantity with all convenience, a couple of lodgers; for it was supplied with two tables, six chairs, and a basin-stand. A tent-bed occupies one corner of the room, and sundry articles of use and ornament were suspended from a range of pegs over the mantelpiece which I felt glad to note. On one of the tables, near the window through which the room was lighted in my time, I observed a number of volumes neatly piled together. On the top of the pile lay a small Bible, which, as my eye drawn sign from the bed arrested my attention, and a slight movement of its occupant, in changing its position, brought me suddenly with in the notice of George Chisholm. I had been previously informed that he was a native of Doone, or at least to anticipate a visit from some one, for his arm stole out from underneath the coverings and was speedily extended towards me. I hastily seized the proffered hand, and was delighted to find that it was grateful at the manner in which I had in a united him and met his advances

"I am thankful that your engagements have not hindered you from visiting, one so lonely and so helpless as I am;" and he alluded to the coldness of those from whom he looked for kindness, and detailed the many rebuffs he had met with since entering London.

I could not look upon the interesting being before me, nor contemplate a prostration of his youthful strength, without allowing the kindlier feelings to take their full power in his behalf. His fair, open, and ingenuous countenance, and the richness of that masculine beauty which characterise the excellences of the old masters in the features of their grouped subjects. There was an indescribable fairness about the young man's whole appearance, which, from the bed, could not possibly be impressed, by descriptive effort, upon those who had not seen, with their own eyes, the face of the young Scotsman. I have never seen the same peculiarity of appearance in any other person, and I doubt not the reader of fiction in one evident on the choicest creations of art that have yet been placed within reach of my attention. An idea of the prepossessing character of that face can only be gathered from detailed particulars. The well-moulded form of the nose was of a medium shape, something between the Grecian and the Roman. The mouth was small with gracefully curved lines on either side at the junction of the upper and the lower lip. The chin was one used of active muscle, which, even now when slightly tinctured with the hue of death, never appeared to allow any one feature in the face to move without seeming to correspond with and share in the particular movement. The forehead was broad, high, and slightly receiving, or round, and a scarcely perceptible simple showed that, if nature had been fairly dealt with and sustained in her efforts, by the being before me having a plentiful supply of life and nourishment to his health, the brain would have evidenced the fullowing of the chain centre, would have been rendered more and more visible The lower portion of the face was of spare mould; oppo ite, dance really oppo ite, in its shortness, to the long burden of the upper part of the head. Its outline and the free indulgence conceded to his frannonal nature. The eyes, as I have already described, were large and darkly hazel; but there was a lovely expression of deepest innocence and wildness in their every movement when excitement had roused their fire they appeared to kindle into flame, yet did they not, even then, lose their sweet and benign expression; they were a cropped and full dark eyebrows. The whole face was surmounted by a broad, but not unusually high brow; toward the base especially, it looked prominent and slightly uneven. Above and beyond the bone the head was fully and finely developed in the region of science, in the posterior region, downward to the neck, there appeared to be a marked defect, showing a singular lack of animal propensity in that quarter of the "dome of thought," and the head was, in fact, deficient in this defect, the head was above mediocre in size, and of singularly imposing form.

Without being informed of any one particular regarding the nature of the ment with which the young man was confined, one could easily guess its name and know its virulence from the appearance of the sufferer on the upper part of his elevated cheek-bones, and the sunken eyeballs, and burning, feverish, yet damp skin The palms of the hands were of a white with a pulmonary hectic, though continually wet with perspiration, they still retained the same unnatural softness and scaly dryness on the backs and between the fingers. The shrivelled skin, too, on the hands, and arms, and neck, told fearfully of the rapid progress which disease, or hunger, or perhaps both, had already made in the frame before me Twas a melting sight, to contemplate that shattered fabric, the which, within its physical beauties, enclosed so much that we should love, and could fall to admire in the character of noblest man. I looked in sorrow upon the wreck, and pardonable weakness conquered me, for my heart was pained with the sight of so much blighted promise.

Having effected as much as I could in allaying the excitement of feeling seeming awakened in the mind of my young friend, from glancing at the past scene to whom he allude I, and review my some of the incidents which had been summoned to his memory the reality of the insult and wrong he had latey borne, I told him that he must not grieve at these ills unnecessarily, for they were more or less, in some shape, the entailed penalties exacted at every door "It is natural that all sufferers should look upon their own trials as being especially severe, when they felt the one themselves and only heard of the other as the ills of a neighbour. We are all open to them as tests of our moral courage, and, according to our patience under, and subjection to, these decrees, so should we suppose the value of our character as sincere believers to be enhanced.

"You do not mean that these trials are essential to our eternal safety as immortal beings; nor that the Deity has subjected us to these troubles only with the design of testing our amount of endurance without repining?" said the Scotsman

"No, I replied, "there can be no laxity of mercy attributed to a source so pure. These trials or punishments are ever the evident result of His enforcement of divine will, and never mean us without having a purpose had in their application, whether applied to nations or to individuals Our limited conception and imperfect knowledge prevent us from seeing the full import of their tendency particularly while we are suffering, else we could easily trace the connexion between cause and effect, the purpose and the object. It is not our reason, but a spurt, sudden, and unexpected, to contradict, or check, when we are unwilling when we must perceive the intention. We are equally ignorant regarding the character of many of the simplest laws which regulate and govern external nature; and it is but reasonable to conclude, that when we are temporarily prevented from attaining correct data for decision in these terrestrial laws, how much likelier is it that we are yet totally blind regarding the will of Deity. If we would summon sufficient knowledge to our aid when we are suffering from these trials, we might easily discover that they were justly awarded as punishments for moral criminality or culpable negligence, and when so aided, we calculate results, we find that all have been ordained for our benefit."

"If so unnatural," con
the glance from my face hurriedly, as if aware that he had said something to offend But, if I understand the probable deduction inferred by your reasoning, you assume that such a logical position when defending the justice of Deity. should indeed feel lost, 'the continued," would my friend give me so much reason to grieve at the secular character of his faith, and the absolute cruelty ex ned by my success if I were to lose my faith in so beautiful a system as that of

"I am not at a I surprised that you should have, undesignedly, misinterpreted my definition, for the subject matter is one upon which all the theories of infidelity have been built, and, although I am of the family of belief that these theories were originated from the best possible motives, with a design of establishing truth as the basis of religion, yet it is my impression that the theorists put a person to their contemplation too early, and so mystified the light of revelation that their original purpose, they would ultimately have attained their object; for the thin artificial shading of sincere Christian, and the sincere infidel—I mean infidelity to be broken up by discovering one single link—so nearly, so very nearly allied are truth and falsehood to each other, that one plea alone is all that interviews between the two parties, and the end of the false assertion put upon these laws by ambitious hypocrisy and blind fanaticism, when parties attempt to solve the sacred origin of their opinions by adopting them to suit their purposes; seeing that unconsciously, and unknowingly, their standard of bigotry and temporal power, and insane zeal and religious fashion. I do not define the virtue and object of these laws to over these designs of bad men by the definition; yet so it must be read. And for a moment let us consider the will of Omnipotence may be perceived detaining results, strictly merciful results, in the rigorous enforcement of these our worldly cares, and difficulties, and trials. And as I see, in some of these effects, the workings of their own and ultimate design. I cannot but surrender belief regarding many others, though I cannot penetrate the veil with which they are covered. We are equally ignorant regarding the purposed end in the several and merciful existence of a flower or a leaf, and yet we never doubt that they are the product of intelligence in carrying out nature's laws: and why should we resist, or refuse to believe in the one case more than in the other? But the impetus given to knowledge of late, and continued for a while while longer, will quickly dispel those mists of prejudice, and the future will be put in possession of facts, the existence of which we now very unchivalrously deny.

"I am glad, really happy, responded I talking, "that your solution of these doubts, and production of simple truths on hen, corresponu so nearly with my own belief; for to me they have ever been serious obstacles when attempting to reconcile the apparent inconsistencies with which our faith is sometimes clouded. By the adoption of the liberality in our belief I can easily divine the motives which impel bad men to shield their wickedness with a cloak of professed belief, and, like you, I long for the fast-coming time when the mask shall be torn from the face of hypocrisy, and the loathsome deceit shall be bared to the gaze of every sincere professor of the doctrines of the Saviour, and to all practical believers in the principles of Christianity."

After a little further converse, I fulfilled the purport of my mission, I trust, with sensibility; merit in my visit, and success to relieve him from the warmth of excitement which the presence of a stranger, with a powerful desire to unburden his mind of its weight of sorest thoughts and peculiar opinions, had aroused, in the hope that the present state of his being would not long last I would repeat my visit on an early day. He grasped my hand nervously at parting, and the large hot tears burst from his eyes, as if expressing gratitude for my endeavour to relieve him from the wounded spirit and the fever-tossed frame

Before leaving the house, I desired the landlady to supply all his wants at least such as the then condition of his frame demanded, for I would cheerfully bear the expense, as I considered it my duty to relieve him from the fear that could be done for him by me, either in my capacity as a minister of the gospel, or in accordance with the sympathy I could not but feel towards the poor Scotsman, as a young man in a strange city, and one who had parted from his friends with the struggles of the flesh. He would soon reap the reward of his purity by a welcome suitable to his works, in the regions of immortality and bliss.

"Oh, Sir, you are kind to the poor," said the landlady, "and I know him better, you will esteem him more and more. He did not deserve the harsh treatment he has met with in London, neither was he able to bear hardships in a struggle to which these have been added in so many cold ways. I will attend to what you say, that he had been starving at the very time when he appeared so cheerful in my house; and when the smile of contentment was ever to be seen on his face. Oh, had I known his struggles and their cause, I would have done more for him and with my last bite for him; and so would every lodger in th. house, he is such a favourite, and such a good, good Christian in his conduct and in his words

I could not help admiring the warmth of the woman's affection for George Chisholm. I knew he deserved the full measure of love from her and her lodgers; for I had never seen a human being that so suddenly had acquired boundless over my own heart as the poor lonely Dominie. I felt consoled when I considered that poor George was certain at least to have the benefit of a kind home and the fireside enjoyment of a good woman to accept a trifle for the purchase of some little comforts to her lodger, I departed

Next morning I could not divest my mind of the sorrowful impression created by my visit, and the previous night's scene. The subject of the sudden illness which I engaged, George Chisholm, the interesting Scotsman, was uppermost in my recollections; neither could I account for its unusual hold his features, converse, and circumstances had taken upon my mind, for I had never before been a dozen hours aware of his existence, when the young man had possession of my memory as if the undisputed intimacy of years had unceremoniously ruffled the sanctuary of solitude The singularity and suddenness of such a connexion—the product of an hour—could not fail to have serious influence upon my feelings for the time being, and I resolved to gratify the yearning desire I felt by visiting the sick man with the first spare hour I might command.

Two days after, having the day before officiated as usual in the * * * * church, I had to leave London on a hasty visit to a near relative, distant some twenty miles from the metropolis. Even at Lower House, the dying Scotsman, with his pale face and his long dark gl say hair, and the fervour of his language, were continually present in my mind; and I re roowed when a visit of two days saw my relative rapidly nearing convalescence upon which was pronounced by a be an attack of hydrothorax, to which the family were bel this permitted me to return home Next day the first sa of thought was George Chisholm, and I resolved that the first spare hour I could command of my young friend. With hasty steps I reached his abode, and obtained admission to his apartment. Though I did anticipate a change to the worse in the sufferer's malady, I was hardly prepared to look for such an alteration as one glance upon the face of my young friend told me had, already, irrevocably sealed its impression there. The eyes were fast getting buried behind the now rising cheek bones, and around, the deep hazy hue of approaching doom, a fearful preface to the grave, was deeply tinctured in the skin. The nose had lost its ward sign of life, for it was sharp and pointed, and presented a sickening appearance of unearthly paleness, slightly tinged with yellow. The lips were of the same sad dye. The whole face evidenced a change which alarmed me, and I regret that my looks betrayed my feelings at the moment, for I was not a powerful speculator with the sudden bearing of the scene to which they were now witnesses. The old woman introduced them to her minister. I remained for a few minutes in prayer to Giver of Life and the Dispenser of Good, the smothered sounds from the bed told of the vital interest with the dying Christian felt in the language of comfort and the words of truth. Having now finished our devotions, each of the young man leaned over the form of the , whispering their secret hopes to the dying man. Unable longer to suppress grasped the hand of their youthful friend, and a prayer, and sobbing sadly, and weeping, left the room. I could not witness such a trying scene unmoved, nor could I bridle my feelings enough to prevent sharing in its impressive effect

We were now alone, and I took that opportunity of administering whatever consolation was within my reach. I felt revived during the performance of this duty, this work of mercy, when my young friend offered up his heart in prayer, and, in a flood of sacred eloquence, poured out at the throne of grace all his feelings in an appeal for mercy.

What a dawning comfort and an elevating vigour is given to us when we feel that our labours are labours of love and of duty!—when the separations of truth are sanctified by the due performance of deeds, speaking the sincerity of our faith—deeds resulting from the purity of a newly-awakened conscience! Need I say I felt happy in the presence, and aided by the heart-willed service, of that lying Cornish——

All the corners with the Seatsman, opened up the mine of knowledge, genius, and virtue which the late Rev. Charles Chisholm was plenteously stored. On examining the ore that he so lavished the loveliest germs of our nature blossomed, known, in the soul of that poor, destitute, neglected, ill-fed Scotsman, for his judgment was of rare kind in strength and beauty, and a power of fancy rich and brilliant served to adorn the intellect of that gifted being. How gladly I dwelt on the chaste measure of his words, and admired the might of conception and the grace of expression characterel in his ideal creations,—as the young poet's thoughts, with the voice of sweetest music, came streaming on my ear. Nor did I undervalue his opinions regarding our earlier and later sons of song—the English poets; for he felt with them, and eloquently appealed for justice to their memories. Milton was his favourite, and I can still remember how nobly he asserted the claims of the Bard of Paradise to the best place in the temple of Fame, for the character of his works and the design and moral tendency of all his labours; and how indignantly the generous-minded Scotsman repelled the uncharitable reflection of mind upon those departed, in burying the gross wrongs of the Latin secretary in oblivion. Those sordid intellects received the Poet with the smile of unsimulated re, and rejected the Moralist and the Man with the foolhardiness of savages rather than civilized beings.

The page of philosophy also lay open before him—and the dark and the doubtful of the past were contrasted with the present progress and the proficiency had in the future—when supersition, plausible sophistry painted wrong, coloured falsehood, and bigotry would perish for ever. He continued

"Our religion, too, will benefit by the change, for with increase of mind the progress of truth will keep pace, and our principles, braced and manly-strengthened, and openly trumpeted upon, will then be restored in their primitive purity, and in all power, and then interested to the whole world, to be preserved as holy and as worthy the adoption of every rational being, and only losing their virtue when time shall be no more.

I passed some hours in joyousness at the bedside of George Chisholm and when I rose to depart I could not refuse my unheard amen to a wish that we should meet again on earth, although I saw but little hope pictured in the sickened frame of my young friend. When I stood over him, he tremulously clasped one of my hands which he had won, and his quirky heaving breast and stream my eyes full, he knew he suffered in parting with one he looked upon as a friend. My own heart had its struggle too, when he said—

"I shall never see you again, for I feel the dregs of life are what is left. Oh, how fain I have I wished that you had known me earlier! My heart yearns towards you ever since you came to visit and to cheer my lonely spirit. All my better things to you as the child's feelings to his father!" He could utter no more but turned his face away from me and sobbed like an infant.

I tried to cheer him, but in vain; indeed, I did wrong in making the attempt, but the evil was of short life, for the young man knew that the call had been made and he was prepared to obey the summons.

He raised his head from the tear-bedewed pillow and putting his hand under it, drew therefrom a small Testament, neatly embossed, with edges gilt, and, placing it in my hand, again laid down his cheek on the pillow. I could hear the scene no longer and mastering all the energy at command, I passed his fevered brow and, murmuring a blessing and prayer, I hurried from the apartment.

Alas, the prophecy was literally to be fulfilled, and it was decreed that I had heard the breathings of virtue and of genius from that holy tabernacle for the last time!

I reached my own abode loaded with grief and, retiring to a private closet, braced myself in reflection regarding all that I had seen and heard in the death chamber of Chisholm.

I still held the Life Testament in my hand. On turning over the leaves, I found that it had been a valued and a long-tried friend of poor Chisholm's. Although apparently, it had seen no frequent use, it appeared to have been preserved with great care; for, unlike an old book, it was perfectly free from grease, or soil, or blemish. I saw a token of love and merit from his benefactor; and it had already been in his possession nine years. On the first fly-leaf preceding the title-page, and evidently written in a neat small hand, in the likelihood by the schoolmaster himself, was the following Love, the gift of a New Testament," from John M'Cra the parish of Port Dou ness, Perthshire, to George Chisholm, for his birthday, as a token of his esteem, for his good conduct, good behaviour, and general attainments at school." Underneath, in the same fair hand penned seemingly by a scholarly hearer of the same years and late, and probably the ex emporer production of young Chisholm on receiving the sacred volume, the following verse is written —

> Reader! make this thy constant friend,
> 'Twill prove a solace to thy mind
> When thou art forsaken by mankind,
> The world to roam,
> In IT a sure confidante find
> To Heavenly Home.

How prophetic; and alas! how true.

Next morning I called early at his lodgings, and his weeping landlady was the bearer of the mournful intelligence. I was an hour too late! The spirit of the Christian had been already borne on angels' wings to the realms of glory.

His friends, like every poet's friends, increased in number after death, exerted themselves, and, attended by many of the influential in the city the remains of George Chisholm were carried pompously to the highest burial-ground. In the parade and weekly "honour" claimed by earth's inheritors; those who never felt its wants nor struggled in his difficulties now owned his virtues. Were better, a thousand times better, to award the meed of respect—were it but in form—while it only may assume the shape of a mouldy crust of bread—during the poet's life.

The last wish of the poor Scotsman has been—should be his chief memorial. With heavy heart I bore the lock to its last pillow; and in that quiet bed his ashes slumber still,

"Where the weary are at rest

The northern extremity of Highgate Cemetery was the portion chosen as the peaceful home of the poor stranger. A neat plain marble slab has been raised above the soft earth to denote the particular spot; and the following inscription, cut in Egyptian letter, points out the locality:—"Erected to mark the spot where the mortal remains of George Chisholm, a poor stranger from Scotland, are laid, who died in London, early in the Autumn of A.D. 1830 aged 21 years." The world could neither afford him patron nor friend. Peace to his memory.

The Life Testament is the only other record that lives to attest the existence of a young man whose genius, virtues and misfortunes, deserve a tear of sympathy from every noble heart.

London could they dead walls speak the whole truth, how many victims could then succour in thy train! and how many secret proofs couldst thou cite that thy grasp of peaceful asylums extends wherever the heinous and undeserved cast to the tide of "Barrying place" and especially halts then as the Grave of genius!

THE DOG OF NEWFOUNDLAND.—A dog is a worthless, lazy, good-for-nothing fellow, George Harvey, came off to us to-day. This animal was of a breed very different from what we understand by the term 'Newfoundland dog,' in England. He had a thin tapering snout, a long thin tail, and rather thin but powerful legs, with a lank body, the hair short and smooth. These are the most abundant dogs of the country, the long-haired curly dogs being comparatively rare. They are by no means handsome, but are generally more intelligent and useful than the others. This one caught his own fish. He sat on a projecting rock beneath a fish-flake, or stage, where the fish are laid to dry, was like the water, which had a depth of six or eight feet, and the bottom of which was white with fish-bones. On throwing a piece of cod-fish into the water, three or four heavy, clumsy looking fish, called in Newfoundland, 'sculpins,' with great heads and mouths, and many spines about them, and generally about a foot long, would swim up to catch it. These he would 'set' attentively, and the moment one turned his broadside to him he darted down like a hawk, and it was all over. He came up without the fish in his mouth. As he caught them he carried them regularly to a place a few yards off, where he laid them down; and days and as late in the summer he would sometimes have a pile of fifty or sixty cods, just at that place. He never appeared to eat them, but seemed to be fishing merely for his own amusement. I would take them away from him at times, and when the boat was at a distance, I observed he would swim after it, and paddle it about. I believe he was white, and Harvey said he had to 'tell' before the fish, but whether it was by that speech or by some other means of communication, I could not exactly decide.—Newfoundland, by J. B. Jukes, M.A.

SLAVERY IN AMERICA.—Slavery, be it borne in mind, was a legacy left to America by her British mother. When she separated from us, she said this hath some cancer eating its way, not into an extremity of limb, which might have amputation, but into its very bosom—in close contiguity with its vital parts. Slavery in the United States was not, as we left it, a distant colonial mischief, but a domestic institution. It had woven itself into the ordinary arrangements, and the social habits into the daily avocations, of American society. It had gendered there the spirit of caste—the prejudice of colour. The evil required a large amount of virtue and of moral courage to get rid of from the population of the country could muster. American as conscious of the wrong—one feels to disgrace and, hitherto, who has wanted resolution to repent and reform. Slavery, like a foreign body, has been sore an infamy to admit of handling. On this repulsive, loathsome, inflammatory, with its consequent tenderness, does not confine itself to the original seat of disease—it spreads to neighbouring parts—it heats and fevers the whole social body. Hence we have Lynch-law and pro-slavery mobs. Hence, the tyranny of the press, and the despotic treatment of private sentiment. The polished institutions of the people and their social conditions are at war one with another; and not republicanism, but slavery, must be regarded as answerable for constant insurrection of the people of the United States is overbearing tyranny, and disgust.—American paper.

CURIOUS EXPERIMENTS PROVING THE CAUSE AND REVERSE OF HUMAN LONGEVITY.

The scientific world has lately been enriched by a paper published in the transactions of the "Surgical Institute of Paris" by the Spanish surgeons Gonzales and Valdez, assisted by Mons. Peirot, of Paris, relative to experiments made by them during several years practice in Andalusia in Spain; and when it is taken into account the difficulty of obtaining subjects in prejudiced Spain for dissection, the obligations of the medical world to these scientific gentlemen will be much enhanced

The paper states that their time for several years was devoted to observations made on the habits and manners of the extremely aged, and also post mortem experiments. Out of fifteen cases where the parties died from 90 to 100, they found but three in which the arterial functions including the ventricles had ossified and in these subjects it was observed that the bowels and stomach exhibited every symptom of scurvy and health. On enquiry it was stated by the apothecary of the village that "their custom was to purge the alimentary canal periodically at least weekly, the conclusion arrived at was, that by attending to this great essential to health and longevity, purging the bowels, these three persons had prolonged to such case a naturally weak frame for many years beyond the period which the reverse mode of conduct would have led to. On dissecting the remaining 12 (with one exception and that arising from malconformation) the heart, lungs, and arteries were found in as healthy a state as in much younger persons; their decease occurred from morbidity of the stomach and bowels, beginning in costiveness, and ending in constipation and death. It was proved that till the last moment, they had seldom or never taken medicine, except in extremity, and then in such cases her remedy had been strong mineral drastics, such as calomel, &c. The conclusion arrived at in these cases, proves to a demonstration that had these old persons taken led to the state of the alimentary canal or bowels by gentle purgatives, that their already prolonged ages would have extended to a much longer period

As an illustration of this hypothesis, it is on record, that the life of the oldest man in England was preserved to a patriarchal age by his constant attention to the cure of all diseases—the bowels. Old PARR, called in old English phraseology "THE OLD MAN WISE," by a simple herbal medicine, prepared by himself and the prescription or mode of preparing which has been fortunately discovered within those few years, preserved his health and mental faculties during the reign of ten kings and queens of England. The attention of all classes of the British community has been enlisted to the undeniable virtues of PARR'S LIFE PILLS; and a vast majority of the People evince their unqualified approval of the high character awarded this medicine, and are daily becoming more and more convinced, not only of the efficacy, but—to use a familiar term—the innocuity of this renovator of the human race. Hence the proprietors, from time to time, have been obliged to enlarge their establishment; and compelled to avail themselves of the combined aid of mechanical skill and steam power; so as to measure out supply in accordance with the demand;—an increase in consumption—which the philanthropist of every grade and of every clime will be glad to learn is rapidly extending its healing and generous influence to every corner of the civilised world

GOD SPEED THE PLOUGH.

[From Songs and Ballads for the People," by the Rev. J. M. Neale, B.A.]

The teams are waiting in the field,
The ploughmen all a-row;
As brisk and gay as birds in May.
They make a goodly show.
The farmer stands, and sees all hands
Turn'd out and ready now;
Yet ere they start, with all our heart
We'll say, God speed the plough!

We plough the field; but He must yield
His sunshine and His rains;
In hope we plough, in hope we sow,
That he will bless our pains.
'Tis even weight and furrow straight,
That bears away the bell;
So oft! And now God speed the plough,
And send the ploughman well!

VOLCANO.—A volcano of a novel kind has broken out in the neighbourhood of Konigshatte, in Silesia. For twenty years a slow fire, which occasioned no alarm, has burnt in the coal mines of that district; but recently it has shot out immense volumes of flames, which threaten destruction to the surrounding buildings, and to the vast forests of the country. A steam-engine has been established for the purpose of discharging water into the mines; but this machine had been in action at the last accounts for seventy-two hours, without producing any effect.

DISSENTING AND LIBERAL ECONOMY.—Sir R. Inglis, in his place in the House of Commons, stated that the Registration Act, so clamoured for by the Dissenters and so opposed by Churchmen, cost the country ninety thousand pounds a year. Last year, these Dissenting marriages, including Jew, Infidel, Socinian, Atheist, and Nothingarian, amounted to eight thousand two hundred; so that these dissenting, &c. marriages cost the public eleven pounds each.

DIPLOMATIC STRATAGEM.—We are told by Busbequius, that while he was apparently ambassador, but really a prisoner at Constantinople, he made an artful though justifiable use of Turkish aversion for everything of the hog kind. His narrative shall appear in the words of the translator:—"This humour of theirs being known, we put a pretty trick upon them. When anybody wished to send me a secret message, he would include it in a little bag, together with a roasting pig, and sending it by a youth, when any chiaux (or guard) met him, he would ask what he had there? Then the boy, being instructed before, would whisper him in the ear, and say that a friend of mine had sent me a roasting-pig for a present. The guard, therefore, would push the bag with his stick, to see whether the boy spake the truth or no; and when he heard the pig grunt, he would run back as fast as he could, saying, 'Ge, thee in with thy nasty present.' Then, spitting on the ground and turning to his fellows, he would say, 'Tis strange to see how these Christians doat on this filthy, impure beast! They cannot forbear eating it, though their lives lay at stake.' Thus they were taken in, and the boy brought me what secret message was sent for."

JOHN WILKES, THE FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE.—One evening, when the House of Commons was going to adjourn, he begged permission to make a speech, "for" said he, "I have sent a copy to the 'Public Advertiser,' and how ridiculous should I appear if it were published without having been delivered."

The Alexandria correspondent of the Semaphore de Marseilles writes, under date the 26th ultimo, that 21.000 stand of arms had been landed there by an English steamer, and that the boxes in which they were contained had been immediately forwarded to Suez. Our own correspondent states, that the Russian merchants of Alexandria enjoy the privilege of exporting produce on payment of a duty of 3 per cent., while all other merchants (English included) were compelled to pay 12 per cent.

"Ma," said a hopeful youth, "may I go play horse to-day?" "No, child," was the reply. "Well, then, if you don't let me, I'll go and get the measles; for I know a boy who has 'em prime."

NINE HUSBANDS.—At Birdbroke was buried in May, 1681, Martha Blewitt, who was the wife of nine husbands successively. The text to her funeral sermon was—"Last of all the woman died also.

LOST IN A FOG.—"Suppose you are lost in a fog," said Lord C—— to his noble relative, the Marchioness, "what are you most likely to be?" "Mist, of course," replied her ladyship.

MENTAL RESERVATION.—An Irish sailor, in a storm, invoked his tutelar saint, promising that if he would deliver him out of his present danger, he would offer to him a candle as large as the mainmast, which one of his companions overhearing, whispered, that he could never be able to do it. "Hush," replied he, "I must speak him fair now; but if once I get safe on shore, I'll make him satisfied with a rushlight."

A lady was rating her maid upon the giddiness of her conduct with young men, when the girl meekly observed, "Well, Mem, I'll take your advice, and I WILL wash my hands of 'em all; and then I'LL GOOSE-GREASE 'EM." "How GREASE them?" enquired the mistress in astonishment, "Not them fellars, but my hands," replied the servant, "cause my last missus said goose-grease was safe to KEEP AWAY THE CHAPS."

HERALDS.—These officers had formerly more active and dangerous duties than at present; on the day of battle they bore the royal standard, they ascertained the number of the dead, reclaimed the prisoners, summoned cities and castles to surrender, and assisted at the capitulations. The last instance of a herald being despatched to declare war was in the time of Louis XIII. of France, against the Cardinal Infant Governor of the Low Countries. Since that time, the Sovereigns of Europe have contented themselves with declaring war by manifestoes.

THE WORD "WHAT!"—"What's o'clock?" is the first word which a sportsman says to his valet who awakens him; "and what sort of a morning is it?" "It is fine at present, sir; but I should not wonder but what it will rain before night. What clothes will you wear to-day? and what horse will you ride? The cook also wishes to know what you would like to have for breakfast, and at what hour will you dine?" "What has she got in the larder?" is the next question of the master; who then accosts a sporting farmer, whom he observes mounted on a promising young horse—"What have you got there? what is his age? what is his breed? what is his height? and what is his price?" "What a glorious morning for hunting!" observes one sportsman to another; "and what a lying for a fox!" "Yes," replies the latter, "and what a fine pack of hounds!"

THE WIFE'S UNIVERSAL RIVAL.—It must ever be borne in mind, that man's love, even in its happiest exercise, is not like woman's; for while she employs herself through every hour in fondly weaving one beloved image into all her thoughts, he gives to her comparatively few of his; and of these, perhaps, neither the loftiest nor the best. It is a wise beginning, then, for every married woman to make up her mind to be forgotten through the greater part of every day; to make up her mind to many rivals, too, in her husband's attentions, though not in his love; and among these, I would mention one whose claims it is folly to dispute, since no remonstrances or representations on her part will ever be able to render less attractive the charms of the competitor. I mean the newspaper, of whose absorbing interest some wives are weak enough to evince a sort of childish jealousy, when they ought rather to congratulate themselves that their most formidable rival is one of paper.—Mrs. Ellis's Wives of England.

EXTRAORDINARY PERSEVERANCE.—The Rev. W. Cary, curate of Estleigh, in Devonshire, completed, in the year 1809, a work, entitled "A System of Divinity," which extends to twenty-six volumes. He first attempted to publish it by subscription, but not succeeding, he formed the singular resolution of printing it by his own hand labour. To effect this, he purchased as many worn-out and cast-off types of a country printer as were sufficient to set up two pages, and made a press for himself. With these materials he went to work in 1795, performing every operation himself, and working off page by page. He struck off forty copies of the first 300 pages, twenty-six of which he distributed among the Universities, the bishops, the Royal Society, and the reviewers. Disappointed at not receiving the encouragement he expected from this proceeding, he resolved to spare himself of any farther expense of paper upon those before whom he had thrown pearls in vain; and as he had only reserved fourteen copies of the forty with which he had commenced, fourteen only he continued to print, and at the end of twelve years of unremitting toil, he finished the whole twenty-six volumes—a rare morceau for the bibliomaniacs of the next century! A parallel to the above is to be found in Fransham, the Norwich Pagan, who died in 1811. He one day made this remark—"Every man has some great object which he wishes to accomplish, and why should I not have mine? I will choose such an one as no mortal being ever yet chose; I will get a cup and ball, and I will catch the ball on the spiked end 666,666 times." And this he actually accomplished.—West of England Conservative.

FLORICULTURE.

THE GERANIUM.
"Flowers of all hues"

Byron has defined the stars as the poetry of the skies—in consequence, we suppose, of the refined and elevated feelings which a contemplation of their beauty is calculated to inspire. On the same principle flowers may be considered as the poetry of the earth; for just in the same proportion as we are delighted and instructed by investigating the splendid galaxy of spheres floating above us on a cloudless night, so may we be charmed and improved with the floral beauties of the earth, which the revolving seasons present in such prolific numbers and in such lovely hues and forms. Both equally furnish a moral lesson to man. The heavens only declare the glory of the same Being who pronounced the lily of the valley to be far superior to Solomon even when arrayed in his most gorgeous attire. The moral influence of flowers is indeed very striking. Let any one take a stroll at the present time through some of the courts or lanes of this huge metropolis, and it will be seen that there are thousands of persons who cherish even a little sprig of plant (such as the May-flower, spoken of in our last paper), set in a broken jug, with as much zest as the wealthiest and most extensive grower regards his splendid collection. Now, it has been observed, that among the very humblest classes, the female that has a few flowers in her window is never dissipated; while, on the contrary, the profligate and the vicious rarely show a single flower, or if it appears one day, it is gone the next. Ascending higher in the scale of society, we still find the window-flower an unerring index to the character. If it appears healthy and trim, and shows a vigorous bloom at the proper season, it is a favourable omen; but if the pots are chipped and broken, the plants languishing, many dead leaves about them, and the coming bloom small and feeble, the inference to be drawn is the exact opposite to the foregoing. Now, amongst the numerous groups of flowers which adorn or disgrace the spots referred to, there is none that is more conspicuous than the geranium. Its great beauty, and the facility with which it may be cultivated, has been the means of its becoming occasionally the tenant of every house —from the cottage to the palace. It is, besides, emphatically a woman's flower, being in every sense of the word a window-plant; and window-floriculture has long been considered to be a province that woman is eminently fitted to superintend and adorn. It is with this impression, and with a desire to assist those who derive pleasure from the culture of the geranium, that the annexed instructions for its general management are given. The plant has long been a universal favourite; it possesses attractions that few other plants can boast; for it is easily kept, propagated, and flowered, and continues nearly the whole season in bloom, presenting almost an infinite variety of colour and form. Those that are deficient in fragrance are conspicuous for the splendour of their bloom; and certain kinds whose flowers are less showy have a delightful perfume—some during the evening and night, and others when rubbed against, or when the wind lashes the leaves and branches against each other.

Propagation.—Geraniums are very readily propagated by cuttings; they are so remarkably instinct with life, that there is scarcely a joint in any one shoot, not too old for carrying leaves, but may be made to strike fibres as a root. In August, at which period the earlier flowering kinds will have done blooming, the plants are cut down to within one or two eyes, or to within from an inch, or half an inch, of where the shoot sprung from. The shoots so taken off are made into cuttings about six inches long, and cut close off below a joint; but the leaves should be left on, and not reduced in size, as is too often done. Each cutting is then planted in a pot of the size called large thumbs, and which are about two inches in diameter. They are then well watered, and plunged into a moderate hotbed, kept close and well shaded, till they have begun to take root, when air is gradually admitted to them. The only care necessary during this part of the culture is to pick off all decayed leaves, to prevent the cuttings from rotting, to keep the temperature steady, and, above all, to keep them shaded. In four or five weeks, cuttings so treated will require to be shifted into larger pots, of the size of thirty-two's, after which the plants may be kept in a cool, airy pit, or frame, but kept close to the glass, to prevent their being drawn up weak and tall. Plants so treated will flower in March, if they are properly guarded from the effects of severe frosts. The tuberous-rooted sorts may be readily increased by planting pieces of the roots in small pots, in a slight heat, leaving a small portion of the top of the root above ground. Geraniums are seldom propagated by seed, except with the view to obtain new varieties: these are best sown soon after they are ripe, provided that does not happen after August, in which case it should be deferred till the following March. The seedlings should be grown in very rich soils, and occasionally watered with liquid manure. A soil, composed of one-half very rotten dung, and light rich loam, will be found to answer every purpose. During spring, while geraniums are growing, and throughout the period of flowering, they can hardly have too much water, so that the pots are drained in a proper manner to allow of its passing through. It is not well, however, to place the pots in pans of water at any time, nor is it necessary to apply water over their tops at any period, particularly during winter.

Almost all the choicer species and varieties of geraniums are natives of Southern Africa. But the genus has been augmented to such an extent, that a subdivision became necessary; and systematic writers have changed it to a family, under the name "Geraniæ," or crane's-bill family, which is divided into three genera—Geranium, or the crane's-bill, properly so called; Pelargonium, or stork's-bill, in allusion to the seed-vessel, which resembles the bill of that bird; and Erodium, or the heron's-bill. There are natural distinctions in these, which, notwithstanding their intimate alliance, would have placed them in three different orders of the Linnean arrangement. The geraniums have ten stamens, all perfect and fertile; the pelargoniums only seven; and the erodiums only five. All the florists' geraniums, however, are pelargoniums, having seven-stamened flowers, and, as before observed, are almost all obtained from Southern Africa.

A WINDMILL EXPORTED.—On Wednesday the entire machinery, sails, stones, &c., of a wind corn-mill, were shipped for Hamburgh, on board the steamer Transit, at Hull. This is uly a novel expedition.—Leeds Mercury.

EXECUTION OF DANIEL GOOD.

It is not our intention to disfigure the pages of the "Illustrated News" with engravings, especially connected with crime and its consequences; we do not profess to be of the "raw head and bloody-bones" school, nor do we desire to encourage the tastes of such as are only gratified with pictorial representations of murders and murderers; but in the case of the man, now counting the few last hours that separate him from eternity, the crime for which he will suffer, as well as the revolting circumstances attending it, give a more general interest to the affair than ordinary offences of this character possess. Many of our readers may be disciples of Lavater, and to them we shall for once, in such a case, afford an opportunity of exercising their judgment upon the countenance of this man. We are assured the likeness is a correct one, and as such we give it, though not quite sure if we ought not to apologize for its appearance in this paper.

This is a most correct likeness of Daniel Good
R. Buckland

(Attorney for the Prisoner.)

A good many incorrect statements in reference to the treatment and the conduct of the miserable man since his conviction having been made public, it may be necessary to state, from an authentic source, what are the real facts. Since the alterations that have taken place in the criminal law, the treatment of criminals, both before and after conviction, has been very materially modified. Formerly, upon a conviction for murder, the culprit was taken to a cell appropriated for that purpose, and kept in this cell, almost in darkness, and suffering many other privations, until the time came for him to ascend the scaffold. At the present time, however, prisoners charged with murder are taken to a room in the chapel-yard, where they remain until their trial, and, if convicted, they again return to the same cell, and remain there in the charge of different warsamen until the period of execution. The first occasion on which this cell was appropriated in the way above described was in the case of Greenacre, and since then it has been successively occupied by Courvoisier, Lees, Blakesley, and now by Good.

But for the provisions of the Central Criminal Court Act, many difficulties would have been thrown in the way of the prosecution, by reason of the different jurisdictions that were mixed up in the case. The offence, in the first instance, was committed in the county of Surrey. The prisoner was subsequently apprehended in Kent; examined before a justice of that county; and then brought into Middlesex for examination; finally committed from that county; and, but for the provisions above referred to, it would have been difficult to have framed the case to have freed it from technical objections. It rests also with the Judges at the Central Criminal Court to say, whether a criminal shall be executed in the county where the alleged offence is committed, or in Middlesex; and as Lord Denman, in passing sentence, merely mentioned "place of execution," the convict will be executed at the Old Bailey, and not at Horsemonger-lane. After sentence, the sheriffs now have it in their discretion, not, however, exceeding a period of twenty-one days, to fix the day when the execution shall take place; and, on Monday last, Mr. Sheriff Magnay had an interview with the Secretary of State for the Home Department, relative to the execution of this enormous criminal, and it was deemed right, in his case, to abridge the time usually allowed between the sentence and execution, and Monday next, the 23rd instant, was then fixed as the period of his earthly existence. On leaving the Home-office, the worthy Sheriff proceeded to Newgate, and, in company with the Ordinary, visited the convict, to whom he communicated the intelligence. Good, without appearing moved, affected a disbelief that the period fixed was so short, and intimated a suspicion that the Sheriff was practising on his courage by the representation he had made. Mr. Sheriff Magnay replied, that it was no part of his wish to make any such experiment, but that it was his painful duty to communicate to persons in the criminal's situation, the knowledge of the day on which the sentence of the law would be executed upon them. Good seemed convinced of the fact, but remained unmoved.

Since his condemnation Good has never been left unattended, neither night nor day. For the first two or three days he persisted in the truth of the extraordinary statement made by him after the trial; but it is understood that he has recently made some further disclosures, modifying to a very considerable extent his former statement; but he still persists in asserting that the unhappy woman came by her death by her own hand, and not by any violence that was offered to her by another.

THE SOI-DISANT DUKE OF NORMANDY.—This somewhat celebrated individual seems likely by his misfortunes to establish the strongest claim he has yet made out to a relationship with the exiled branch of the Royal Family of France. The whole of the household furniture and effects of the self-called Duke of Normandy are announced for sale, under a writ directed to the Sheriff of Surrey.

Sir George Arthur, accompanied by Lady Arthur, took his departure on Saturday for Bombay.

BIRTHS.

On the 14th inst., at Huntlesham Hall, Suffolk, the lady of the Rev. W. H Deane, of a daughter.

In Hereford-street, Park-lane, the lady of the Hon. Richard Cavendish, of a daughter.

DEATHS.

On the 7th of January, on board the Lady Macnaghten, on his passage from Sydney, New South Wales, to Calcutta, Major William Gregory, of the 63rd Regiment Bengal Native Infantry, eldest son of the late William Gregory, Esq., aged 53.

At Lisbon, on Tuesday, the 3rd inst., in his 70th year, Major-General Sir Ralph Ouseley, K.B.C. de A.K.C., T.S., K.C.F., &c. It was found upon a pearl-mortier communication, that, at his gallant storming of a French post on the heights of Urdax, when he, with a battalion of his regiment, consisting of 500 men, succeeded in defeating 3500 French, and carrying the post, the musket-ball which entered at the abdomen, and was afterwards extracted at the back, produced injury of the intestines, which even at this distance of time partly contributed to h s death

On the 16th inst., at Silsoe, Bedfordshire, Mary Frances, aged three years and nine months, the elder daughter of the Rev. Edward Lane Sayer

On the 18th inst., at Southfleet, Kent, Jane Charlotte, wife of the Rev. George F. Otter, and daughter of the late Charles Monro, Esq.

At Barbadoes, in his 22nd year, William T. Burton Fitzgerald, Lieutenant 46th Regiment, third son of Sir William Fitzgerald, Bart

Mr W. Marsden, aged 54, through a slight bruise on the great toe, which terminated in a mortification

On Wednesday, the 11th inst., at her residence in Ham-street, Plymouth, aged 85, Miss Maxwell, a lady whose amiable and benevolent disposition had endeared her to a very extensive circle of friends. By the poor especially, to whom she has ever proved a kind and ready benefactress, her loss will indeed be severely felt.

On the 29th ult., at his residence, Mallenv House, General Scott, the oldest officer in the British army. He was in the 97th year of his age, having been born in the eventful 1745, and appeared to be in his usual health on the day preceding his death, which was quite sudden.

Mr Conway Munro. We regret to learn that this promising young man, son of the late General Munro, of Novar Lodge, Pittville, expired on board the Cambrian, on his way to India, under the distinguished protection of the Governor-General, Lord Ellenborough. The melancholy tidings have plunged his mother and family into the deepest grief

On Wednesday morning, at his house in Lower Brook-street, after a short illness, Colonel P Vans Agnew. Colonel Agnew served with distinction for a long period in India, and was for many years a Director of the East India Company. He was a gentleman of very amiable manners and great kind-heartedness, and his loss will be long and generally regretted by a large circle of friends.

At Downton Hall, near Ludlow, after a short illness, the lady of Sir W. E. Rouse, Boughton, Bart.

On Thursday, the 12th inst., at Hatfield, Hertfordshire, in the 44th year of his age, the Rev. Benjamin Pelle, for nearly twenty years curate of that parish.

On the 14th inst., from the effects of a severe fall, Lieutenant-Colonel Acklom, late of the 1st or King's Dragoon Guards, aged 74 years.

On the 16th inst., at the residence of her afflicted husband, in Mountjoy-square, Dublin, universally regretted by her numerous friends and relations, Agnes Cornish Baynton, the beloved wife of Frederick Lindesay, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, and eldest daughter of Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys, Bart., of Miserden Park, Gloucestershire.

On Saturday last, in the 73rd year of his age, Sir William Murray, Bart. He was second son of the sixth Baronet, and succeeded to the family honours on the death of his brother, in 1827. By his marriage with Miss Gayton, the deceased leaves issue several children. His eldest son, Robert, married in 1839, to Mrs. A. C. Murray, succeeds his father in the Baronetcy. The family seat is Clermont, in the county of Fife.

PURITY OF ELECTION.

One of the most distressing signs of public corruption which is reflected by the mirror of the times, is presented to every right-thinking and honourable mind in the profligate uses to which the franchise is turned in this country by those who exercise it without honesty—hold it without discretion—and barter it with a degree of daring prostitution, of which the infamy is as unmitigated as it is supreme. We would fain direct the attention of our readers to this important evil, which legislation has hitherto been able rather to punish than repress—which the Reform Bill, with all its fresh blood and new influences, has failed utterly to avert—and which, at a moment when we are loudest in our shouts for purity in all departments of public life, seems only to flourish with a more daring and reckless effrontery, because its principle is wicked and its purpose base.

Fresh disclosures are daily made to us upon this all-important calamity—the most bitter in its reproaches, the most blighing in its effects upon our freedom, the most withering of all the essential principles of true liberty, and the most anti-national in character and in crime, that can ever afflict the generally beautiful practical operation of our English Constitution.

The late general election, which began as a great strife of party—but one in which more than mere party victories were at stake—seems literally to have been, in almost all quarters of the kingdom, conducted upon systems of the broadest shame, and the most barefaced dishonour; assuming the character of a battle fought, rather with the purse of unmanly cowardice and corruption, than with the sword of justice and under the banner of truth. Whether we allude to the open discussions which have taken place in the House of Commons, or to the still more astounding trials before the legislative committees, we are alike struck with amazement, and penetrated with disgust at the open-mouthed villany which is brazen enough to proclaim its own debasement before the world. Upon the whole action of our elective franchise, there burns the one flaming brand of "Bribery! Bribery! Bribery!" and the concomitant of perjury is too often and glaringly added to the original sin. That sacred pledge of public liberty, with which the nation entrusts a large portion of the people for their own happiness and the general good, is diverted into the great river of Mammon, and principle is changed from a public virtue, by the hideous metamorphosis of treachery, into an incarnate abortion, which is something between a mockery and a crime! What gross instances of wholesale corruption have the election committees elicited; and what a traffic in the very germs and seeds of freedom have the miserable and humiliating details developed and exposed! How have even Members of Parliament themselves cowered under the dread of a petition, and effected compromises as dishonourable to themselves as disgraceful to the public character of their country. The memorable discussion which, but a few weeks past, was fanned into agitation by Mr. Roebuck, was pregnant with the most significant indication of the manner in which those who hold the purse-strings of the nation have drawn and opened their own to achieve the basest influences, and with the most dishonest and abandoned purpose—the purpose of wresting indefeasible rights from others, to obtain, by corruption, a privilege for themselves.

Nor do the people in the many boroughs where the practices of bribery have prevailed seem to have given any check to the stimulus of a candidate's ambition to obtain their suffrages at whatever cost of principle or cash. They have—the melancholy fact is in too palpable evidence—they have "listened to the voice of the charmer," as though the love of his music were inherent in their souls—they have met corruption half way, and boldly embraced it in the open streets—they have made a market-place of the Temple of Liberty, and, in lieu of their freedom, they have set up an image of gold!

And, what renders the fact more publicly unfortunate is, that this sad spirit of corruption and profligacy seems to have seized upon the body politic, and pervaded the social system like an epidemic; it has confined itself to no sect, or creed, or class, but has spread itself over all parties alike, and tainted every shade of political profession. And what a shame is this! Let no one seek to palliate its infamy, or to underrate the measure that it has inflicted of public wrong. It will claim no sympathy; it can be tolerated by no indulgence; it will bear no defence. It is dishonest, unmanly, un-English, and full of the abandonment which sinks nations into slavery, and crumbles greatness into dust. It is mean; it is treacherous. It is ineffably and most miserably base. It lowers man before his own conscience; it withers the self-esteem that gives him character; it warps his judgment, and pollutes his heart.

Now, we appeal to the Legislature, and to the people on their own behalf, to wake the manly spirit and energies of the land to slay this giant of corruption and blind the Polyphemus in his cave. Out with the crying evil, and shake off the garment of the leper before it grows to the skin!

It is a horrible reflection upon all classes that bribery should prevail in any; upon the lower classes it must exert a dangerous influence in staying the progress of their civil freedom; for, with what grace or consistency can the people demand an extension of their franchise when every day proves that it has already gone too far; that it has rushed into the lowest sewers and sluices of corruption; that it has been bought and sold under the pressure of poverty or the lure of wealth; that gold cannot be resisted by the more humble and dependant of those who hold it; that the voice of all the honesty in the land is loud with the cry of "Disfranchise," and the finger of scorn alert to point to the loathsomeness of Ipswich, Sudbury, Stafford, and other dens of public infamy, as stalls of the Augean stable, which disfranchisement should cleanse. See, then, how the people, by accepting the conditions of bribery, at any price, arm men with a weapon which may be directed against the progress of opinion, and be wielded to defeat their rights. Now, with this palpable truth before them, let them rouse themselves into activity to stop the growth of the Upas tree that is poisoning all the health of the Constitution, and sapping the vigour of public life. Let them meet and petition; expressing, firmly and honourably, their abhorrence of the corruption which recent election trials have disclosed; let them repudiate any sympathy with the fearful corruption that has been brought to light; let them invoke punishment upon the guilty; let them pray protection for the innocent; and may their voice so be heard in the Legislative Assembly of the empire, that bribery may be brought to ruin in its iniquity, and purity prevail in beauty, integrity, and pride.

THE PACHA OF EGYPT.

MEHEMET ALI GIVING DIPLOMATIC AUDIENCE.

MEHEMET ALI.

We have been favoured with a sight of a medallion portrait of Mehemet Ali, by Stodthart. As everything connected with this celebrated man is closely connected with the overland route from India, as illustrated in another page, we have been at some pains to obtain an authentic likeness of the venerable, and, as yet, little understood, regenerator of Egypt. Of the personal likeness we are enabled to affirm there can be no doubt, and it is with no small satisfaction we offer this specimen of artistic skill in our columns.

At a meeting held at the Thatched-house Tavern, on Monday, it was resolved to circulate the medal, and to present a certain number in gold to the Pacha himself, as a testimonial of honour from the merchants of England.

Such events imply, of themselves, a peculiar air of serious importance, when it is remembered that the British Government is, at this moment, dependant upon the will of Mehemet Ali for facility of access to our Indian possessions.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Their lordships sat at five o'clock.

The Earl of Burlington and Lord Stafford took the oaths and their seats.

The Duke of Richmond presented a petition from the owners and occupiers of land in the vale of Orford, in Aberdeenshire, against certain parts of the Tariff.

Lord Brougham presented petitions from the Poor-law Guardians of Berwick-on-Tweed, against the bastardy clauses in the existing Poor-law Act; also, from the heads of the incorporated trades of Edinburgh, against a general Income-tax; and from the Mechanics' Institute of London and Poplar, for the exemption of such institutions from all taxes.

Lord Campbell wished to ask his noble and learned friend on the woolsack, whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure to prevent the locking up of passengers in railway carriages?—The Lord Chancellor said, he could not give a satisfactory answer in the absence of his noble friend at the head of the Board of Trade, but he could only say, he had himself been locked up that morning, and was not desirous of any alteration.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.

NEW MEMBERS.

Lord A. Harvey took the oaths and his seat for the borough of Brighton, in the room of Mr. Wigney, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

Sir S. R. Glynne, Bart., also took the oaths and his seat for the county of Flint, in the room of Mr. Mostyn, unseated by the report of a committee

YORK ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. Hayter, as Chairman of the Select Committee appointed to try the petition of the [illegible] against the Return of Lord Ingestre and Mr. Cayley for the City of York, moved the discharge of the Committee.—"That Daniel O'Connell, Esquire, and Lord Robert Grosvenor, the elected knights of the shire, to serve in this present Parliament for the said county."

BOROUGH OF IPSWICH.—NEW WRIT.

Colonel Rushbrooke moved that a new writ be issued for the return of two burgesses for the borough of Ipswich, in the room of Messrs. Wason and Rainy, whose elections had been declared void.—Mr. Wynn said he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the issue of the writ, but he wished to call the attention of the House to what had been the course in the committee room in examining into the merits of the late Ipswich election. For that purpose he was anxious that in the first instance the report should be read by the clerk at the table.—The clerk having read the report, which set forth the belief of the committee that extensive bribery had prevailed in the borough of Ipswich, Mr. Wynn proceeded:—He had looked over the evidence, and it did appear to him that, what ever the cases of individual corruption might be, there was nothing to warrant the temporary disfranchisement of the borough. It was an unfortunate fact, that a conviction for bribery did not carry with it the same stigma as was attached to other offences. He thought it was time that something should not be done. He thought that if further evidence of bribery could be produced, an opportunity should be afforded for bringing it forward, and that instructions should be given to the Attorney-General to prosecute in such cases as had been already established (Hear, hear)—Mr. Escott wished to know whether persons convicted of bribery would be eligible to vote at the ensuing election?—Mr. Hume had no doubt whatever that the next election would be carried by the persons who had been guilty of bribery at the last. (A laugh.) He thought, therefore, that prompt measures should be taken to prevent the renewal of such practices. In the present state of matters, both sides were little anxious to put down the practice, as so far back as 1832 they had all voted against an effectual prevention He thought it was time that something should be done, and should therefore move that the writ for the borough of Ipswich be postponed for fourteen days.—Mr. W. O. Stanley seconded the motion.—Lord J. Russell said, that in the present case he should support the amendment of his hon. friend the member for Montrose, because he thought that if it were expedient that anything in the way of prosecution should be done, it should be done before the issuing of the writ. (Hear, hear, hear.) He should not vote for the suspension of the writ unless some proceedings were about to be taken.—Sir R. Peel: I must protest against the inference of the hon. member for Montrose, that because the leaders of parties in this House may not have associated in certain proceedings, they are, therefore, to be set down as friendly to bribery. (Hear, hear.) I protest against that as a most unjust imputation. I trust, that no party has suffered more from the prevalence of bribery than the party with which I have the honour to be connected. But party interests are a very subordinate consideration in discussing such a question. (Hear, hear.) I can only say that I will lend my help to the utmost of my power in putting down of a practice, which I feel is undermining the influence and respectability of this House. (Cheers.) But, at the same time, I must reserve to myself the power of considering what may be the most convenient course to pursue, for effecting that purpose. My right hon. friend suggests that the Attorney-General should be directed to prosecute the parties accused of bribery. I am inclined to concur in that suggestion; and I think it would be proper that purpose should be made concurrently with the issuing of the writ. I see no cause for suspending the issue of the writ for a fortnight, because within that time it would be impossible to institute any such proceedings. I will, as my right hon friend oug t to give not e for the earliest possible day for the motion which he has suggested, and I think that the writ should be suspended until the motion shall have been made I think that the House ought not to proceed, in the way of right hon friend, and if he will take it up, I will vote for a temporary suspension of the writ. Mr. C Wynn would, on Thursday, propose that the Attorney-General be directed to prosecute the parties concerned in bribery at the election of Ipswich.

THE TARIFF CUSTOMS ACT

On the question that the House should resolve itself into a committee on the Customs Bill, Major Vivian presented a petition from Cornwall, praying that such an alteration might be made in the tariff as would prevent undue importation.—Sir R. Peel presented a petition from Carnwall against the reduction of the duty on copper ore. (Laughter.)—Mr Callaghan said, that observations were inaudible in the gallery, then moved the following resolution: "That, in removing the prohibition to the importation of any articles, there ought not to be charged any duty on the raw material which should not be charged to articles the manufacture thereof; and that, so long as living animals be charged with a fixed duty, salted provisions should be chargeable with an equivalent rate, and not removable from warehouse without payment thereof, except for exportation, as they would be should the clauses referred to in the tariff be repealed."—The Speaker said that he could not put the motion as it then stood; the last clause must be omitted, because the House could not take notice of the tariff before it had passed —The resolution was then put without the words after "exportation."

—Mr. Gladstone said, with regard to the alteration proposed, by withdrawing the present protection from the provision curers in Ireland to a certain extent, he begged to remind the hon member that the British shipowners engaged in the foreign trade were subject to a most severe competition, and it was on that ground that the protection had been withdrawn.—Mr Roche supported the resolution of his honourable friend. He did not approve of this bastard free-trade If they were to have free-trade at all, let them have it in all things The Government used free-trade arguments when free-trade cut against Ireland, and repudiated them when it favoured Ireland Why had they not acted upon them with the Corn Laws. The change in the law with regard to Irish provisions was an unfair and unsound mode of dealing with the Irish trade.

Sir R. Ferguson supported the resolution.—Mr. Callaghan replied; and the gallery was cleared for a division, but some took place. The duty preserves to the countries for the purpose of food be taken by weight." Mr. R. Palmer seconded the motion, and expressed his full concurrence in the opinions of the hon member who preceded him, with respect to this question of the tariff. Sir Robert Peel said: In replying to the observations that have been made upon this particular subject, I will limit myself to the single point, whether it is expedient to continue the existing prohibition, or to impose a duty on the importation of foreign cattle and provisions. I discuss the question with my hon. friend with perfect freedom and candour; I entirely differ from him in opinion upon this subject; but I am not, on that account, insensible to or ungrateful for the support which I have received in respect to my proposal of an income-tax. ("Oh! oh!" and laughter from the Opposition.) Yes, I have received from the agricultural body, this session, most valuable and generous support and assistance. Differences have been made (hear, hear, hear); and the differences which may exist between us cannot disturb my grateful sense of their assistance (oh, oh, and is lighter from the Opposition), and, no doubt, greatly to the disappointment of some who now express dissent I have not the least fear that the differences of to-night will continue beyond to-night. (Cheers.) I, however, now maintain my own opinion; it seems to me that the interests of the country do require that the prohibition on the importation of foreign cattle should be removed, and the proposals which I have made will benefit all classes of the community. (Hear, hear) When I spoke last, there was a prevalent apprehension and alarm at the proposal which I had made. I then said that it was not consistent with the part of a true friend of the agriculturists to assume that that panic was well founded; and the reason which I gave for not acting on those apprehensions, was my belief that they would be found, before we got to the end of the tariff, that those apprehensions were at an end; and the communications which I have received from the country prove the correctness of that impression. I think I may say that the panic has already passed away. I regret that, on this subject, I differ from my friends on this side of the House, but I think strongly that the condition of the large body of consumers demands the change. I do not think—I cannot think—that the change is advised by the interests of the agriculture of England. I say, with regret, that I can make no alteration, no concession.—Mr. Villiers, who with difficulty obtained a hearing, contended that the motion of the hon member for Somerset had been too well treated. The object of that motion was to deprive the starving population of this country of the mitigation which the right hon Baronet intended for them, while, at the same time, it would preserve to the landlords their rents. Throughout the country, starvation and death were proceeding, and, notwithstanding this, the hon member for Somerset came forward with a view to prevent the Minister from relieving the high prices of the land. I made this [illegible] of the tariff of the Government was [illegible] of those who brought forward the amendment was to enhance the price of food on the poor.—Mr. Miles replied, and defended himself from the imputations which had been thrown out against him from the other side of the house. He, and those who supported him, felt as much for the distresses of the poor as the hon. member opposite, who made those imputations. (Hear, hear, hear.) The hon. member briefly replied to the principal arguments that had been used against his motion, and the house divided:—

For Mr Miles's amendment	.. ..	115
Against it	.. ..	318
Majority against the amendment	..	203

The Chairman of the Committees then reported progress, and the house resumed.

THE INCOME TAX.

In reply to a question from Lord J. Russell, Sir R. Peel stated that he intended to fix the third reading of the Income-tax Bill (as we understood) for Monday next.

POOR-LAWS.

In reply to an hon. member, Sir J Graham stated that he intended to move the second reading of the Poor-law bill on Tuesday (this day) week.—The report on the Incumbent Leasing (Ireland) Bill was brought up, and ordered to be received.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS BILL

Mr Roebuck moved for leave to bring in a bill to indemnify witnesses who may give evidence before the committee, to be appointed by the house, to inquire whether corrupt compromises have been entered into in the cases of election petitions presented from Hastings, Lambeth, Lewes, Penryn, Falmouth, and Reading, for the purpose of avoiding investigation into gross bribery alleged to have been practised at the elections for the aforesaid towns, and whether such bribery had actually taken place.—The motion was agreed to; the bill was brought in, read the first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Thursday.

The orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned at a quarter past one.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

RAILWAY TRAVELLING.

The Earl of Ripon, seeing in his place a noble and learned lord (Campbell) who had yesterday put a question on the subject of a practice said to be common in some railway companies, of locking up the doors of carriages on both sides, wished to say a few words on the subject. After adverting to the dangerous nature of the practice, that noble and learned lord had asked what course the Government intended to take with respect to it. It was perfectly true, as the noble and learned lord had said, that the recent dreadful accident on a railway near Paris had excited great alarm in the public mind in this country, and more particularly as it was said that the practice in question had been attended with such a fruitful loss of life had not the doors of the carriages been locked on both sides. Finding this so, the office with which he was connected felt it necessary to see what ought to be done. All the other railway companies had acted on this principle, and would have the desired effect, and he was sure that the directors of the Great Western Railway would give the matter their best consideration.—Lord Campbell said, the explanation of the noble earl was perfectly satisfactory, and would, no doubt, tend to calm the excitement which had been created in the public mind on this matter.

THE TARIFF.

The Duke of Richmond presented a petition, very numerously signed, from owners and occupiers of land in the county of Banff, complaining of certain parts of the New Tariff, particularly of those with regard to the duties on the importation of live stock, and they prayed that due protection might be given to them against the competition of foreign cattle. One effect of these sudden changes, as to import duties, would be, he feared, to turn out to be this—the landlords and farmers would be obliged to reduce the wages of the lab urers, which would occasion much misery, or great part of the wages must be taken from the profits of the farmer. He would not enter further into the subject, but there were certain parts of the Tariff which he did hope might be revised.—The Earl of Ripon said, that if their lordships would bear in mind the circumstance that there were only two parts of Europe which could be imported into this country to any extent worth naming, namely, a small part of the kingdom of Denmark, Holstein, and probably a small quantity from part of Holland; while it was well known that the countries in the northern parts of Germany, which had a large population, could not do without the importation of cattle, and that the population of France and the German League amounted to 64,000 000, besides 27,000 000, the population of these kingdoms, they would have a population of 91,000,000 to supply with the surplus produce in cattle of two small places in Europe Was it, let him ask, at all likely that, with such a competition, the import of foreign cattle into these kingdoms could affect the interests of the agriculturist? He was quite sure that it might, and probably would, affect the prices here to a small extent; but it could never be rather to check any undue elevation of price than to lower it to any material degree. He hoped that the noble duke would not suggest impositions to the home-grower was, in his opinion, altogether out of the question After a few words from the Duke of Richmond, Lord Kinnaird wished to ask the Government whether they had received the letter which he had written them, at this moment, her Majesty had been advised to write such a letter?—(An observation was made across the house, to the effect that the letter had not been read of)—Lord Kinnaird was surprised that the Government had not heard of the letter He wished to see that house occupied in the consideration of measures which would be productive of good to the country At present, the house was occupied in a few observations upon the subject, and their lordships then adjourned until Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. TUESDAY.

NEW WRITS.

Mr. O'Connell said, that he had been returned to that house by two counties, Cork and Meath; he elected to sit for Cork; he therefore moved that a new writ be issued for the county of Meath, in order that the vacancy should be supplied.—Ordered.

Mr. Mackinnon gave notice that on Thursday he would move that new writs be issued for Southampton.

CUSTOMS' ACTS.

On the order of the day being read for going into committee on the Customs Acts, Mr. Labouchere wished to put a question to the right hon. baronet the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. baronet had stated that it was his intention to bring on the Sugar Duties' Bill at an early period. He (Mr Labouchere) thought that when the whole commercial system of the country was undergoing revision, the sugar duties should be considered in connection with the signar duties at the same time.—Sir R Peel said he had thought it right to place the sugar duties in the tariff, in order that the house might have before it at one view the course proposed to be pursued with regard to the import duties He thought it would be advantageous to have a separate discussion on the sugar duties, and, therefore, would now give notice that on Friday week he would take a separate vote on the sugar duties. He would not then enter into the subject, but would enter into committee. Mr. Greene in the chair.—Mr Miles considered that the right hon. baronet had not afforded sufficient protection to the producers of this country, as respected the duty on live cattle. His (Mr. M.'s) proposition was, that duty should be charged on beasts imported into this country at the rate of 5s 6d per cwt. on live weight; and that the duty on dead meat should be charged at the rate of 8s. 6d. per cwt, instead of 8s. per cwt., as proposed by the right hon baronet. If the right hon baronet agreed to this alteration, the apprehensions of the agriculturists would be relieved, and justice would be done to the producer, as well as to the consumer—Sir R. Peel must tell his hon. friend that he could not consent to his suggestion, for he (Sir R. Peel) thought that the amount of duty he had proposed upon meat and cattle was amply sufficient to afford protection to the home producer. The rate of duty suggested by his honfriend would have the effect of discouraging the importation of the most valuable beasts—those which were the heaviest—Mr. Villiers expressed his fear that the remission proposed by Government would produce but little effect. He enlarged upon the privations of the working classes, whose condition he represented as vastly worse than in the earlier times of English history. He attacked the principle of the Corn-law, contending every measure that tended to raise the price of food. The committee then divided upon the amendment moved by Mr. Miles, when the numbers were

For the amendment	.. ..	44
Against it	.. ..	209
Majority against the amendment	.. ..	165

On the question that the rates of duty on oxen, of and from British possessions, imported into this country, be 10s., on Major Vivian rising to move, pursuant to notice, "That the duty on cattle, meat, and other provisions mentioned in the tariff, imported from British possessions, be equal to the import duties from other foreign countries, Sir R. Peel refused his assent.—Mr C Buller saw no probability that such importation would take place on any considerable scale —Lord Howick censured the Government for having, by the Corn-law and the tariff in combination, encouraged the production of corn, and discouraged the breeding of cattle; whereas the contrary policy was the true one for the management of the land.—After some further conversation about the principle of the Corn-laws, Major Vivian consented to withdraw his motion.

SWINE AND HOGS

Mr. Smith O'Brien moved for substance for the proposed uniform duty of 5s per [illegible] duty of 6s per cwt. This proposition he desired to [illegible] Miles seconded the amendment, which was negatived on a division.

THE FISHERIES.

Captain Pechell demanded that some precaution should be taken against the approach of foreign boats to our fishing banks. The British fisheries—those valuable nurseries of our seamen, required protection against foreign interlopers.

A discussion then arose upon the expediency of imposing a duty upon the importation of lobsters, which are at present admitted duty free; and Sir Robert Peel, upon the assurance of Mr. Wakley that the chief consumption of this fish is by the middle and working classes, consented to reconsider the intended impost.—Another discussion arose as to the harbours, which also are, at present, free of duty. But turbot being an article consumed almost exclusively by the rich, the right hon. baronet refused to give way in this instance.

RUTT.

Mr Baring brought forward a remonstrance against the increase in the duty of apples.—Sir E Knatchbull explained, that a diminution of that protection had been made by the late Government in their Customs' Bill without notice.—The Committee then divided upon the question, whether the duty should be five per cent as at present, or 6d. a bushel as proposed by Sir Robert Peel, and the decision was in favour of the latter impost.

The House then resumed.

NEW LAW COURTS

Mr Parker, in the absence of Mr Sergeant Wilde, moved the revival of "the Committee to consider the expediency of erecting a building in the neighbourhood of the Inns of court for the sittings of the courts of law and equity, in lieu of the present courts adjoining to Westminster Hall, with a view to the more speedy, convenient, and effectual administration of justice."—Sir J Graham assented to the appointment of the committee, which was understood to say that there were many reasons why he must reserve his opinion as to the expediency of the removal.

The remaining order were then disposed of, and the House adjourned at half-past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Speaker took his seat at four o'clock

PRESBYTERIAN MIXED MARRIAGES

Mr. Lytton presented a petition from a place in Londonderry, praying for an alteration in the law respecting Presbyterian mixed marriages.

POOR-LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

Mr. Wortley presented petitions from Halifax, Huddersfield, and other places in Yorkshire, praying for the total repeal of the Poor-law Amendment Act.

INDIA

Mr Disraeli gave notice that he would move, on going into a Committee of Supply, that an address be presented to her Majesty, praying for a copy of the despatch authorising the Indian Government to invade Central Asia.

CAPTAIN WARNER'S INVENTION.

Sir F Burdett gave notice that he would, on an early day, move for an inquiry into Captain Warner's invention.

CUSTOMS' ACT.

On the motion of Sir R Peel, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the Customs' Act. Several items were agreed to without change

GAMMON.

On the resolution relative to the duty on bacon and hams being read. Mr. Miles said he wished to direct the attention of the House to the effect of a differential duty upon ham, between the colonies and the United States.—Mr. Gladstone did not think the proposed duty could facilitate fraud by the importation of American produce through the Colonies.—After a few words from Mr. S Wortley, Lord Howick thought her Majesty's Government ought to extend the principle, and impose a duty on all beasts introduced into Canada from the United States of America.—The resolution was then agreed to

On the resolution for imposing a duty on butter and cheese being proposed, Lord J Russell thought it would have been better to have adopted at once a more enlarged and liberal system in our tariff. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Government system commenced with the main articles of consumption —Mr. M Philips thought the duty on cheese ought to be reduced, and he was sure that the British producer had nothing to fear from foreign competition, in consequence of the high price of cheese. Our own farmers were capable of sending into the market cheese of a quality much superior to any that could be procured from foreign countries He moved that the duty should be reduced from 15s. to 7s. 6d. Mr Ewart supported the motion, as it was the struggle of the poor members to raise the price of an article so essential to the poor as cheese.—After a short conversation, the House divided on the amendment of Mr. M Philips.

The proposed rate of duty was then agreed to

On the question that there be levied a duty of 2d. per cwt. on potatoes from foreign countries, and 1d. from British possessions, Mr. S Wortley wished to have some information on this point. He had been given to understand that potatoes might be imported from France and Holland at a very low rate [illegible] for his own part, he might say he felt no great apprehension on the matter. Mr G Palmer said that this was a question of very considerable importance to the agricultural interest of the country; because it resolved itself into the consideration why there should or should not be an impost upon foreign supplies If the growth of potatoes were necessary in England, it was incumbent on the Legislature to protect the home producer He would now ask only for that protection which was given by the present law—namely, the proposed duty of 1s. per cwt. on potatoes, instead of 2d.—Mr Gladstone thought the proposed reduction on potatoes a very great one, but at the same time he believed it to be a very proper one. He did not believe that a great effect would be produced in the way of lowering the price, if a perfect system of free trade were established in regard to potatoes. The object of this scale of duty was to protect the poorer classes of the community on occasions when a failure of crops led to an extravagant rise of price. After some further conversation, the motion was withdrawn, and the item agreed to

Upon the reading by the Chairman of "The duties on copper ore of and from British possessions," Mr Gladstone said he felt it necessary to state, for the information of the hon member (Sir C Lemon), that it was the intention of the Government that the different rates of duty should stand as they did in the table of duties, with the exception of the last. In that case, the duty of £7 10s. would not apply to any copper ore which did not contain 45 parts of metal—Mr. Tufnell said that the question involved in the first vote upon the question of the duties to be levied upon the import of foreign copper was of great and vital importance to the people of Cornwall. The immense imported supply of ore at the present and the intended rates of duties, must tend materially to injure that part of the population of Cornwall which subsisted by mineral produce, amounting to 40,000 souls. He did not wish for any prohibitory duty, but an adequate protection for a large and independent population, which could not procure employment of any other description The hon. member concluded by moving that the words "containing not more than ten parts of copper per ton of metal" be omitted.—The question having been put, Mr Gladstone said, the effect of the motion of the hon member, if carried, would be to remove a low duty which was applicable to a class of ores, of which scarcely any found their way into this country, but which it was very desirable to introduce if they could. He thought he had been entertained by any person on account of this low class of metals.—Sir C. Lemon was anxious to secure all the benefit he could to the miners of the country, and he thought the Board of Trade had taken the proper course; but he doubted much whether the scale of the right hon gentleman would produce the result Mr Labouchere said that, having very much considered this particular subject, he had come to the conclusion that there was no other method to the list of our financial laws which produced more practical evil than this duty in copper.—Mr Pendarves considered the proposition of the Government a very hazardous experiment, for, if the duty on the rich ores of Cornwall were stopped, they would never come into working again. The smelters of this country found the county of Cornwall the best market for the purchase of ores, and there was no doubt that their interests were intimately connected with it.

The committee divided, when the numbers were:—

Mr. Hume objected to the proposed duty on iron, and contended that it should be admitted free.—Mr Gladstone said that the producers of the superior class of iron had always wished for this duty. Mr J Parker had been many years in that house, and scarcely a year had passed in which the constituents had not petitioned the Board of Trade for a reduction of this duty. The competition with Germany was so severe, that seven or eight per cent. was now of the utmost consequence.—Sir R Peel said that the hon gentleman (Mr. Parker) would find that he could not have the satisfaction of informing his constituents, who had so long memorialised the Board of Trade, that the present Government had consented to take off one-third of the duty

Mr Labouchere was understood to propose that the [illegible] unwrought, from British possessions, should be added to the tariff, at 15 per cent, which was agreed to.

The Chairman then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

In answer to an hon member, Sir R Peel said that he would name to-morrow (Thursday) for the further consideration of the tariff, and would take his chance of being able to proceed with it.

Mr Greene brought up the report on the Customs Bill agreed to.

The other orders were then disposed of, and the house adjourned at a quarter to one

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships met at five o'clock.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

Lord Kinnaird rose to move for a copy of the Queen's letter, of which motion he had given notice on Tuesday.—His lordship, who was interrupted by a conference of their lordships with the Commons on the subject of an indemnity bill.—Lord Kinnaird resumed, and said, when he had before called the attention of house to the distresses of the country, the noble duke had treated the matter lightly.—The Duke of Wellington: how lightly?—Lord Kinnaird: The noble duke expressed his belief that the distress had been exaggerated. That belief could not, however, have existed [illegible] he (Lord Kinnaird) was most glad that the Queen had been advised to express in her speech her sympathy with her suffering people. He was also glad that her Majesty had been advised to write a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and that the noble duke had given the noble duke an opportunity of stating that this extremely important subject had been under the consideration of the Government. (Hear.)—The addres was then agreed to

COPYRIGHT BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the house do resolve itself into a committee on the Copyright Bill, said, when this bill was read a second time he had understood that the discussion was to be taken at this stage of the measure, he therefore felt called upon to state to their lordships the grounds upon which he supported the bill. He confessed that he was in some respects disappointed; he did not expect that this measure would have met with any opposition in this House. It was true that within the last three years bills for the same object had been introduced in the other House, had been discussed, and met with opposition there, but in the present instance there had been a species of compromise in the other House between the different parties, prior to the introduction of the measure, and certain clauses had been changed, and certain modifications made in the bill, which had been carried through the House with little, or at least no effectual, opposition. Upon this ground he had supposed that the bill would have met with no opposition from their lordships; and he confessed that having laid several petitions upon the table, one from men of the greatest eminence in the literary world, approving of the measure and calling upon their lordships to adopt it; another from the most eminent publishers in the metropolis, directed to the same object, and asking their lordships with the same earnestness to adopt it; and a third, of the same character and tendency, from the printers and stationers, praying their lordships to pass the bill; he thought he was justified, by the uniform concurrence of these petitions, in expecting that the measure would have met with no opposition, and in being greatly disappointed at finding that it was to meet with opposition, and from a quarter where he was most anxious and eager to obtain support—a quarter whence opposition was always formidable, and upon this subject more than on any other. But, having undertaken the conduct of this bill, he relied upon their lordships' sense of justice to prevent this opposition from being effectual. Lord BROUGHAM at great length opposed the measure, which was supported by Lord Lyttelton, the Bishop of London, and Lord Campbell, but objected to by Lord Cottenham.—It was ultimately agreed that the bill should pass through Committee pro formâ, with the understanding that the discussion on the amendments proposed should be taken on the bringing up of the report.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Mr O'CONNELL presented petitions praying for the Repeal of the Legislative Union between England and Ireland, and for some legislative enactment to put an end to bribery at elections.—Mr. T. S. DUNCOMBE presented a petition from certain electors of Sudbury, praying for universal suffrage and vote by ballot, as far as that scheme was concerned.—Mr. PEARCE called the attention of the House to a petition presented to this house, purporting to be signed by 125 electors of the borough of Southampton, of whom, he was credibly informed, several were not electors, and could not be found on the register. He therefore, should, of notice that on Monday next he should move that all such parties should be called to the bar of this house. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.")

IPSWICH AND SOUTHAMPTON ELECTIONS

Mr. WYNN moved "That the Attorney-General be directed to prosecute such persons as shall appear to him to have been guilty of bribery in respect of the last election for the borough of Ipswich." He would afterwards make the same motion with regard to Southampton.—Sir T. FREMANTLE seconded the motion.—The SPEAKER having put the question, Sir T. WILDE thought that little good could result from so limited an attempt against so extensive an evil, more especially when he considered the difficulty which the Attorney-General would find in procuring sufficient evidence to ensure conviction.—Sir W. FOLLETT doubted the expediency of directing a prosecution, when there was no evidence already taken on which the Attorney-General could act.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was of opinion that the house ought not to cast on him that responsibility of selecting objects for prosecution which regularly belonged to itself. He ought not to be forced into a fishing inquiry, and he recommended it to Mr Wynn to withdraw the motion.—Sir R. INGLIS ridiculed these innovations against the existing constitution from the mouths of those who had supported that great monument of wisdom and virtue—the Reform Bill. All you could do for the prevention of bribery was to raise the standard of public opinion; and, at all events, such prosecutions as these would be of no avail.—Mr. WYNN, after the general opinion expressed against his motion, begged leave to withdraw it.—Colonel REPTON BROOKE then moved a new writ for Ipswich.—Mr. HUME proposed a month's adjournment, on the ground that the Election Committee had reported extensive bribery in that borough.—Sir R. PEEL regarded that period too vague to justify so strong a measure.—Lord J RUSSELL inclined to suspend the writ, not only for this but for all the boroughs whose cases were then under examination.—Lord STANLEY saw no sufficiently definite ground for the suspension.—Mr. HAWES argued that this was a stronger case for suspension than the case of Nottingham, for there the suggestion was merely that of an individual member, but here they had the report of a committee; and, indeed, Ipswich had already been convicted. Would the house dare to revoke its order for the suspension of the Nottingham writ? If not, how gross an inconsistency would it be to issue the writ for Ipswich?—Colonel RUSHBROOKE briefly replied, and the house divided on Mr. HUME's proposal of a month's adjournment.

Against that adjournment	154
For it	147
Majority against adjournment..	19

The SPEAKER having put the original motion for the issuing of the writ, Mr. O'CONNELL, by way of further amendment, moved for a committee to inquire into the extent of the bribery committed at Ipswich. Lord SEYMOUR supported this amendment.—Sir ROBERT PEEL considered that the circumstances of this case were not such as to warrant the course which had been pursued in the case of Nottingham.—After a few other observations the house divided, rejecting Mr. O'Connell's amendment, and the new writ was ordered. The other orders having been disposed of, the house then adjourned

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

POOR LAW.

Lord FAVERSHAM presented a petition against the New Poor-law.

CUSTOMS' DUTIES (DRAWBACK) BILL.

On the motion of the Duke of WELLINGTON this bill was read a third time and passed.

Lord COLCHESTER then moved that the report of the commissioners relative to prison discipline, be printed, he thought the statistical information would be very useful, more particularly that part which related to solitary confinement. He did not think that a total separation from one's fellow creatures was a kind of punishment which would ever be attended with beneficial results, and which ought to be allowed in this country. The system of solitary confinement had now had a trial, and he should wish to see the report of the commissioners upon it. The motion was then agreed to.

THE PUNISHMENT OF DEATH BILL.

The bill for assimilating the law of capital punishments in England and Ireland went through committee—The bills on the table were forwarded a stage, and the house adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

Mr B DENISON presented a petition from Dewsbury in favour of a Ten Hours Bill.—Mr. STANSFIELD presented a similar petition.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALES IN MINES.

Lord ASHLEY presented a petition from the rector and inhabitants of Watford, in Hertfordshire, praying the house to pass a law for the exclusion of females from mines and collieries

NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME ELECTION.

Mr. HUME understood that the motion for a new writ for Newcastle-under-Lyme had been proposed, he now gave notice, that, when the writ should be moved for, he should move for the appointment of a select committee to make further inquiries into the bribery stated to have been committed at the last election for that borough.

DISTRESS IN PAISLEY

Mr. HUME wished to ask the right hon. baronet a question. A committee had been appointed in Paisley for the purpose of receiving subscriptions in order to afford relief to the unemployed poor of that town and neighbourhood. By a paper which he held in his hand, it appeared that, by order of the Government, an agent or commissioner had been sent down to that place, who undertook the mode of supporting the unemployed with money or provisions, and that in consequence the local subscriptions had ceased. He wished to know if such was the case?—Sir R. PEEL said, her Majesty's Government had not interfered with the local subscriptions, but they apprehended that the distribution of the local fund was not conducted on the best principle, and they had sent down a person to watch over its distribution, and see that relief was afforded according to the principle on which the poor of this country were relieved. Mr HUME then gave notice to move for an account (as we understood) of any sums sent down to Paisley, for the relief of the poor in that town (Cries of "No, no.")—Sir R. PEEL said that he hoped the house would not accede to such a motion.

The House then resolved into Committee on the Customs' Duties

On the schedule relating to timber, Mr. HAWES and other members objected not to the duty, but to the system of management on which it is proposed to levy them.—Mr. GLADSTONE and Sir R. PEEL defended the system on the authority of practical men.—Mr HUME recommended it to Government to mass the reductions on timber, instead of postponing them to October 1, for, as carpenters and others who had no stock of wood in hand must postpone their purchases of that article until after the reduction, it was plain that in the interval there would be no employment for the workmen. Sir R PEEL was of opinion that justice to those parties precluded him from altering the course which he had announced, and on the faith whereof they had been acting.

The Committee then adjourned, and, the House having resumed,

Mr C. BULLER brought on his motion for referring it to Mr. Roebuck's committee to inquire into a corrupt compromise alleged to have been made by Mr. Warburton respecting the Bridport election. The discussion upon the motion occupied the remainder of the night, and was terminated by a division as follows—

For the motion	51
Against it	166
Majority	115.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned at half-past two o'clock.

THE LEVANT MAIL.

Letters from Constantinople, Alexandria, and Malta, were received in town by express on Thursday morning, and the following are extracts from the most important articles contained in them:—

CONSTANTINOPLE, MAY 3.—A Turkish steamer is daily expected from Beyrout with eight Druse chieftains, recently arrested by order of the Seraskier, at Beteddin, near Deir el Kamr. The cause of their arrest is thus accounted for

In order to insure the tranquillity of the Lebanon, and to prevent a renewal of the sanguinary struggles that have so repeatedly broken out between the Maronites and Druses, and, above all, to check the audacity and unprovoked aggressions of the latter upon the Christians, it has been held advisable by the Porte to disarm both tribes, as far as such disarmament was practicable. But the people, encouraged by their Sheiks, refused to comply, and these Sheiks, especially those arrested, menaced the Turkish authorities with a general revolt of all their clans, should forcible measures be adopted to produce submission.

Upon receiving this information, and that a revolt was about to break out, the Seraskier deemed it necessary to adopt instant measures for enforcing the demands of the Porte. The best mode that suggested itself was, if possible, to obtain possession of the persons of the Druse Sheiks, and to retain them as hostages for the good conduct of their kinsmen and tribes. As this measure could not be effected forcibly without much bloodshed on both sides, it was resolved to have recourse to stratagem. Consequently, the principal Sheiks implicated in the plot were summoned to a council by Omer Pacha, at Beteddin. The demands of the Porte having been renewed, and again rejected by them, they were surrounded on issuing from the Governor's palace, seized and disarmed by the Turkish troops, and then sent to Beyrout, when the proofs of their intended revolt were exhibited to them, and they were then forwarded as prisoners to the Sublime Porte.

Some importance has been attached within the last week to a note upon Syrian affairs, said to have been written in strong terms, and transmitted by Count Nesselrode to the Porte. No direct note has, however, been addressed by the Russian Cabinet to that of the Sultan. It is reported that the misunderstanding between Sir S. Canning and M. Pisani has been arranged, and that the latter has been restored to his functions.

ALEXANDRIA, May 5.—The Pacha arrived here on the morning of the 1st inst., and his return to this seat of government is looked upon, although unconnected with any events of political importance, to be at all events a presage of great commercial activity. It was well understood before his arrival, that he would not long be here, before the Aungeon grain stores were thoroughly cleaned out, and for this the public has not had long to wait; the Pacha had hardly arrived, ere the palace was thronged with merchants. Offers of all kinds were made, and high prices offered for produce not yet in existence—the produce (some of it yet to be sown) of the Pacha's chiftiks, but all were steadily refused, the Pacha announcing it to be his firm intention to sell all his produce that came to hand by public auction sales, on the old system of 1835. After three days thus passed, it was suddenly announced that two merchants had taken the greater part of the grain existing in the government stores, being 105,000 ardebs beans, and 60,000 ardebs wheat, the former at 36, and the latter at 65, being the very prices at which the minister has all along offered to sell, and the merchants have naturally enough refused to buy, being so much above the rates offered by the markets for consumption. So the Pacha's price is the price; and this is a coup d'état by which Boghos Bey has immortalized himself.

MALTA, May 15.—Some serious misunderstandings have taken place between the Pacha of Tripoli (in Barbary) and Col. Warrington, the British consul there, rendering it necessary for the latter to apply for the protection of a ship-of-the-line. On the 28th the Locust was dispatched thither with a supply of coals for the Locust, which has been employed in conveying the Consul along the coast, distributing appeals to the native Arab chiefs, with a view to stop the inhuman traffic in slaves, on which it is said he has been successful, so far as promises can be relied upon, though strongly opposed by the Ottoman, or Sultan's officers at Tripoli. On the 28th the Devastation returned to Malta, with the Consul's application for a ship of war. She was sent back again on the 2nd instant, and returned to Malta on the 4th, with a return of request from the Consul. On the 8th, the Vesuvius was despatched from Tunis and Tripoli, from which ports she returned on the 14th, bringing accounts of fresh insults having been offered indirectly to the British Consul. On the 12th, the Howe (bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Masson), with the Thunderer and Savage in company, took their departure from Malta for Tripoli, and will no doubt speedily bring the Pacha to his bearings.

HAVRE.—By the Vauban, which arrived at Havre on the 22nd inst., from Hayti, we have received accounts from Port-au-Prince, to the 16. The Manifeste, of the 10th, gives the following details of the events which had occurred on the occasion of the opening the session of the Chamber of Representatives:—"For a fortnight the town was occupied by four thousand troops, and cannons charged with grape were pointed against the building where the sitting was to be held. On the 4th the representatives assembled in their usual place of meeting, to the number of thirty-seven, and a stormy discussion arose upon a question of admission of certain expelled members, which was only terminated by the retirement of the President and ten members. On the 6th, the commandant of the town took possession of the keys of the Chamber, and, in the evening, a strong detachment of troops was placed there. On the 7th, the national flag was displayed at the Chamber, and the detachment was greatly reinforced. The members opposed to the President were on this day refused admission, unless they first signed a protest. This they refused to do, and then assembled at the house of the representative Ponthieux, from whence they went in procession to the Chamber. When they had arrived at the large gate, Captain Elie, the officer in command, said to them, very politely, 'Gentlemen, you are forbidden to enter' They replied:—'Do you know who we are? We are the representatives of the nation.' 'It is positively, gentlemen, to the representatives that I have been ordered to refuse admission,' replied the captain. Whereupon the deputies retired with dignity, some voices crying out, 'Vive la Liberté! Vivent les Representans du Peuple!' These exclamations caused a little movement in the detachment, the officers drawing their swords, and, it is said, an order being given to fire, if necessary. This demonstration in no way shook the firmness of the representatives, who again repaired to M. Ponthieux's, where they drew up a protest against this conduct, and addressed a letter to the President, demanding the withdrawal of the armed force which had refused them admittance. During the time they were thus occupied, a small number of persons had collected near the house. A detachment was sent from the Chamber to disperse them, and much violence was employed towards several young men, some of whom were wounded, and several arrested."

On Monday, the 2nd instant, the Sultan, attended by his ordinary staff, inspected the troops drawn out in the Atmeidan, and reviewed the huge Mahmoudieh, and the corvette recently presented by the Dey of Tunis. The Sultan was attended by the Captain Pacha, Yavar Pacha (Admiral Walker), and by the superintendents of the different departments, among whom was Mr. Reeves, from the United States, who is the principal naval architect. The Rais Bey and captains of the fleet were assembled in the Mahmoudieh, to receive the Sultan, who minutely examined every part of the stupendous vessel, and conferred various distinctions upon officers and men. The fleet, consisting of about nine line of battle ships, and as many frigates and corvettes in commission, will quit the harbour for its summer station in the Bosphorus, as soon as the whole are ready. It is understood that Taher Pacha has obtained the contract for the customs' duties of Constantinople. He has obtained this contract for fifty millions of piastres. There can be no doubt that, if properly administered, these customs are susceptible of producing a much larger sum.

It is feared that the peasantry in many parts of Monaghan are organizing themselves into bodies, for the purpose of resisting the collection of poor-rates, and that illegal measures are connecting to throw obstacles in the paths of the collector

A CUTTER.—A tailor of Plymouth announces that, at his shop, a traveling coat, dress coat, waistcoat, two pairs of trousers, a hat, and two shirts, may be obtained—made to measure—for the trifling cost of thirty-two shillings!

DESTRUCTION OF AN INDIAMAN.—FIVE LIVES LOST.

On Saturday intelligence of the loss by fire of the ship Geo[illegible], of Newcastle, an Indiaman, Captain Mitchell, bound to Lo[illegible] was received by the underwriters at Lloyd's, attended with [illegible] plorable sacrifice of human life. This ship was between 800 [illegible] 900 tons burden, and was valued at £7,000. being splendidly [illegible] for the accommodation of passengers. She had a rich cargo [illegible] board, consisting of jewellery, merchandise, and other valuable property, which perished with the vessel; a loss in total of nearly £20,000. The unfortunate event occurred on the morning of the 1st of last month, while on her passage to England from Calcutta, which place she left in the early part of February. From the counts brought over by the ship Thomas Sparks, of China, which arrived off Dartmouth on Friday morning, it appears, that early on the morning mentioned, the "watch" on deck, when the vessel was in latitude 30 south and longitude 36 east, off Madagascar, discovered a strong smell of burning about the ship; he aroused the commander, Captain Mitchell, and the rest of the ship's crew, and a strict search was determined upon. On the boats being removed, and the main hatches taken off, the burning was found to proceed from the cargo, when orders were given to remove a portion of it, so as to get at the fire. The crew, however, had not proceeded far before a volume of smoke burst upon them, and shortly afterwards it became so intense, accompanied with excessive heat, that they were forced to desist. Captain Mitchell then had the hatches replaced, and blocked up every aperture in the ship, in the hope of stifling the fire. But this proved unavailing, for, in about two hours, the flames broke through the cabin windows, and likewise from the hatchway over the forecastle, to the terror and dismay of all on board. Captain Mitchell, perceiving that the destruction of the vessel was inevitable, directed the crew to prepare themselves to leave the ship, which they immediately set about doing by lowering the boats (two in number) over the vessel's side. It was a most trying moment, for the sea was extremely rough, with a heavy gale of wind; and with the knowledge of there being 800 or 900 miles from land, every soul expected to perish with a watery grave. At about eight o'clock the chief mate, with nine of the crew, left the burning vessel in the jolly-boat, and were directly followed by Captain Mitchell, and the rest of the ships crew, four in number, in the small boat. In the course of a quarter of an hour afterwards the work of devastation had reached the masts, and she appeared embodied in one mass of flames, forming a terrible though magnificent appearance. At this critical period a vessel was observed at a distance, bearing towards the ill-fated ship, and the chief mate turned to make known the joyful intelligence to Captain Mitchell, and the rest of the crew, when he was horror-struck on finding that the boat had foundered, and none of them were to be seen. They rowed about in hopes of picking them up, but unfortunately none of the poor fellows ever rose after. The ship Thomas Sparks, which proved to be the vessel they were bearing down to their assistance, came alongside soon afterwards, and took the chief-officer, and the rest of the Georgia's crew on board, and they remained within a short distance of the burning ship until she went down, which event took place at a late hour in the afternoon. The ship and cargo are reported to be insured for £25,000.

EXECUTION OF DANIEL GOOD.

This wretched man suffered the extreme penalty of the law, in front of the gaol of Newgate, at eight o'clock on Monday morning. By four o'clock, the fatal drop, the barriers, and all the necessary apparatus for carrying his sentence into effect were completed, and even before that hour groups of persons had assembled in the Old Bailey. Before six o'clock, above 200 of the City police, under the direction of Major Shaw, the superintendent, in addition to a considerable number of the Metropolitan police, were stationed in front of the gaol, and at this time a more dense mass of human beings had gathered together than has been known since the execution of Fauntleroy. All the houses opposite the prison had been let to sight-seekers at an enormous price, and in several instances the whole of the casements were taken out, and raised seats erected for their accommodation. In one case, a noble (qy.) lord was pointed out as having been a spectator at the last four or five executions; his price for his seat was said to be £15. The house-tops were likewise covered with persons, both male and female; and the number of spectators far exceeded those who were present at the execution of Greenacre or Courvoisier. The usual ribaldry and coarse jokes were indulged in, and drunkenness and debauchery were prominent characteristics of the scene throughout the earlier parts of the morning. As the clock of St. Sepulchre's struck eight, the chapel bell of the prison tolled heavily the funeral knell of the miserable culprit, who rose from the bench on which he had been seated, and the solemn procession moved along the gloomy narrow windings of the gaol to the spot on which the gallows was erected. He walked with a firm step, and ascended the steps of the scaffold without assistance. The prisoner, on being placed under the gallows, was assailed with the most hideous yells and long-continued execrations by the mob. When the hangman was about to draw the cap over his face, the murderer cried out "Stop, Stop," and appeared anxious to address the crowd. Calcraft desired him to attend to the prayers of the Ordinary, and in a few seconds the bolt was withdrawn, and the unhappy criminal was launched into eternity. He seemed to struggle violently for some seconds, and his body, after hanging the usual time, was cut down. Dr. Elliotson afterwards took a cast of the murderer's head in the presence of several medical and scientific gentlemen.

During the execution a young female named Robin, who resides at 12, Curtain-road, and was in the crowd in Giltspur-street, had her pocket cut by a gang of fellows by whom she was surrounded. The offence is supposed to have been committed at the moment of the drop falling, and in the hurry the thieves cut through the whole of her clothes, and inflicted a wound in her side. In the hustling and pressure she did not feel the wound, but when the crowd separated, feeling pain, she mentioned the fact to a friend with whom she was in company, who then observed that her gown was rent and a considerable quantity of blood on her petticoats. She was robbed of all she had. The thieves, as may be supposed, got clear off. [So much for public example.]

THE FRENCH RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—The sad and solemn ceremony of the interment of the remains of the twenty-five victims of the terrible event at Meudon, which had not been removed from the cemetery of Mont Parnasse, was performed on Monday last, at eight in the morning, by the curé of St. Sulpice and his clergy. After the service, which made a deep impression on all present, the bodies, which had been placed in separate coffins, were deposited in one grave. M. Boulay de la Meurthe, a friend of the family of the young Bouchard, one of the victims, who had gained several prizes in the course of his studies, delivered an oration on his untimely fate, and containing pass[illegible]ges applicable to the whole of the sufferers, which produced a painful effect upon all the auditors. The grief of the father of this young man, who was present, became alarmingly intense. The sister of another youth, who was most unquestionably lost in the same catastrophe, but whose re[illegible] could not be positively identified, added to the distressing scene by her lamentations, which she could not restrain. The curé of St. Sulpice also pronounced a short discourse, in which he declared that a mass should be performed on Tuesday, at seven in the morning, in his church, for the repose of the souls of the deceased. The solemnity was attended by a considerable number of persons, including the mayors of the 10th and 11th arrondissements, and the curés of Meudon and Sèvres.

NOTES ON NOSES.

To put aside the extreme case of men without noses, we ask, was there ever an instance known of a man with a small, pitiful, paltry nose, distinguishing himself in arts, literature, or arms? We suppose not. Were Homer, Shakspere, or Milton, or Raffaelle, or Corregio, Marlborough, or Collingwood, men with little noses? Has the "Iron Duke," the hero of a hundred fights, a little nose? If he had, we are certain he never would have gained the battle of Waterloo, or become the Prime Minister of England. There is, in truth, more in a nose than many people seem to imagine.

Extremes, however, are not good. It is possible for a man to have too little, as well as too much, even of a good thing. This holds especially in the matter of noses. A man may have a small diminutive, tom-tit of a nose—in short, a mere apology for a nose; or he may have a remarkably large, powerful, aristocratical-looking nose, which seems to rule "lord of the ascendant" over all the rest of the features. As temperance is better than either drunkenness or total abstinence, so a medium-sized nose is better than either a very small or a very large nasal organ. If, however, we were by some overpowering necessity obliged to have either an exceedingly small or an exceedingly large nose on our face, we should prefer to have one of large dimensions. A man with a large nose, if he does not always rise in the world, very seldom sinks into the lowest current of society; his nose keeps him always floating above. He is generally, at least, decent, and frequently highly respectable in his character and conduct.

None of these things can be predicated of a man with a small nose. it is morally impossible that he can rise in the world; his nose keeps him down. Nobody likes to have anything to do with a man whose nose is contemptibly small; there is something suspicious about such a man. The man, in fact, feels this himself; he cannot look you in the face like one who has a full complement of nose. He is continually reminded of his paucity of nose. He cannot shave himself, he cannot wash himself, he cannot tie on his neckcloth, he cannot see the profile of his face on the wall, without being painfully reminded that his nose is less than the least of all noses. A feeling of insignificance steals over him; he feels that he is a mere cipher in society. He loses hope, becomes regardless of character and appearance, drinks to drown the recollections of his nose, and probably ends his days in obscurity, as a ballad-singer or a knife-grinder.

Noses differ from each other, not only in size but also in shape. Roman noses and aquiline noses are generally esteemed the handsomest; they belong to the large order of noses. There is something dominant and aristocratical in the form and expression of these noses which renders them very imposing. Such noses frequently belong to persons of superior intellect and high moral sentiment, and are often found indicative of great strength of mind and decision of character. Grecian noses are very beautiful and becoming in women, but we cannot say that we admire them in the male face; they give it a soft and silly appearance. We never knew a man with a Grecian nose who was not a confirmed nincompoop.

Cock-noses and snub-noses belong to the small order of noses. This description of noses is much more numerous than any other; perhaps two-thirds of the population have their faces adorned with noses of this fashion. The family of the cock-noses, if not very respectable, are certainly very numerous. You cannot walk on the street, or go to church, or attend a public meeting, without seeing hundreds of men and women with such noses. The cock-nosed men are a busy, bustling race, remarkable for their self-conceit and cool assurance. They are always nestling themselves into snug, little, great, places; over and anon they are becoming candidates for the office of town-conneiller, commissioner of police, or magistrate, or some other place of honour, by which they will gain greetings in the market-place, and become entitled to the uppermost seats at feasts. Cock-nosed men are generally remarkably loquacious, and love to hear the melody of their "most sweet voices." Hence, at dinners they are constantly rising up and proposing toasts; and at public meetings some cock-nosed man is sure to "get on his legs," and raise an uproar by proposing an amendment or adjournment. The sense of the meeting may be clearly opposed to him, and on all sides his ears may be saluted with cries of "down, down," "off, off," spoke, spoke," and other popular marks of disapprobation; but the cock-nosed man is not to be put down—he is determined either to carry his amendment or spoil the meeting.

The men with snub-noses are rather an amiable class of individuals. There is a rich store of humour and drollery about their noses, which causes them to be much sought after as boon companions. They are often cunning shavers—"men of infinite jest and most excellent fancy." Abstractedly considered, a snub-nose is not prepossessing. Looking at the nose itself, we would not form a high opinion of the mental or moral qualities of a man with such a nose; yet it is an undeniable fact, that many men who have been born into the world with snub-noses have frequently risen to great eminence, and in the race of life have oftentimes left behind them men with far better noses. Nay, we know instances in which men with most ridiculous-looking, little snub-noses, have contrived to step over the heads of men with large, imposing, aristocratical looking, Roman noses. There is no accounting for these things; they are beyond the reach of our philosophy to explain.

The last class of noses to which we shall advert are hook-noses. They belong to the large order of the nasal organs, and are rather of rare occurrence. The paucity of such noses, however, is not much to be regretted. The men who have the misfortune to have hook-noses on their faces are frequently "no better than they should be;" they are in general sly, insinuating rogues, who by cunning and much craftiness try to circumvent and cajole the simple ones of the earth. No good can ever be expected to come of a man having a hook-nose—"Let no such man be trusted." If we were a tender-hearted maiden, we would on no account fall in love with, far less wed, a man having a hook-nose. Such a man would in all probability commence beating his wife, even before the expiration of the honey-moon. We cannot explain why there should be so much wickedness in hook-nosed men, but such is the case. We should not like to go through Coventry with a man having a hook-nose.

GENEVA.—We learn that the sittings of the Constituent Assembly become every day more stormy. It is asserted in a letter from that city, that a revolutionary movement is getting up by the anarchists, under the direction of a captain of the ancient Swiss Guard, in the service of Charles X.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The Univers at length publishes the reply of the King of the French to the address presented by the Archbishop of Paris to his Majesty on the occasion of his fête, in the following words:—"I thank you for the good wishes you have just expressed, on the occasion of my fête and the birth of my grandson—good wishes which you express in the name of the clergy of Paris, in whose presence I am always happy to find myself. I am happy, my Lord Archbishop, that you have appreciated my efforts for the welfare of religion. You are conscious that they are conformable to your own. But it is necessary to consider the difficult times in which we live, and we must not begin to construct what we cannot complete. I am aware that religion has need of all legal influence, to support herself against the numerous attacks of those who had the misfortune to abandon her. I shall be happy if, before I die, I may be able to accomplish all the good which I have meditated for religion." The Duchess of Conegliano, widow of Marshal Moncey, died at Besançon, on the 13th inst., in the 82nd year of her age. The Chevalier de Peruzzi (the Tuscan Minister) had a private audience of the King on Tuesday, at which he delivered a letter from his Sovereign, announcing the birth of a Prince, his son. The Hussard brig, which has arrived at Brest, from Hayti, brought 1,200,000f., on account of the debt due to France from the Republic. The Toulonnais announces, that Admiral Hugon's squadron, which had left the Hyères on a cruise, returned to its moorings off the islands on the 13th inst.

FIRE POLICE OF PARIS.—The fire at Hamburg has called the attention of the higher authorities at Paris to the means which this city has at its disposal to prevent a similar disaster. It is acknowledged that the quantity of fire-engines, buckets, and other materials, is insufficient to arrest the progress of fires breaking out simultaneously in several points of the capital and suburbs. The number of firemen, although increased within the last year, is still disproportioned to the development of the population of Paris, and to the number and importance of the monuments and manufactories of all sorts which it contains. Another necessity has also been felt, that of having large reservoirs of water established in all the public edifices, or in the neighbourhood of the barracks and guard-houses. At present the mass of water furnished by the different fountains is nearer the quays than the distant quarters, and it is precisely the contrary of what ought to take place. It is said that this matter will soon be brought before the Municipal Council. —Galignani's Messenger.

SPAIN.—SEBASTIAN, May 18.—Apparently the utmost tranquillity pervades these provinces, yet the Government does not abate its vigilance or precautions; for the Regent knows that at this moment a grave conspiracy, whose branches ramify from the Puerta del Sol into every part of Spain, is hatching against his power and life. Partidas volantes (flying parties) have been organised; one of them, in this province, is commanded by the soi-disant Chapelgorri Elorio, who, some time ago, obtained some notoriety by killing the unfortunate Munagorri: this Elorio is a sort of Martin Zurbano or Mina, on a small scale. Twenty very beautiful brass 36-pounders were landed here the day before yesterday, for a battery at Pampelon. A quantity of badly-manufactured gunpowder, with some Tower rifles and muskets (no doubt relics of the unfortunate Legion), have been discovered in the hills to the north of Tolosa, where the Viceroy Rodil still remains: he has, I am told on good authority, remonstrated against any decrease of the army of the north.

In consequence of the threatening aspect of affairs at Barcelona, the squadron employed on this coast have received orders to sail for that place; the war-steamer Isabella Segunda has already gone: unfortunately, these vessels are as much wanted here, as off the capital of Catalonia; for the French cruisers, who hitherto have been closely watched by the Spaniards, will now have a clear field for all their intrigues from Bilbon to Parajes.

Bayonne is almost ruined by the Pyrenean line of custom-houses, and two of its principal commercial houses, Salcaut and Leon, have removed to San Sebastian; this speaks volumes.

It was rumoured in the financial circles at Madrid, that the Government contemplated issuing a new loan, bearing interest at 3 per cent., to the amount of 1,500,000,000 reals. Government proposed receiving in payment of it 100,000,000 reals of existing securities (5 per cents.), and 100,000,000 in specie, and provides out of the proceeds for the payment of the dividends down to the month of June, 1843. The Government would, moreover, deposit in the Bank of San Fernando 160,000,000 reals, guaranteed by the revenues derived from tobacco and quicksilver, and bills on the Government of Cuba and Porto Rico, in order to secure the payment of the subsequent dividends to the 30th of June, 1845, inclusive.

Doubts of the success of the plan were entertained in the quarters best informed. Ministers were unceasing in their deliberations on the best means of improving the financial condition and credit of the country, but the difficulties to be surmounted were formidable.

TURKEY.—Mehmed Vassif Pacha has been appointed Governor of the Dardanelles. His predecessor, Hagi Saib Pacha, is en disponibilité, and some people think he will soon be made Minister of Finance. Much talk of the changes in the Ministry, but nothing yet decided on the point.

The famous Husreff Pacha has got a pension of 30,000 piastres per month, with liberty to move about freely, instead of being cooped up in his country-house. The ex-Grand Vizier Rauff Pacha has also a similar pension, and some people judge from this that the present Vizier, Izett Mehmed Pacha, will, at no distant period, require such an allowance, by being placed on the retired list. His zeal for religion and firmness have made him many enemies among the Franks, but he has been an admirable minister to the Turks.

HOLLAND AND NAPLES.—The Augsburg Gazette states, on the authority of a letter from Paris, that the French Government has undertaken the mediation of the pecuniary questions which have arisen between Holland and Naples, and that a squadron is to be sent from Toulon into the Mediterranean to watch any movements that may be made in that sea by Dutch ships of war. The Leipsic Gazette of the 18th instant mentions a report of the Pope having offered his mediation in this dispute.

SICILY.—PALERMO, April 28.—It would appear that the differences between our Government and Holland are not yet smoothed down; yet there is reason to hope that all will soon be amicably adjusted. Our Government has appointed, as Commissioners in the negotiation relative to the commercial treaty with England, the Minister of State, Prince Committini, of the Sicilian family Gravini, the Commanders Fortunato and Spinelli; whilst on the part of England, the Ambassadors in ordinary at the Neapolitan Court, Sir —— Temple and Sir —— Parish, are commissioned to act.

ALGIERS.—Accounts have been received, to the 14th instant inclusively, but they add nothing to the information already communicated, of the movements of the French army. The Moniteur Algérein of the 14th merely gives a summary of the despatches relative to the affair between the troops of Abd-el-Kader, and the division under General Bedeau on the 29th ult. General Bugeaud was still at Mostaganem on the 13th ins ant, but he was preparing to set out for the Chelif.

PRUSSIA.—The Frankfort Gazette of the 17th instant publishes the following refusal given to the Consistory of the Israelites, who presented a petition to the King of Prussia, praying that their body might not receive an organisation, as a private corporation, nor be subjected to special obligations, as a compensation for being relieved from military service. The following is the text of his Majesty's reply to the petition:—"According to the petition addressed to the King on the 4th of March, his Majesty has perceived that the plan of a law relating to the Israelites has caused them serious alarm. His Majesty has, in consequence, commissioned me to declare to you, that his intention is to adopt measures which will relieve Israelites from the restrictions imposed on them, and will secure their relations with Christian communities, by giving to their private interests more independence and authority, through the formation of Corporations. Means will be thus afforded them to give their faculties a greater development, both in their own interest and that of the Christian population; but the King thinks it necessary to attach all those advantages to conditions based on the essence of a Christian State, according to which it is not permitted to grant the Israelites any power over the Christians, or any privileges which would be calculated to cause a prejudice to the Christian communities. The preservation of the rights enjoyed by the Christians must consequently counterbalance the suppression of these restrictions. These two objects can only exist united, and cannot be separated. In dispensing the Israelites from the obligation of military service, they will not be deprived of any advantages, as they may always enter the service voluntarily. At all events, the Israelites may calmly wait the result of the deliberations commanded on the subject, and they may depend that no amelioration will be refused them compatible with the more general and more elevated interests of society.—DE ROCHOW."

THE FIRE AT HAMBURG.—A correspondent of the Morning Chronicle writes thus:—"SIR,—We think it may be of interest for you to have the following particulars of the Fire. It appears now that the following is the rectified statement:—Burnt down, 61 streets, 120 courts, 1992 houses, and 1716 dwelling-floors (Etages Sahle). 498 cottages, 468 dwelling-cellars, 21,526 inhabitants roofless, 3 churches, 2 synagogues, 3 watermills, with 36 wælves; the spinnhaus and zuchthaus (houses of correction), with their churches; the detentions house; the Senate house; the old Exchange, N.B. The new Exchange, only built last year, is saved, and, after a few days' repairing, in use again. The cimbeck house, containing court of commerce, court of common pleas, with offices; the custom-house offices, the stamp-offices, the lottery saloon, the citizen-guard offices, and other public offices; the bank; a great many, and all of the largest, hotels, and all the libraries. 3,786,300 square feet is the superficial extent of the burnt portion of the city. —Respectfully, sir, your most obedient servants, ABRAHAM BAUER and Co.—Hamburg, May 18, 1842."

Another writer of the same date says:—

"I must continue to invite subscriptions from England. The poorer classes are well attended to, and the greatest interest throughout all Germany is evinced, more and more, by the intelligence each courier brings of sympathy, and, what is better, of subscriptions mooted and raised. So plentiful a stock of provisions has been sent here on all sides—cheese, bacon, hams, &c.—that the great hemp store-house on the Elbe is overburdened with it; and, as these, if kept, must become uneatable, to-morrow a public sale takes place of the greater part, the proceeds to be carried to the fund.

"The subscription of her Majesty, announced here to-day, is unfortunate; it has not equalled expectation, notwithstanding the distresses of her own people; but of this I may be able to say more in my next. I say the Queen of England's subscription is an unfortunate one, not simply in its amount of £200, but as reaching this the same day as that of the Emperor of Russia, to which it is no fair contrast: the autocrat has sent 50,000 silver roubles, which, if I mistake not, is somewhere about £9000."

The Austrian Observer of the 16th instant contains an order from the Emperor of Austria, for the opening of subscriptions in all the provinces of the Empire, in favour of Hamburg.

A letter from Hamburg, in a Frankfort paper, states that M. Solomon Heine, the banker, in addition to his munificent donation of 150,000 francs to the fund for the relief of the persons who had been reduced to poverty by the late fire, ordered a thousand rations of soup to be distributed daily, at his expense.

Three mercantile firms have been unable to meet their engagements, but only one of them is of much importance—that of G. H. Hallmann, in the corn trade; the other is the house of L. Lazarus; and the third, Rieser and Liebschutz.

Discount is as high as from 4 to 6 per cent., and second-rate houses have difficulty in obtaining accommodation, even at those rates.

Out of twenty-two insurance companies, nineteen are exclusively for marine and river risks. The three who take fire risks are the Patriotic, the fifth Insurance Company, and the second Sea Insurance Company. The first of these has already exhibited a state of its affairs, showing that they will be able to meet all demands, and similar results are looked for in regard to the other two.

This ill-fated, but far-famed city was, according to Malte-Brun, founded by Charlemagne, and has often been subject to dreadful calamities, arising from inundations, fire, and the destructive effects of war.

In 1510, it was declared to be an imperial city, and, after London and Amsterdam, the most commercial one in Europe; in the same year the river Elbe overflowed it, and the damage sustained amounted to 5,000,000 marks.

In 1771, although a dyke had been built along the river, the water broke through the barrier, and covered the whole neighbourhood, and the greater portion of the city. The destruction of merchandise, and other description of property, amounted to near 8,000,000 marks.

In 1790, the Elbe rose, in one night, upwards of twenty feet. This sudden inundation caused the loss of numbers of lives; and the damage to property was incalculable.

In 1810, this unfortunate city was doomed, from its peculiar local situation, to suffer from the scourge of war, which then pervaded the Continent, and was made the capital of a department—"the Mouths of the Elbe." With a population of 128,000, it was suddenly changed into a fortified town. The military works occasioned a loss of property to the amount of £3,000,000 sterling; and, in addition to the wants of the various armies by which it was often surrounded, caused demands to be made on the bank of the industrious citizens, to the amount of 10,000,000 marks.

ATTEMPT AT ARSON.—Yesterday forenoon the inhabitants of Kingstreet were alarmed by smoke issuing in great quantities from the house of Mr. A. E. Smart, architect and surveyor, who lives in that street; and on their going to see what was the cause, it was found that Mr. Smart, who has for some time past exhibited symptoms of aberration of intellect, had gathered together carpets and other things in a heap in the middle of the floor of his front sitting-room, and set fire to them. The borough firemen soon extinguished the flames, and put a stop to any cause for alarm, and while they were engaged in clearing away the rubbish, the unhappy man kept walking backwards and forwards, looking at them and spitting on the floor, and then asking them how long they would be before they were out of his way, for he did not want them there. A policeman was sent for, and, in company with Mr. Stretton, overseer of St. Mary's, Mr. Smart then walked up to the station-house, where he was seen by the Mayor and one or two of the borough magistrates. After questioning him about the affair with Mr. Scandrett, Mr. Mayor ordered an order for his admission into the County Lunatic Asylum.—Leeds Chronicle.

THE OVERLAND ROUTE FROM INDIA.

In our last we left the homeward-bound travellers at the Grand Hotel upon the Desert of Suez, from whence we are now to trace their progress to Marseilles, which port they will, in all probability, have reached simultaneously with the publication of this article.

Continuing the route across the Desert, as indicated by the stations established by Mr. Waghorn, we arrive at the close of the second day from Suez, at Cairo, the modern capital of Egypt. At this celebrated city, and in its immed ate vicinity, there is so much to arrest attention, that the traveller will, in all probability, feel disposed to delay his further progress homewards while he visits the Pyramids of Gizeh, about ten miles to the south-west; the Citadel —situated to the east of the town, and remarkable as having been the scene of the slaughter of the Mamelukes—completely commands the city, but is itself covered by a high range of mountains in the rear, where a square fort, erected by the Pacha, is garrisoned by 400 men; the Obelisk at Matarea (the site of the ancient Heliopolis); the Tombs of the Mamelukes; the forests of agate in the rocky hollows of the Desert; and the summer Palace of the Pacha. Within the walls of the Citadel, the chief objects of interest are the new Palace of the Pacha, the Mint, Joseph's Well, and the magnificent view from the ramparts, extending over the whole city, the land of Goshen, the Pyramids, &c., and bounded only by the eternal Desert. Hill's Family Hotel, at Cairo, will afford the traveller every possible comfort during his sojourn, and nothing requisite to his enjoyment or further convenience on the route, will be asked for there in vain. Houses, furnished or unfurnished, may also be had by those who prefer such accommodation; and, for the satisfaction of invalids, there are English medical men in regular practice to be met with.

At Boulak (1), the Harbour of Cairo (from which it is distant about two miles), the travellers embark upon the Nile for Atfeh, at which place this magnificent river is connected with Alexandria by the canal of Mahmudie. The time occupied in reaching Atfeh, generally occupies about four days. On the traveller's arrival at Atfeh (2), a change of boats takes place under the superintendence of persons appointed by Mr. Waghorn, to attend to the concerns of those journeying by his route; and the necessary transfer being accomplished, we now embark upon the canal of Mahmudie, which runs 60 miles in length, 90 in breadth, and 18 feet in depth, through a perfectly level country, not requiring a single lock in the whole distance. It is stated that 150,000 men were simultaneously employed in excavating it, and that it was finished in the space of twelve months from the commencement. The voyage from Atfeh to Alexandria is generally accomplished in twelve hours, and one of the first-class boats, with two cabins capable of containing six or seven persons, can be hired for about ten dollars for the purpose.

The modern town of Alexandria is surrounded with high stone walls, strengthened by a deep fosse, and is entered by four gates. Its appearance from the harbour is decidedly European. On arriving at Alexandria (3), the boat is met by persons appointed by the establishment, and the travellers are at once safely conducted to the hotel. While the necessary delay occurs for the transfer of their luggage to the steamer which is to convey them to Syra, they cannot be more agreeably employed than in visiting the many objects of historic interest in its immediate vicinity—Cleopatra's Needle, Pompey's Pillar, the Catacombs, Baths, &c., will each afford matter for amusement and information.

The traveller is now once more afloat; but it is upon the blue waves of the Mediterranean that he is borne onward to his desired port, and in due course arrives at the island of Syra, belonging to the King of Greece. Here again the baggage must be shifted ere further progress is accomplished. The necessary delay for this purpose, enables the traveller to rest and recruit himself after his fatigue, and also to see all that is worth notice on the island, which, by the way, is little better than a barren rock, without a tree or road upon it to diversify its monotonous appearance. From hence a regular steam-boat will transport him through the Straits of Messina to the island of Malta (4), which trajet is generally accomplished in from seventy to eighty hours.

Valetta, the capital of the island, is a handsome and well-built town, situated upon a promontory; its appearance from the sea is highly picturesque. From Malta, passengers are forwarded in twenty-four hours, by a Neapolitan boat, to Naples, where, after a short delay, boats belonging to the French Government convey them on their route homewards, touching at Civita Vecchia and Leghorn on their way to Marseilles (5). From this city, the traveller can take the malle poste for Paris, which it reaches in sixty-six hours; or he may halve the fatigue of a contiguous journey, by adopting the same mode of transit to Lyons, which he will reach in thirty-six hours. From either of these places the remainder of the journey home is conducted by the agent of Mr. Waghorn, whose care and protection only cease with the safe arrival of the traveller in London. The whole period calculated for the journey from India to London by this route, is at present limited to one month.

THE FASHIONS.

Rue de la Chaussé d'Antin, Paris, May 23rd.

Dear Mr. Editor,—Some of the prettiest and most becoming novelties that have attracted our notice here, are the charming and tasteful scarves that have just been made the mode. They are called echarpes à la Montespan, and are of a material of organdie, lined with rose-coloured silk, trimmed like a cock's comb. The bonnets most worn with these are of a pale gimp, of transparent texture, so as to allow the rose-silk underlining to be seen through it, which produces a graceful effect, and is quite appropriate to the spider season of the year. A ruche of rose-coloured tulle forms the simple trimming of the interior. Feathers continue the rage, and the external trimmings are now worn over the crown of the bonnet, instead of, as formerly, at the side.

With regard to a recently-invented dress, it will be seen that an attempt has been made to introduce the ancient Pompadour style of wearing the front open, with an under skirt of a contrasting colour beneath it. This fashion is not yet in high vogue, and I hardly think it will ever be adopted in the London world of ton. A style of sleeve more ornamented than those we now wear, has been introduced since my last; but there are no other revolutions in our costumes, and even fashion is in a comparative state of repose. Au revoir, Felicie.

The Transit through Egypt.—The Desert of Suez bids fair to become, in a very short time, almost as much a frequented thoroughfare as the Great North-road. Arrangements on an extensive scale are in the course of progress, by the Egyptian Oriental Transit Company, for facilitating the intercourse with India, &c., through Egypt, both for passengers and goods; and the Pacha had offered his aid to the undertaking by the appropriation of 100,000 dollars (£20,000) from his treasury, to be laid out in improving the road, in building a large hotel at Suez, in transit depôts, &c., which were to be rented of him by the company. Meantime, competitors against Hill and Co. have started, for the conveyance of passengers between Cairo and Suez, who have provided a considerable number of carriages, horses, &c., and have issued circulars, offering to convey passengers across the Desert on much more moderate terms than what have hitherto been demanded by Hill and Co. Opposition hotels and station-houses in the Desert were even talked of.

A letter from Alexandria, 26th ult., in the Leipsic Gazette, states that the chief of an Abyssinian tribe, at war with Egypt, having been taken prisoner in a conflict with some Egyptian troops, Mehemet Ali has ordered that he shall be retained as a hostage until M. Blondel, the Belgian Consul, who, while travelling in Abyssinia, was made a prisoner by this tribe, on the pretext of his being a spy, shall have been released.

FRIDAY, 3.—Indigent Blind Visiting Society, St. Philip's Church, Pentonville.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"I did expect," Derby.—A Correspondent is disappointed that we did not occupy a couple of pages "with the heads of speeches in the Lords and Commons Houses of Parliament last week, to make it interesting to men." We fear, had we done so, our reputation for truth would have been sadly endangered, as there happened last week to be no debate in either House until Friday night, and of that we gave the heads in our edition of Saturday, p. 18.

"W. W."—The department is already filled.

"Plinn."—It depends upon circumstances. If the subjects treated of are of current interest, remuneration would of course follow acceptance.

"Magnus."—We believe he is right in the supposition, if the transmission be confined to the metropolitan district only, but there is no doubt the Post-Office regulation is frequently evaded

"Ipsi." is clever and amusing, but we do not like his subject.

"Anna."—We shall be proud to avail ourselves of her favours.

"T. N." Exton Park.—We will make inquiry, and give the information wished for in our next.

'Fidus." Dublin.—We cannot agree with our Correspondent. We have no ambition to obtain a circulation upon the merit of our accuracy in reporting disputatious police cases, or revolting details of crime. There are already in the field sufficient to pander to the tastes that gloat over such matters; and if we are to be martyrs, which, by-the-by, we are but little apprehensive of, we would rather be so in the cause of decency, and from our determination that a blush shall never tinge the brow of innocence from the reflection of our pages, than we would achieve a triumph at the expense of decency. All the legitimate features of a newspaper we shall studiously endeavour to improve upon; but we will not disgrace ourselves, or offend the good taste of our readers by copying the blemishes

"A Lover of Arts and Sciences."—We are obliged, and will occasionally act upon a suggestion.

"Mohion," Woolwich.—We confess we have not sufficient tact to discover any poetical merit in the "Sonnet on Rubay through the Fens," except that the orthodox number as regards the lines has been rigidly adhered to—

"Some paper take, and neatly trace upon it
Just fourteen lines, and lo! we have a sonnet!"

However, have it or not, we cannot use the one before us

"R. J. W.," Dublin, and "J. W.," Southsea, shall receive private communications in the course of a post or two.

"A Glasgow Cit" is entitled to our thanks; but his views, to be carried into practice, would require an encyclopædia, instead of a newspaper, monthly; nevertheless, his hints shall have due attention.

Communications not answered this week will be attended to in our next.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1842.

It cannot have escaped the most careless reader of public intelligence that, at this moment, a most afflicting amount of human misery pervades the manufacturing districts of the empire, arising out of a condition of lamentable destitution for which our Poor Laws present no sufficient remedy, and against which no human providence has—in the present dreadful pressure upon the trading interests—been able to find a defence. The scope of this misery—the far spread wretchedness in which its victims are involved—has hitherto been only feebly indicated to the public; and as it seems quite to have surpassed description, we can the more easily account for, than excuse, the evasion of a sickening picture, by those who felt they could never reflect in it the too stern and bitter realities of an endurance almost beyond belief. But at last the griefs and sufferings of the pauper thousands, who have been hugged in the haggard arms of famine, and emaciated almost into the bloodless pallor and frightful semblance of death, have come within the ken of charity—the voice of benevolence grows eloquent—the spirit of humanity is awake—and the whole nation is appealed to, through the pulpit, from the throne, to find the means of life for the living, under an obligation as religious and as sacred as that which imposes upon communities the burial of their dead.

Now, the constitution of our social system in England is such, that in no part of the British dominions could such an appeal be made to the people at large—assuming, as it does, the form of official injunction—prompted by the Sovereign, enjoined by the clergy, and in its nature almost intrenching upon that spirit of independence and self-exertion which is a characteristic virtue of the country—if it were not proved that the destitution is full, complete, and terrible in its devastating wretchedness—that it has bared the walls and rifled the tenements of thousands—that it has left hunger without food, hearths without fire, and sickness without a bed. In this crisis, the brotherhood of our common nature comes forth to prove that under the law of our redemption all mankind are kin—and the wants for which legislation has been unequal to provide—the love of our kind and the sympathies of our being are enlisted to alleviate and dispel.

We confess, therefore, that we are of those who strenuously advocate and entirely approve the measure which has been taken, of working out the purity and beauty of individual and collective charity—by touching upon the affectionate loyalty of her subjects, with the magic of their Sovereign's name—and by adding to that benign and gentle influence all the strength and vigour which religion gives to every virtuous impulse, when its object is noble and its advocacy sincere. It is, then, with the utmost pleasure that we refer our readers to the letter of her Majesty to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and to the consequent enjoinments that have been issued by the Bishop of London to the clergy of his diocese; and we presume by other bishops to the clergy of every other see—"to collect subscriptions for the relief of the working classes" of our fellow-countrymen both in England and beyond the Tweed.

There is, however, one striking circumstance in the publication of the Royal epistle which affords a suggestion that we cannot in our anxiety and commiseration for the starving sufferers, allow to escape. We allude to the fact of that epistle bearing the signature of Sir James Graham in his capacity of Secretary of State. There is, perhaps, no real mockery in this—it may be a matter of mere official form—but the thought that leaps up to the heart and flashes across the brain with a glance at that signature, is one which is tinged with the bitterness of a recollection that the same minister who now invokes benevolence, and kneels at the Altar of Charity, is the very man who, with an iron and unbending stubbornness of purpose, and in the callous spirit of an indefensible political economy, is re-enacting all the cruelties and oppressions of the New Poor-law, and pouring the gall and anguish of its dictatorial tyranny upon those very misfortunes which he now solicits private humanity to relieve. How can we evade the question, "Is there no public humanity, too?" Would not Poor-laws, based upon mild and christian principles have averted or alleviated more than half of the destitution which now crushes our poor like an avalanche, and makes us shudder at the calamities they have been brought to endure? Would discreetly-administered out-door relief have done no good, either by staying the wreck of household comforts, or giving to industry the impetus of kindly encouragement, rather than making it hopeless with the depression of despair. Why, read but a few items of the statement to which the Royal letter alludes.

Mr. Waddington, the secretary of the relief fund in Stockport, states in the official report upon the distress in that town, that the great majority of the distressed families have no visible means of support; that for some weeks they had subsisted by credit; that when that had failed their next resource was to sell their furniture, their wearing apparel, their bed and bedding; and in many instances women had been compelled even to part with their marriage rings; and that their dwellings were found literally stripped of every article of comfort. He subsequently proceeds to state, in reference to the district of which he acted as visitor—"The greater proportion of the inhabitants of that district are in as lamentable a state of destitution as it is possible to imagine; I am convinced that the relief fund (that fund which the community is now called upon to swell) has been the cause of saving hundreds in the borough from a premature grave."

Severe distress likewise prevails extensively at Burnley, in Lancashire.

In this district less efficient assistance appears to have been afforded to the settled poor from the poor-rates, and moreover many destitute persons who had migrated thither from other parts of the country, have been deterred from applying for parochial relief by the fear of removal, in consequence of thus becoming chargeable.

Since the month of July in last year, the labouring population of Paisley has been suffering from distress. This distress continued with great severity throughout the winter; and as many as 12,000 persons have been maintained for several months from the contributions collected in England and Scotland, and even in India.

The Poor-Law of Scotland, as now administered, confers no effectual right to relief upon men who are able to work, or upon their families; at present, therefore, the legal provision for the relief of the destitute in Scotland is not applicable to this class of persons, and even if it had been so applicable, the pressure of so large a number of men without work must soon have absorbed a considerable proportion of the property in the borough.

The subscriptions raised in this country, in the county of Renfrew, the city of Edinburgh, and other parts of Scotland, are all expended.

Thus no legal mode of effectually relieving this mass of destitution exists, and the charitable feelings of those connected with the place have been taxed to the utmost.

It may be added that these sufferings have for the most part fallen on a class of workmen whose general earnings, even in prosperous times, are insufficient to allow of any provision for future difficulties, and that they have been borne with patience and fortitude.—May, 1842.

There is in all this a lamentable forced confession of the total inefficiency of the New Poor-law, even as an alleviating enactment, and it is with blended horror and indignation that, in the face of the miseries that have come upon our poor, we contemplate its continuance in all the fulness of its worst oppression, and the wicked influences of its dehumanising power.

But while taking this opportunity to urge all classes of the people to press the amendment of our system of public and national charity, and to resist the cruelty of Sir James Graham's bill, we recur to our advocacy of the measure which puts private benevolence to the test to meet the dreadful emergencies the Commissioners of the relief fund have described; and we implore the generous contributions of all ranks of our fellow-countrymen to pour out upon the arid wastes of poverty, that fertilising generosity which sheds lustre wherever it is exercised, and gains a Register in Heaven for the good it works on Earth.

That the force of example, too, may not be wanting to forward the good cause, we rejoice in being able to conclude our article with the following list of subscriptions given in the outset of the noble project in hand:—Her Majesty the Queen, £500; the Queen Dowager, £300; Sir Robert Peel, Bart., £200; Sir James Graham, £100; the Duke of Buccleuch, £200; Sir Edward Knatchbull, £100; the Earl of Aberdeen, £100; Lord Stanley, £100; the Right Hon. Henry Goulburn, £50; Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci, £100; Earl of Haddington, £100; Lord Lyndhurst, £100; Sir Henry Hardinge, £50; Earl Howe, £100; Lord John Russell, £50; Sir T. D. Acland, Bart., M.P., £50; Rear-Admiral Bowles, C.B., £20; Alderman Lucas, £26 5s.; Benjamin B. Cabbell, Esq., £50.

What we commonly call a falling star is believed by the Arabs to be a dart launched by the Almighty at an evil genius; and, on beholding one, they exclaim, "May god transfix the enemy of the faith."

"Benefit of the clergy" was a privilege formerly allowed, by virtue of which a man convicted of felony or manslaughter was put to read in a Latin book, of a Gothic black character; and if the ordinary of Newgate said "Legit ut Clericus,"—that is, he reads like a clerk, he was only burnt in the hand and set free, otherwise he suffered the punishment of death for his crime.

A correspondent of the Somerset County Gazette, an "aspirant for a place," breathes out his wishes in the following stanzas:—

If kisses be the coin of love,
The dis sweet woman's rosy mouth,
Found still on earth, where'er we rove,
Or east, or west, or north, or south—
Let statesmen on to glory plod,
And climb ambition's paths of flint:
I only wish the little god
Would make me master of his mint.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY.

CLAREMONT, MAY 24.

At an early hour this morning the bells of the parish church were rung a "merry peal," in honour of the anniversary of the birth of our beloved Sovereign. The ringing was continued at intervals throughout the day.

At seven o'clock in the morning the band of the Coldstream Guards attended on the lawn, stationing themselves beneath the window of the Queen's bedchamber, where her Majesty was serenaded for nearly an hour.

The selections performed were as follows:—

1. Morning Hymn ("God of Israel"), from the oratorio of Joseph (Mehul).
2. German air, composed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert.
3. Chorus, from the opera of Precioca (Weber).
4. Joyous air, introducing a peal of bells.
5. The National Anthem.

In consequence of the unfavourable and unsettled state of the weather, her Majesty did not take her usual carriage airing during the day.

Covers were laid in the library this evening for 34.

The plate used at the Royal banquet, this evening, was the Lion service; the table was decorated with the Warwick vases, which, with several others of a most splendid description, were filled and ornamented with choice plants and flowers, selected from the con-servatories and hot-houses attached to the gardens at Claremont.

At half-past three o'clock on Saturday afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert left town in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of Hussars, for Claremont; Colonel Arbuthnot, Equerry in Waiting on the Queen, and Colonel Wylde, Equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert, followed in a chariot and four. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal and their attendants occupied the next carriage; and Lady Portman, Lady in Waiting, and the Marquis of Ormonde, Lord in Waiting, were in another carriage and four.

The Queen and Prince Albert arrived in town ten minutes before five o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, in an open carriage and four, escorted by a party of Hussars from Claremont. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal and their attendants were in the next carriage; and Lady Portman, Lady in Waiting; the Hon. Miss Paget, Maid of Honour in Waiting; the Marquis of Ormonde, Lord in Waiting; and Colonel Wylde, Equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert, followed in an open carriage and four.

The Queen Dowager, accompanied by the Duke Bernard and the Duchess of Saxe Weimar, and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, honoured the Italian Opera House with her presence on Saturday evening.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Colonel Sir George Cowper, Bart, (Comptroller of her Royal Highness's Household), and Lady Anna Maria Dawson (Lady in Waiting), visited Frogmore Lodge on Saturday last. Her Royal Highness inspected the various improvements and alterations completed and in progress in the offices and other buildings connected with the mansion, and went over the principal apartments.

A very fine trout caught in the Weir, at Windsor, and weighing upwards of twelve pounds, was forwarded as a present to the Queen yesterday forenoon, at Claremont, by Mr. R. Tebbott.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert inspected last week, at Buckingham Palace, two splendid pictures, by Leonardo da Vinci Correggio, submitted by Mr. John Gibson, and was pleased to express himself highly gratified.

His Excellency Count Mensdorf, general in the Austrian service, uncle of her Majesty, and of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, brother-in-law to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, together with his four sons, Count Hugh, lieutenant-colonel in the Austrian service; Count Alphonso, Major in the same service; and Counts Alexander and Arthur, captains, arrived at Buckingham Palace in two of the Royal carriages and four, shortly before twelve o'clock on Monday from Woolwich, attended by Captain Francis Seymour, of the Scots Fusilier Guards.

DUBLIN, May 23.—His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and the Countess De Grey arrived at the Castle this morning. Mr. Moore, Queen's Counsel, met with a very serious accident this day. When entering one of the courts, some person incautiously slammed the door against the learned gentleman, by which he was knocked down. He was subsequently conveyed home in a car, in a state of insensibility.

On Tuesday night the Duchess of Sutherland gave a grand bal costumé at Stafford House, when that noble mansion was graced by the presence of nearly 1000 members of the first families of distinction, in addition to many Royal and illustrious guests.

The Rev. Charles Atmore Ogilvy, recently appointed by the present Government to the professorship of pastoral theology in the University of Oxford, is the son of a Wesleyan minister.

GRAND BALL AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE DISTRESSED SPITALFIELDS WEAVERS.—This magnificent affair, in which charity and amusement were blended, came off on Thursday night with great éclat. The house was elegantly fitted up and decorated for the occasion, with a splendid pavilion erected in the centre of the house for the accommodation of her Majesty, who arrived in state shortly after ten o'clock, and was received with a burst of enthusiasm. The assembly was numerous, and the dresses most superb, although very few fancy costumes were worn. Owing to the crowded state of the house, it was only very late in the evening that dancing was practicable at all, except within the privileged circle; but when the ball did commence, it was kept up to a late hour. Her Majesty and the Royal Family left about twelve o'clock. The distinguished company did not separate until an early hour of Friday morning. It is understood the object contemplated in getting up the ball was not only to give relief to the temporary necessities of the weavers, but to contribute towards a fund for the erection of a school in which their children may be instructed in the art of design. We hope, for the sake of the Spitalfields weavers, that both the purposes may be accomplished through the festivities of Thursday night.

The Queen Dowager has signified her intention to be present at the great choral meeting of the classes instructed in singing upon Mr. Hullah's method, at Exeter Hall, on Saturday, the 4th of June.

POPULAR GOVERNMENT.—When one advised Lycurgus, the famous lawgiver, to establish a popular government at Lacedæmon, "Go," said he, "and first make trial of it in thine own family."

THE JACOBIN CLUB.—This celebrated body, so instrumental to much of the early scenes of the first period of the French Revolution, originated from a small and secret association of about forty gentlemen and men of letters, who had met to disseminate political and other opinions; the members were called Jacobins, from their meeting in the hall of the Jacobin friars at Paris. The club became numerous and popular, and fraternal societies were instituted in all the principal towns of the kingdom. From its institution, one principle was to discuss such political questions as seemed likely to be agitated in the National Assembly, in order that the members might act in concert. They were suppressed October 18, 1794.—Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, &c.

A meeting was held at the Castle Inn, Coventry, on Thursday last, when it was resolved that the procession of Lady Godiva at the ensuing fair shall take place on Monday, the 30th inst.

THE ROCK HARMONICON.

It is pleasing to contemplate the results of intellectual effort, when made amidst all the advantages that can be commanded: but it is especially so to mark its patient and persevering struggles to accomplish some favourite object, when it can only do so alone and unsustained.

An instance of this kind is found in the invention before us—Joseph Richardson, a plain unassuming man, with no refinements of education, but possessed of musical talent, while working as a mason in Cumberland, discovered that various and melodious sounds were extracted from the rocks among which he was accustomed to pursue his daily labours. It then occurred to him that fragments might be collected, and so judiciously arranged, as to form a musical instrument of surpassing sweetness and power. In the year 1827, being employed in building a house at Thornthwaite, and afterwards another at Braithwaite, in the vicinity of Keswick, he began to collect stones for its construction. Those which he thus obtained, however, did not answer his purpose, so that at the outset of his undertaking, he lost a portion of time and labour, and suffered disappointment enough to discourage an ordinary mind.

But stimulated by failure to continue his research and toil, he found that the stones best calculated for his design were only to be met with amongst the rocks of Skiddaw, and on these he expended his future exertions. Animated now by the hope of success, he bore these masses from the mountain on his back to his home at a considerable distance, and there proceeded to reduce them to the shape he considered necessary, and to put to the test their varied tones. This involved an amount of effort not easily estimated: it was made after many a hard day's work in the mountains; and often did Richardson deny himself the repose he required, and pass whole nights after his family had retired to rest pursuing the object on which his heart was set. A considerable share of disappointment must still have been his lot; the stone which promised well would not answer the purpose if hammered and chiselled beyond a certain point: and it may be supposed there were times in which his heart failed him, particularly as a family of eight children were dependent on his daily labour for support, and his task was continued amid much weariness and trial.

At length, however, his skill and perseverance were rewarded, and after more than thirteen years' incessant labour, he succeeded in constructing a musical instrument of a very extraordinary character, which is properly called "The Rock Harmonicon." It consists of rough stones, the longest of which is four feet six inches in length, about three inches in breadth, and about an inch and a half in thickness; and the shortest of which is about six inches in length, an inch in breadth, and half an inch in thickness: these are placed across a pair of wooden bars, covered with twisted straw, and form the keys, like those of a piano-forte; the material of them all being the mica schist, or as it is commonly called, in Cumberland and other places, whinstone. The means employed to extract their sounds are wooden hammers; small, and of lignum-vitæ, for the treble; larger, and of elm or ash, for the middle notes; and larger still, and covered with leather, for the bass. Some times for the centre keys, hammers are used with two knobs on each, in the form of a crutch-handle, to strike thirds. Those who are acquainted with the toy harmonicon, consisting of pieces of glass laid on tapes, to be struck with a cork hammer, will readily form an idea of this singular instrument, and the mode in which its sounds are elicited*

The pieces of stone, it should be remarked, are arranged in two rows; the lower one being tuned in the diatonic scale, and the upper one containing the flats and sharps. A piece of music may therefore be played in any key, with the greatest facility and fidelity. Three sons of the inventor perform on the instrument pieces of music in three distinct parts; one playing the melody, the next executing a clever working inner part, and the third the fundamental bass. Its power extends to a compass of five octaves and a half, accompanied by all the semi-tones, tuned from F below the bass stave to C in altissimo extending, in fact, as high as the warble of the lark; down to the deep bass of a funeral bell. The tones produced are equal in quality, and sometimes superior in mellowness and fulness, to those of a fine piano-forte, under the hand of a skilful player. Difficult chromatic ascents and descents are performed with a truly extraordinary brilliancy and crispness. A professor of music at Liverpool produced, in conjunction with the sons of the inventor, and also alone, some very pleasing and striking effects. M. Costa, addressing the inventor, says, "I have been much gratified with the performance of your three sons on your very ingenious instrument, and sincerely wish you may be recompensed for your wonderful discovery." Sir George Smart also writes, "I am happy to offer my testimony in favour of your very clever invention, and think the production of the 'Rock Harmonicon,' does infinite credit to your perseverance and musical feeling; the tones of the instrument are powerful and beautiful, and I was highly pleased with the performance of your three sons upon it. I sincerely hope your labours will be rewarded as they richly deserve."

* It is now exhibiting in Stanley's Rooms, 21, Old Bond-street.

LORD ASHBURTON'S DINNER AT WASHINGTON.

Lord Ashburton's first official dinner came off April 23, at six P.M. This functionary is a very plain, gentlemanly-looking man, with a face somewhat care-worn, and a complexion such as belongs to those who have lived long and well. His suite are fine young men, generally bald, but with intellectual heads, though not very remarkable countenances. The private secretary of his ordship is said to be the cleverest of the legation. In manners they are all self-possessed, somewhat stiff in the movements of their bodies, and few or no gestures escape them while speaking. How different from the others of the foreign ministers here! Why, a lively Frenchman will gesticulate more in one minute with the phalanges of his dexter hand, than Mr. Mildmay could in the whole course of his natural life. The dinner was served up soon after the hour of dining arrived. Late hours are, of course, in fashion everywhere among the diplomatic givers and eaters of dinners, and this one was to take place at six. The table was of the longitudinal character, and there were present about sixteen guests. Among them were the fare on ministers generally, the heads of departments, and some of our leading men in Congress. There was no ceremony in entering the dining-room The guests "stood not upon the order of their going," but went at once. Lord Ashburton took the centre of the table. On his right was John Quincy Adams on his left John C. Calhoun, opposite him sat General Scott. Mr. Fox was not present! It has been rumoured that Mr. F. feels a little sore at the mission extraordinary. He perhaps supposes the business might have better been entrusted to him. But while we think very well of Mr. Fox's abilities, we imagine the length of time he has been in public life has somewhat case-hardened him—that he takes no interest in public affairs beyond what his instructions require of him; in short, that he has more head than heart; and that a negociation, controlling the destinies of two great nations, affecting every cottage in remote England, and every log hut beyond our mountains, is no more to Mr. Fox than any other negotiation, and that he would conduct it in the same cold, skilful, and gentlemanly manner which he would a game of ecarte, and in no other way. Lord Ashburton is rather a man of the people,—is identified with the prosperity of the commercial classes—would be unhappy, truly unhappy, to see mother and daughter at variance; and he would rather sacrifice the 25 townships he owns in the State of Maine, but to which he has scarcely given a thought for many years, and of which now for the first time he learns the real value, than involve us in a war—the scourge of nations and the desolation of mankind. The table was beautifully laid out, but as all his lordship's plate has not arrived, there was no plateau in the centre, and no vases elaborate in art, and perfuming the saloon with the choicest cullings of the conservatory. But it was still very elegant, and displayed the skill of an accomplished majordomo. There are twenty-one servants in the house; and the reader may well imagine what a god send a score of beef-eaters must be to the cattle graziers in this city. Indeed, the out-go of his lordship's establishment will be so large, and the profit so immense to the retailers here, that we should not be surprised if they proposed, in the course of a few months, to purchase the claim of England to the disputed territory, and present it as a mark of their gratitude, to the people of Maine, for having so much the cause of the present mission. As his lordship has three cooks of the utmost talent, artists whom Ude himself would not have blushed to take by the hand, the dinner was not only superb but magnificent. The meats were all nicely carved, and handed round as is now the fashion; and the game, of which there was a great variety, was all cut up and divided by the cooks before it was served up; then reinstated in form and figure, ready to drop apart at the touch of the first fork. Course after course succeeded, delicious to the palate and agreeable to the eye; the wines were rich and soft, and high flavoured, having the body and strength which belong to the English cellar. Champagne was passed freely round, but no other wines of France, and none from the Rhineland, met our eyes. If diplomacy expresses its feelings at the dinner table by its preferences for meats and drinks, then we say to Germany and France, England likes not the Zoll Verein, nor the backing out from the quintuple treaty for the right of search. No! no! hard cider and Monongahelea, which stoutly represents the apples and the cornstalks of brother Jonathan, shall find favour on the festive board of John Bull when Chateau Margeaux and Vin de Grave shall be forgotten. The conversation it would be improper to divulge. We do not believe it right, though it may be fashionable, to retail conversations and steal correspondences. We will only say, that the remarks were all of a friendly spirit, now and then approaching the confines of rigid propriety, when they related to the quality of our steam-ships, and the differences of our discipline. The dessert, among other things, exhibited a large number of the choicest fruits of England, beautifully preserved fair to the eye and delightful to the taste. They were much admired by the guests, and produced a round of encomiums on the garden from which they were brought. In due time coffee succeeded, and the guests departed, much pleased with this first of a series of entertainments with which the new envoy commences his mission. For some years "the meteor flag" of England has not floated very gaily in Washington. Mr. Fox is a man of retired habits, somewhat peculiar, and does not care for popularity with "the natives." A new system of operation is commenced. The boundary line is to be adjusted on the dinner-table in streams of sherry. the right of visitation is to be exercised in diplomatic hospitalities, and the loss of the Creole is to be made up in black and white. In taking our leave, we did not forget that the fourteen servants in livery—blue coats, black velvet shorts, and striped waistcoats—had done their best to fill our plates with the dainties of his lordship's table.—From the New York Herald.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

It is a maxim laid down by constitutional laws, that those systems which are founded upon wrong can never be upheld to the injury of the people, or that they should be made to suffer from either the indolence, the ignorance, the art fire, or the injustice of their rulers. I shall now point out how that one has sprung up in this kingdom, which, notwithstanding the unprecedented position of its government (overburdened by debt) by bad constructive reasoning, causes debt to be estimated as crime, and actually places the unfortunate being who happens to fall into the hands of a relentless creditor, or his adviser, in a position similar to that of the common felon. I will further show that it is illegal, as it is in direct violation of Magna Charta, which by the coronation oath of the Sovereign, and the constitution of these realms, can never by any enactment be superseded, and which has been further confirmed by various subsequent enactments, and also by that most solemn one of the Habeas Corpus. I particularly refer to c. 29 of Magna Charta, which Queen Elizabeth directed Lord Chancellor Burleigh to have suspended in every court in Westminster, in consequence of her hearing of the arrest of Sir Thomas Gargrave: the Queen at the same time saying, "that she had no conception that such a practice existed in her dominions," and immediately directed that all persons imprisoned for debt should be released, and that no more injustice be done to her subjects for the future in imprisoning their persons for debt

Lord Bacon boldly declared—"That no man could be arrested for debt according to the constitution; that arrest and imprisonment without crime or fraud, were both illegal and oppressive."

Lord Coke said—"The King, by Magna Charta, is debarred from imprisoning his debtor, unless through fraud or crime; the great Charta shall be taken as common law, and all statutes made against it are void. The person of the debtor must be free, that he may serve the King in his wars, cultivate the soil, and maintain his family."

Lord Chief Justice Holt, in pronouncing the opinion of the twelve judges on occasion of a bailiff's assistant being killed in an attempt to arrest for debt, said—"That if one, upon unlawful authority, be imprisoned, it is sufficient provocation to all people to rescue out of compassion; much more so, when it is done under colour of justice, and when the liberty of the subject is involved, it is a provocation to all the subjects of England. A man ought to be concerned for Magna Charta and the laws; and if a man against law imprison another, he is an offender against Magna Charta."

Two debtors were imprisoned in the gaol of Norwich for debt, they broke out and escaped. The plaintiff brought his action against Clement Paxton, High-sheriff for Norfolk. The sheriff contended that, as imprisonment for debt was contrary to law, he, the sheriff, could not be made liable for damages. The court awarded that the capias ad satisfaciendum was wrong, as no man could be imprisoned in England for debt. In this judgment the Barons concurred, with the then Chief Baron, Sir R. Monwood.

Lord Eldon declared in the House of Lords—"That he never would sanction such a court as the Insolvent Court, as it was giving a power greater than the twelve judges, with the Chancellor at their head, possessed—that of trying and imprisoning without a jury, and from which there was no appeal; that there was no necessity for such a bill, as Magna Charta abolished arrest for debt, and by the judges not permitting the capias ad satisfaciendum to issue against the person, the system would die a natural death; adding, that the law of arrest is a permission to commit greater acts of oppression than is to be met with in slavery itself a permission to tear the guiltless parent from his weeping children, the husband from his distracted wife, and to hurry him to a dungeon, there to languish out a life in pain and misery."

I have thus shown, by a recital of the well-authenticated opinions of these great and learned men, that this power, shamefully assumed, and wrongfully used by the judicial authorities of this kingdom, is in direct violation of our constitutional law. I will now shortly show that it is unnecessary for the protection of the commercial interests of this country. The writ of fieri facias can at any time after judgment be issued against property, and the recorded judgments override every species of property that the debtor may possess; and as the concealment of the property of the debtor is criminal, surely there can be no necessity for the interposition of cruelty in placing the honest but unfortunate in the position of criminals, without the commission, or even the intention of committing, a crime.

Ceasing to speak of the legality or illegality of the arrest of the person of the debtor, the very circumstance of the arrest of the person has been proved in evidence, before a legally-appointed commission, to be in a great majority of cases injurious to the creditor himself, for concealment and fraud are apt to follow the arrest of the person; and where good will and purposed good faith previously existed in the bosom of the debtor, they become extinguished in the cells of a prison-house. His mind, formerly pure, becomes corrupted, excited, exasperated by his own wrongs, as well as those of others daily recited to him within those walls. He enters the prison a good and faithful servant and subject of his sovereign. Galled by oppression, wounded and rendered bitter by the injuries he has suffered, and is at that time suffering, and discovering as he does that those injuries have been inflicted by a misapplication of the law itself, he ceases to have reverence for the estates of the realm, the supposed guardians of the people's liberties. Sovereign, statesman, and senator no longer occupy a place in his affections, while his heart yearns for the more extended liberties and institutions of the New World. With their earliest instruction he implants similar feelings in the bosoms of his children, where those rooted animosities to the Government increase with their years; and thus the evils arising out of the system assume an aspect threatening and dangerous even to the state itself. MARCUS TULLIUS.

INCOME-TAX BILL.—Among the supplemental clauses to the Income-tax Bill, is one that makes the property of a married woman living with her husband, a part of the husband's property: whereas, a woman living apart from her husband, is regarded as a femme sole; here is a pretty premium on separation! Householders are required to denounce their lodgers to the tax-inquisition; and the penalties for neglect are very stringent. Tenants in Scotland are required to produce their ... —Sohman.

CORN-DEALERS.—THE AVERAGES.—It perhaps may not be generally known that, under the new act just passed, entitled "An Act to amend the Law relating to the Importation of Corn," any person dealing in British corn in any city or town named in the schedule, or who shall carry on the business of a corn-factor, miller, maltster, brewer, or distiller, or who shall be the owner or part owner of any stage-coaches, ... carts, or other carriages, carrying goods or passengers for hire, and every person who, as a merchant, clerk, or agent, or otherwise, shall purchase at any such city or town, any British corn for sale, or for the sale of meal, flour, malt, or bread, made or to be made therefrom, shall, before he or she so deal in British corn as aforesaid, make a declaration, in writing, to a magistrate. The penalty for neglecting to do so, as well as for not making proper returns afterwards, is £20. Those persons who made declarations under the old law are required to renew them.

THE QUEEN AND PRINCE OF WALES.

A SCENE IN THE NURSERY AT CLAREMONT.

Our young and gracious Sovereign's twenty-third birthday has been celebrated with less pomp than usual; but if the felicitations were more tacit, they were far more general, heartfelt, and attractive. The concourse flocking to the Drawing Room, her Majesty, no doubt, foresaw, particularly after her signal acts of hospitality, would be immense, and her Majesty, therefore, set apart a day at Claremont to celebrate her birthday in the charms of domestic society, after the fatigues of its more ceremonious celebration, when the whole of the beau monde overflowed at the Palace. Besides, there were our future King—Ich Dien—and his pretty sister, who had got a glance at the Royal Edward and Philippa, on their way to the Masque, and as they lay in their cradles of state, the sounds of revelry temptingly broke in upon their gentle repose, conjuring up the lively mille et une nuits dreams of infancy. And why should not they also have their holiday and their Masque? Her Majesty gave them the holiday in the charming retreats of Claremont, and their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and the Duchess of Kent prepared an agreeable surprise for her Majesty's waking on her birthday—and for the infant scions of Royalty—namely, a Masque au petit pied. Accordingly, on Tuesday, the Prince of Wales and his Royal sister, at earliest morn, suddenly appeared before the Royal Mother, dressed as natives of that picturesque country of the Tyrol, where, as Hofer proved, peasants became heroes.

But far be it from us to intrude further upon the secresy of such happy domestic scenes, although the feelings of all fathers and mothers—her Majesty's most loving and loyal of subjects—cannot be prevented following her in thought, and with heartfelt applause and gratulation, into the retreat of such domestic felicity. Sully, we believe it was, who said that Henri le Grand never appeared greater in the eyes of good men than when the pompous Ambassador of Spain found him on all fours, playing with his children mounted on his back. Queen Victoria will never appear more exalted in the world's opinion than when each side of the picture is thus revealed—the great Queen and stateswoman in the gorgeous palace—the young, lovely, and virtuous mother, amidst the pure joys of sylvan retreat and domestic relaxation.

Our artist has chosen for illustration one of those happy moments of maternal life when the magnificence and etiquette of the Queen are put aside by womanly tenderness for the expression of a mother's love.

EPSOM RACES.

There is not one day of the year a greater harbinger to all ranks of which this mighty metropolis is composed, of three or four days' exciting pleasure, than the first day of Epsom Races. It is a sort of overture to a grand opera—a prologue to a drama—in which some 100,000 persons—if we make the corps dramatique complete, are to be more or less actors. Of course, in comparison to what follows, it is, of itself, insignificant; yet, calculated alone — measured without comparison to that which follows — it is far from despicable. Of its nature, no other country can exhibit the like. It is not a day for sight-seekers, nor for those who visit gay scenes to be seen rather than to see; but it is rather a day for those who do not measure pleasure by variety and bustle of exhibitions, but for what they really are worth. If the truth were told, the great majority of us lovers of horse-flesh in the world care little about horse-racing; and thousands who go to Epsom would (but, of course, they dare not acknowledge their bad taste) enjoy more cordially a race of donkeys, with sweeps on their backs, than that of the best racers known, bestridden by such immortal jockies as the Robinsons, the Chifneys, the Scotts, or the Days. Hence it is that the first Epsom day finds on the Downs chiefly persons really fond of racing, or called thither for gain, or to practise their callings—some of which, it must be admitted, smack strongly of the disreputable. On Tuesday, and on the Oaks day—"weather permitting"—a greater number of quiet and timid families may be found upon the Downs than on that most remarkable day of the year to the inhabitants of London, called the "Derby." Persons who do not like to be hustled—who do not choose to make a toil of pleasure—who do not like the contact of their inferiors—who detest that the odour emitted by the living corses of the "rude rabble" should come "between the wind and their nobility"—your finicking young lady, and your very genteel young gentleman—he who imagines effeminacy gentility—prefer your quiet Tuesday to "the day of days." They are, perhaps, after all, right, and certainly so are those mothers who wish to show their young ones a race, without being continually on the fidgets, lest they should, by some accident, have their race run out. None of the Epsom days can be without interest, for on each and every one of them great interests are at stake, and, consequently, none of them can be badly attended. The thorough sporting character must be on the course on Tuesday as well as Wednesday; for, to be perfectly polished, he must see small as well as great doings. Epsom race-course, every day the races last, is well worth seeing; and so it was on Tuesday. It is always a very pleasant thing to see a number of our fellow-beings congregated together in search of happiness. Such a spectacle Epsom Downs presented on Tuesday. Nor do we every day see abroad a congregation of our country gentry—an assemblage of well-dressed persons of either sex—a fair sprinkling of our nobility—giving an inkling, at any rate, to the foreign spectator of the personal appearance, and of the taste and splendour of the nation in which he is a passing sojourner. That was seen on Tuesday. There the gentlemen who live by their wits had already pitched their tents—the early bird, they well knew, catches the worm; and that motley concourse of race camp-followers had arrived; and the course exhibited, in the shape of booths, with inviting signs most artistically painted and lettered, that preparations were made to satisfy the diversified appetites of the myriads expected. The activity that prevailed in the morning at Nine Elms, and at the Croydon Railway terminus, particularly since the "Stoat's Nest," to which that railway runs, is not more than six miles from Epsom—the unusual crowds on the roads leading from London and from other places to the course, showed that the racing week had begun. We have little to add in the way of preliminary. The programme for the first was unusually inviting, and the sport fully equal to the expectation. The weather, however, was adverse, the rain having descended without ceasing until near two o'clock; and at the same time that it laid the dust and refreshed the thirsty soil, kept away hundreds who had made themselves up for "a day's pleasure." The attendance, in consequence, was thin.

ON TUESDAY

The racing commenced half an hour after the time appointed with—

The Craven Stakes, of 10 sovs each. 14 subscribers.

Mr. Forth's ch f Lucy Banks, 3 yrs	.. .. ..	(Bell) 1
Lord Westminster's Satirist, 5 yrs	.. .. ..	.. 2
Sir G. Heathcote's Pannakeen, 3 yrs	.. .. ..	.. 3

Eight others started, and, after one false start, Epaulette took the lead, at a moderate pace. There was little change in the positions or pace till near the distance, when Lucy Banks went in front, and the lot closing, ran well together three parts up it; Satirist and Lucy Banks then singled themselves out, and made a severe race home, the mare winning on the post by the neck. Pannakeen was a respectable third.

The Shirley Stakes, of 25 sovs each. One mile. 3 subscribers.

Mr. Herbert's Nesus, by Sir Hercules	.. ..	..(Rogers) 1
Mr. Shelley's Iole	.. ..	.. 2
Sir G. Heathcote's Arkansas	.. ..	.. 3

The filly made all the running, Nesus waiting on her to the end of the rails in front of the Grand Stand, where he challenged, and, after a pretty race, won by half a length.

The Woodcote Stakes, of 15 sovs each, with 30 added. 5 subscribers.

Mr. G. Ongley's b f by Camel, dam by Octavius	.. ..	(Sly) 1
Mr. Forth's Venus, by Sir Hercules	.. ..	.. 2
Sir G. Heathcote's b c, by Velocipede	.. ..	(Dryad) 3
General Wyndham's Handmaiden	.. .. ..	.. 4

The Camel filly made all the running, was challenged at the distance, and won, after a good race, by half a length, without having been caught. The third and fourth were beaten off.

The Manor Plate, of 50 sovs. The winner to be sold for 300 sovs. Two mile heats.

Mr. Nightingale's Ajax (late Nick), 4 yrs	.. ..	(Sly) 1 1
Mr. Kingsley's Jessica, 4 yrs	.. .. ..	.. 4 2
Mr. S. Lucas's The Traitor, 3 yrs	.. .. ..	.. 2 dr
Mr. Bradford's Sister to Confusion, 3 yrs	.. ..	.. 3 dr

Ajax was the favourite, and won both heats, in a canter.

The Craven Stakes was followed by the retreat of Auckland to 25 to 1, and by a declaration that Canadian was lame, and would not start. We need not dwell upon the dismay that ensued. For the decline of Auckland various reasons were assigned: some said that he was amiss (he was walking in the paddock the same evening, looking well enough)—others that he had been "made safe"—while a few did not hesitate to declare that he was "good for nothing." Whether each or either of the causes assigned was the true one, we do not pretend to say; all that we have to observe is, that the odds quoted were purely nominal, as twice 25 to 1 would not have been taken. Osborne, his trainer, it was said, left for London before the races, to see his master, but with what object did not transpire. The result of the Craven Stakes was, of consequence, beyond the influence it may have been supposed to exercise on the position of Auckland, inasmuch as it immediately brought Policy into notice at 25 to 1.

THE DERBY.

On Wednesday the Downs were as resplendent as ever with thousands of Fair women and brave men.

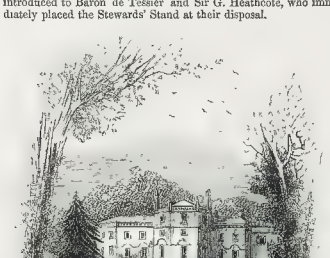
But the thing would not be English—the grand drama would not be Shakspearian—that is, it would not be true to nature—if, amid the sublime and the splendid, there were not a goodly mixture of the grotesque, and motley, and ridiculous. And so there was. It is unnecessary to repeat the doings in the gambling booths, the thimble-riggers, the gipsies, the mountebanks, the thousand tricks played off to entrap the unwary and strip them of their gilding! They were practised on Wednesday for nearly the hundredth time as successfully as ever. Need we repeat that the road abounded with the usual incidents, funny enough to some, not equally so to others? There was the usual number of cracked coach panels, broken poles, smashed splinter-bars, quarrels at the toll-bar, patience-trying stoppages. More than once, alas! we heard God's name taken in vain, but we did not see one person struck on the right cheek, holding out the other to be struck in the same way—on the contrary. Half an hour before the grand race commenced, and when all were intent upon it, the course presented a most animated appearance—the excited expectations of at least 60,000 persons on the tiptoe. From Epsom close to Tattenham-corner, the sides of the course were lined with many thousands. The immortal hill was crowned with a cluster, close and numerous, of fashionables in carriages and on horseback. The angle was carriage-wedged, and from the starting-post a continuous succession of horsemen and pedestrians unceasingly poured along to Tattenham-corner. Then there was the usual pressure to see the jockies mount; after that to see each horse take his gallop, and scan the appearance and action of the favourites. Shortly after, another rush, more tremendous than any yet, was made to see the start, and more terrifically still the crowd hurried to the winning-post. Once more the mass was on the move, to learn the announcement of the winner, and then could be seen visages from which all hope had fled.

In the morning, in consequence of the rain on Tuesday, a good deal of anxiety was manifested by all parties whose interest it was that there should be a large concourse of persons on the course. This anxiety referred chiefly to the weather, which, in the forenoon, showed symptoms of a fine day; and a fine day there was—cold and clear—quite opposite to its last broiling anniversary. The effect of this was an ever-flowing tide of arrivals, and we never recollect seeing a more numerous multitude spread itself over the downs. Though it had been circulated that her Majesty, her Royal Consort, and the Court, would be present to witness the race, a pretty general belief prevailed that the rumour was without foundation; and when towards the hour of starting there was no indication of the arrival of Royalty, the multitude exhibited no marked disappointment. About two o'clock, Count Mensdorff, uncle to her Majesty, and his four sons, accompanied by Colonel Arbuthnot, one of the Queen's Equerries, arrived from Claremont. They were introduced to Baron de Tessier and Sir G. Heathcote, who immediately placed the Stewards' Stand at their disposal.



DURDANS. SIR G. HEATHCOTE'S SEAT.

The race was advertised to come off at half-past two, and at that time most of the horses appeared at the post, but it is easier to get a large field to the post than from it, and so it proved to-day, for two or three false starts and several dodging attempts caused an immense delay, and it was fully half-past three by "Shrewsbury clock," before the final start took place. However, the bell for saddling having been at length sounded, the course was cleared with surprising rapidity, and in a few instants afterwards all was in readiness for the exciting struggle for

The requisite arrangements being accomplished, and the horses fairly settled into their places, Combermere took the lead, followed by Attila, Lasso, and Belcœur, the second lot being headed by Auckland, Chatham, Seahorse, Policy, and Coldrenick; to these succeeded a body of horses (in racing phraseology "the ruck"), and then the tail—viz., Defier, Robert de Gorham, Palladium, Hydaspes, and Jack, the latter having lost a start of nearly one hundred yards. For the first quarter of a mile the pace was moderate, it then quickened, and Lasso immediately vacated the third place; but in other respects the race proceeded as we have described it till near the turn, when Belcœur headed Attila and Combermere, and with the two at his shoulders, carried the running into the straight course, the lot behind consisting of Chatham, Auckland, Seahorse, Policy, and the Agreeable colt—Robert de Gorham, who had gradually improved his position, lying next. The front rank continued intact to the road, but it was otherwise with that behind it:—Coldrenick had already shown that the distance was too great for him, Chatham fell lame, Seahorse, Policy, and the Agreeable colt had shot their bolts, and Robert de Gorham, passing them in succession, took his ground next to Auckland; within a few yards of the distance Combermere gave up in toto, and fell into the ruck; and immediately after Attila shot past Belcœur, took a decisive lead, kept it to the end, and won with the most perfect ease imaginable by two lengths. Robert de Gorham ran by Auckland half-way up the distance, collared Belcœur at the stand, and beat him for the second money cleverly by a length, Auckland being well up with Belcœur at the finish. The Agreeable colt and Policy were fifth and sixth, Seahorse dividing them from the crowd behind. Jack and Palladium were about the last two. The pace was good, but certainly not first-rate. Value of the stakes £4900. Colonel Anson, Lords Chesterfield and Maidstone, and, in fact, all the gentlemen connected with Scott's stables, are great winners on the race. The Manchester men are also on the right side, the balances to be handed over amounting, according to report, to £70,000! Considering what favourable opportunities the Coldrenick party had of hedging their money, we take it for granted they have not been been bit very hard, albeit their confidence (in a very bad horse) was almost without a parallel in the annals of racing. The settling will take place on Tuesday next.

It is a curious fact, that very little is known concerning the precise origin of races, enjoying so extensive and sovereign a degree of popularity as those which at present form the concentrating point of public attention. The known partiality of James I. for this species of diversion might justify us in ascribing the commencement of the races at Epsom to the period when he resided at the palace of Nonsuch (near Ewell), and there is inferential proof, that they were viewed as no uncommon occurrence in the reign of his unfortunate successor, Charles I., as will appear from the following passage in Clarendon's "History of the Rebell on:"—"Soon after the meeting, which was held at Guildford, May 18, 1648 (to address the two Houses of Parliament, that the King, their only lawful sovereign, might be restored to his due honours, and might come to his Parliament for a personal treaty, &c.), a meeting of the Royalists was held on Banstead (Epsom) Downs, under the pretence of a horse-race, and 600 horses were collected and marched to Reigate." Nor have we been able to trace with accuracy when they were first held periodically, though we find that, from the year 1750, they have been annually held in the month of May or June. It was formerly the custom to commence the races at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and after the first or second heat, the company usually returned into the town to dinner. In the afternoon they again assembled on the Downs, when the races of the day were finished. The races are not always held in the week immediately preceding Whitsuntide, except when Easter Monday falls in March; in this case they are held a fortnight later. This has been the practice since the celebrated Derby and Oaks stakes were first established—the former in 1780, and the latter in 1779.

DERBY LOTTERIES.—These sporting speculations, which a few years since were comparatively unknown in the metropolis, have now multiplied to an extraordinary extent; indeed, there is scarcely an hotel, tavern, or public-house, but now has its Derby lottery or "sweep," as it is technically termed, the prizes varying from £5 to £1500; the subscriptions, of course, being regulated by the number of subscribers. In most of these clubs there are two prizes, the second being one-third of the amount of the first, and some lotteries have also a third prize, but very few, on account of the wrangling which frequently ensues as to the third horse, the judge at the winning post only placing two, and consequently the third horse can only be ascertained from the daily or weekly sporting papers; but, as they often differ on this point, it is difficult to ascertain, with any degree of certainty, the name of the third horse. These clubs are not merely confined to houses of public entertainment or resort, but also in large establishments the clerks and operatives have their "draws," and in the country they are still more numerous, particularly in Manchester, Sheffield, and Birmingham. At the Post-office Hotel, Manchester, Mr. Blake, the proprietor, has several sweeps, one having for the first prize £1400., the subscribers residing in different parts of the kingdom. In these lotteries it is a common practice for gentlemen to present their wives with a chance, and young gentlemen to enter the names of their inamoratas, in the hope of creating an "agreeable surprise." To the uninitiated, the modus operandi of these lotteries may not be uninteresting. When the list of subscribers is completed, a day is appointed for the drawing, which generally takes place a few weeks prior to the race. The parties, or their representatives, being assembled, two uninterested persons are selected as drawers, and two boxes or hats are used for the occasion—the one containing tickets on which are inscribed the names of the horses, and the other, tickets of the names of the subscribers. A ticket, with the name of a subscriber, is first drawn out, and then a ticket with the name of a horse, and both of these duplicates are recorded in a book, which is kept for the reference of members. The horses are equally divided among the subscribers, and if any difficulty occurs in the division, blanks are put in to complete the number and drawn, the number of horses being regulated by the list of subscribers. Any person can dispose of their tickets, and there is always a market for the same, the price being governed by the odds at Tattersall's. Many sporting men make up a "book" in the following manner. They purchase tickets of horses and then bet against them. Thus, for instance, if they have a horse in a £100 lottery they can afford to lay £50 or more against it, and in the event of the horse winning, they receive £100 to pay £50, consequently winning £50 either way. This can only be effected by persons who move in the sporting circles.

THE DERBY DAY.

Now readers all, of one accord,
Put on your merry faces,
While we narrate you all the great
Hubbub of Epsom Races!

The cockney lot could ne'er have got
A finer day for startin'—
It was as shining as the Day
Who lived with Mr. Martin.

Of course we mean the Derby Day,
When run both colt and filly,
Almost as famous, in its way,
As Canning's Derby Dilly.

The sun rose bright in all his pride,
His eastern pillow scorning;
And many fathers' sons beside
Were up as soon that morning.

DOING IT SPICY.

And ladies bright, in glad delight,
To go and see the winner;
Some took a fair in garments rare,
And some a foul for dinner.

With lots of prog, and lots of grog,
Away some thousand scampered;
I cannot tell how much with wine
Their carriages were hamper'd.

They went in gigs, they went in carts,
In coaches and in chaises;
And some in vans adorned by hands
With buttercups and daisies.

Now, of these last a fact we'll state,
And are prepared to prove it—
They never tried to lead the van,
But, by cock and pie, they drove it.

And vehicles of all degrees,
And people of all classes,
With riches such as men amass
From labour of the masses.

A few smart showers laid the dust,
At which no wight ran rusty,
And for this reason, that thereby
The road was "none so dusty."

We hold it better for a man,
With summer travel bothered,
To be at once at Hindustan,
Than always in dust smothered.

So when those laying showers came,
The crowd cared not two stivers,
For the smiling skies soon held their rains,
As well as all the drivers.

They drove away in style so gay,
Some skilful, some at random,
In cab and buggy, demet, gig,
In four-in-hand and tandem.

One nobby Jarvey's fare comprised
Grub, Champagne, and cheroot;

'Twas odd enough to see him stow
His victuals in his boot.

But when some cockney cried aloud,
"Boots wasn't made for wittles,"
He marked the chaffer from the crowd,
And knocked him down "like skittles!"

Quarrels and accidents, of course,
Were thick as moods and tenses,
And some were accidents of gates,
Some accidents of fences!

The turnpike gates annoyed the mob,
Who did abuse and scold so;
They had to pay, and didn't like
The joke of being toll'd so.

But still they rode and rattled on,
With air of demi-rep some;
But others, vastly more genteel,
Unto the Downs of Epsom.

And, if you'd know what there befel
Smart jockey-coves and dressy men,
We give you here a string of cuts
To serve you as a specimen.

Now on the road, within one minute,
A splendid chance of rolling in it.

Most downy from the first and clever,
But much more downy now than ever.

Deprived of many more resources,
He tries just now a change of horses.

If e'er I cut the ribbons, bend me double,
They've snapp'd, my Lord, and sav'd you all the trouble!

When I set out to race upon this ground,
I never thought of running such a round

Here for the present we cut short our set,
With two smart nags that have two floors to let.

ATTILA, THE WINNER OF THE DERBY.

We close our account of Epsom Races with a portrait of Attila the winner of the Derby Stakes, and his rider, Scott. It is from a sketch made by Mr. Hancock immediately after the race; those who are familiar with this gentleman's talent, and the high reputation which he enjoys as an animal painter, will readily believe it to be a true and spirited representation of its now famous original. Every one acquainted with the horse, must certify its admirable accuracy.

GRAND CRICKET MATCH.

A match of considerable interest was played on Parker's Piece, Cambridge, between the Marylebone and University Clubs. The Marylebone having won the toss, put the adversaries in first; who, by their formidable style of batting, raised the hopes of their supporters to a high pitch. Mr. Anson deserves particular praise. The score in the first innings of the University, amounted to 136 runs. The Marylebone then went in, and, assisted mainly by the science of the Hon. F. Ponsonby, Mr. Taylor, and Captain Mundy, headed their opponents by 28 runs. This position of the game greatly changed the odds so lately in favour of the University. The result of the second innings of the Cantabs, left the Marylebone 86 runs to gain. The wickets fell rapidly, Mr. Taylor being caught early by Mr. Mase in a most masterly style. Mr. Whitaker's wicket next fell, when Mr. Bolland joined Mr. Ponsonby and by his great patience and judgment kept at his wicket until the match closed in favour of the Marylebone, with three wickets to go down. Cambridge has not been so strong for years. Mr. French's batting, and the bowling of Messrs. Bluker and Backer were excellent.

THE ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.

The first sailing match of the above club, under the patronage of her Majesty and Prince Albert, is appointed to take place on Saturday, the 4th of June, when three superb pieces of plate will be sailed for by the following yachts, belonging to members of the club:—

FIRST AND SECOND CLASSES.

	Tons.	Owner's Names.	Distinguishing Colours.
Lady Louisa	13	J. Smith, Esq.....	Blue.
Phantom.....	20	T. F. Silby, Esq....	White and Blue.
Mystery	25	Lord A. Paget.....	Blue, pierced, white Maltese cross.
Mary.....	25	G. Ashlin, Esq.	White, quartered with red.
Spray	14	G. Taylor, Esq.	Red, with white Maltese cross.

THIRD CLASS.

Brilliant	8	H. Fowler, Esq....	Blue, with white vertical stripe.
Sea Nymph.....	10	C Wheeler, Esq. ..	White before red.
Rival	10	W. Sawyer, Esq. ..	Red and white quartered.

To start from off the Royal Hospital, Greenwich, sail to Coalhouse Point, below Gravesend, and return to Greenwich. The Royal Sovereign steam-vessel will accompany the match, and the band of the Surrey yeomanry will attend to amuse the company.

DEATH OF THE FATHER OF THE TURF.—Christopher Wilson, Esq., of Oxton Hall, Yorkshire, the Father of the Turf, as he was generally designated, died on Tuesday, after a short illness, at Christie's Hotel, St. James's-street, in his 79th year. Mr. Wilson was well known and highly respected in the sporting circles, and was one of the senior members of the Jockey Club.

ELECTRICITY OF STEAM.

Professor Daniell, in his lecture on the chemistry of the atmosphere, delivered at the Royal Institution, took occasion to exhibit the elimination of the electric spark from steam. The extraordinary fact of the possibility of obtaining electricity from steam was, like many others of the wonders of science, discovered by mere accident by one of the workmen at a large steam-engine, in a factory near Gateshead; for, in raising the lever connected with some portion of the machinery, against which steam had been allowed to condense, he received so powerful an electric shock as to be thrown to the ground. This occurred two or three times, and was at length mentioned to certain scientific individuals in the neighbourhood, who at once traced the phenomenon to its true source. Immediately that the fact was communicated to the scientific world, several experiments were made on the matter, among which, those of Professors Daniell and Grove appear to have been the most satisfactory. The apparatus used by Professor Daniell was a small low-pressure boiler for generating the steam, to which was affixed a pipe, having in its centre a stop-cock, from which the steam could at all times be readily supplied. A tin tube, containing a number of diaphragms of wire-gauze, and bent at right angles, was affixed to the prime conductor of an electric machine, for the purpose of insulation, and the steam was at once projected into the tube. Electric sparks of considerable length were drawn from the opposite end of the conductor. A Leyden jar was charged, and a shock received: and hydrogen gas was lighted by its means. Several theories have been raised, to account for the phenomenon, of which the generally received and most probable is, that the electricity is developed by the sudden condensation of the vapour. Whatever, however, may be the real cause, the knowledge of the fact is of considerable importance in the science of meteorology. Since the wondrous discovery of Franklin, no one could doubt that electricity and lightning were identical, but it was never understood by what means the clouds became charged with electric fluid. Here is at once an explanation. If from the condensation of a small quantity of steam, an electric spark, attended by all its usual phenomena, be produced, can it not readily be conceived that the lightning would be the product of thousands of acres of condensed vapour in the air. On this part of the subject a pretty experiment was shown by Mr. Daniell. An electrometer, or apparatus for detecting minute quantities of electricity, was placed some considerable distance from the steam pipes, and a small puff or cloud of steam was suffered to roll over it, in doing which, the leaves of the electrometer were violently deflected, showing even here that the condensation of this small quantity, by the cold air, had produced a visible amount of electricity.

THE "INS" AND THE "OUTS."

The following exceedingly clever address was delivered by Mr. Murray, of the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, on the 15th ultimo, on the close of the season, and, although somewhat lengthy, the admirable tone throughout induces us to insert it:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen, In theatrical matters, as in political, the world may be divided into two great parties, namely, the 'Ins' and the 'Outs,' and you will at once perceive why the manager of a theatre, like the far-famed Vicar of Bray, should be his noble servant of the Ins, whatever political party or parties those Ins may happen to belong to. (Laughter.) The feelings and the gratification of these aforesaid Ins should ever be the paramount consideration of the aforesaid manager; and yet how often, Ladies and Gentlemen, on the occasion of a bad benefit, or the conclusion of an indifferent season, do we see an actor or manager coming forward, and with moody brow and 'hack-hastre eye,' visiting upon the good-natured and friendly Ins the defalcations of the stony-hearted Outs. (Laughter and applause.) If by such grumblings we could, like able financiers, touch the pockets of the Absentees—(great applause and laughter)—without annoying the feelings of the Present-hes and shes, then would I exclaim with Lear—

> Blow winds and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!
> You cataracts and hurricanoes fall,
> Till you have drowned the towns and palaces
> Of these said Out-and Outers—Great Heavens!

But as this is impossible, the result of such complaint is too frequently to offend our supporters, and literally turn our insides out. (Applause.) With these convictions, Ladies and Gentlemen, I present myself before you this evening; and although I cannot claim the garlands of a successful campaign, I shall not indulge the 'melting mood;' but, averaging the result of my labours and your favours for the last ten years, sincerely thank you, and all who have honoured me with their support during that period, for a very snug and comfortable 'balance in favour.' (Great applause.) To borrow another mercantile phrase, Theatres, especially the large ones, are looking down; for which depression, many causes may be assigned—and one in particular, the late hours of fashionable parties; for the man who sits down to dinner at seven o'clock, must of necessity cut his mutton and the theatre at the same time (laughter and applause); and, with a sharp appetite, I would back mutton against Shakspeare at any odds. (Great laughter.) Thus, the dinner-table depopulates our first prices; and as one evil genius generates another, the drawing-room ruins our second; for who would leave the attraction of a modern soirée, with its bevy of beauties, its gas, its songs, quadrilles, tableaux vivants, and all the thousand and one attractions which throw a fairy charm over the private parties of present days—who would leave them, I say, on a snowy night, to see a few shivering actors striving to be funny to the as few deluded individuals whom the astounding mysteries of a long play-bill have inveigled into our clutches? (Great laughter.) What is to be done to remedy this evil I know not for even if Kemble him-elf were here for a whole season, I'd back the dinners against him in the long run. To ask you to give up your dinners would be ridiculous, and yet, without some change, we must soon give up ours. (Laughter.) If you, gentle Ladies, don't dine a little earlier,

> 'Macbeth must dine no more.'

I thankfully acknowledge that, during Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean's engagement, dinners seemed at a discount; but then three weeks of prosperity barely recompense months of depression, particularly as, though man and wife are one flesh, they contrive, professionally, to have two pockets (great laughter); and between the Scylla of the one, and the Charybdis of the other, the manager gets anything but the lion's share. (Hear, hear,) during a future season, anything should be done to domesticize the private episode, we shall be truly grateful if not, we must again put our shoulders to the wheel, and trust to the chapter of accidents for better fortune. As for myself, I repeat, Ladies and Gentlemen, that the failure of a season or two cannot mar my fortunes, or influence my feelings; which ever have been, and ever will be, those of profound respect and regard for you, my very kind friends and patrons—sentiments in which, I am sure, the great bulk of my company join; and with heartfelt wishes for your health and happiness, we, for the brief vacation of a fortnight, respectfully take our leave." Mr. Murray then retired, amidst loud applause.

"MORPETH" AND MRS. MOTT.

(From the British. Whig.)

"Morpeth remains here a week—is invited to Mrs. Mott's splendid soirée on Friday.—New York Herald.

We are indebted to a friend now on a visit to the land of liberties (which are, by-the-by, taken with a familiar freedom peculiar to the expectorating nation) for an account of Mrs. Mott's splendid soirée." We give it in his own words:—

"Last night the Yankees in this place were in high spirits because, as they expressly declared, 'they would shew the Englisher Lord tarnation queer fixes, besides proving how slick them gals were about the jints.' As I had received a card, and was desirous to observe his lordship's reception, I walked to Mrs. Mott's house in B——-street, 45, which is about as large as one of the houses in Soho-square. The soirée commenced about half-past seven. I arrived at eight, at which time the last hackney-coach had set down Dr. and Mrs. Lardner, a gentleman of colour, and two United States colonels one of whom keeps a tobacco shop in New York-street, and the other is the editor of a penny magazine. The door was opened by a help, who addressed me with 'Guess you're rather late, my man; you're not Morpeth, are you?' Having seen his lordship's face, you may imagine my feeling of annoyance; however, in this country one must take all things coolly, so I proceeded to a small room, where in a sort of high back chair, placed on a large stool (intended to resemble a throne) sat Mrs. Mott. Her dress, if not quite unique, was rather singular. A red satin gown, with white flounces, green merino boots, and black sable boa, with a mouse-coloured velvet turban, from the centre of which dangled a gold tassel. The lady wore no gloves, but exhibited a plentiful display of rings, ringlets, and bracelets. She was attended by four damsels in white, with yellow satin sashes. The room was almost full, and the floor, which was uncarpeted, shewed evident signs of the presence of 'American Gentlemen.' Mrs. Mott received me with a dignified air, which called for all my muscular rigidity to prevent risibility. I glided into the crowd immediately, in order that I might look at the appointments of the room, which only wanted taste to perfect them. Every thing of the best; glasses, curtains, or-molu clocks, chairs, divans, all costly, but especially vulgar. Pictures there were none. The young women were very pretty, but execrably dressed; the men, in appearance and manners, ought not to be mentioned in the same breath with the men of Howell and James's. Dr. Lardner was as yet the lion, and Dr. Lardner the lioness. Philosophy and immorality are one and the same thing with the Yankees. There were many gentlemen and ladies of colour—the best behaved people in the room. The clock chimed nine, when in ran a help, saying, 'I'll be eternally weaned if he ain't come,' and he, the great Whig missionary, Lord Morpeth, in a yellow waistcoat, and a blue coat, with, of course, a cocked hat, made his inestimable appearance. It is hard to say which was the more graceful, the inclination of Mrs. Mott's head or Morpeth's body. Venus and Adonis never met at New York till this interview. After an interchange of compliments, 'Morpeth' was introduced to the aristocracy of New York, in which the names of Smith, Brown, Green, Tompkins, Pipkins, Potkins, and Simpkins, were distinguishable. After this we were entertained by a song from Miss Muggs, called 'Bunker's Hill,' and a comic song from a Miss Boys, called the 'Dutty Whig.' During the last the contortions of 'Morpeth's' face would have brought a bumper to the largest theatre in America.

"I left the house at ten, having seen quite enough to be disgusted; and I hear that the impression which his lordship made was anything but complimentary to his fine manners. The manners such soirée and the illustrious Howard will return to England a thorough Conservative."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

NATIONAL SOCIETY FOR THE EDUCATION OF THE POOR.—The annual meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday, at the Central School-room, in the Sanctuary, Westminster, when there was an unusually numerous assemblage of all classes. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury presided. After the usual examination of the children, the Rev. Mr. Sinclair, the secretary, read the report, which stated that, in the disposal of the fund for school-building, the object which the committee had invariably kept in view had been to call forth the largest possible amount of local efforts, and to produce the greatest attainable extent of church education. The whole number of cases is 918; the total sum granted is £15,881; and the number of scholars accommodated is 52,180, being a larger number, by 11,907, than in any preceding year. A variety of resolutions were moved and agreed to, and the meeting separated.

CITY AND WEST-END IMPROVEMENTS.—That part of Upper Thames street, near Queenhithe, is now undergoing a most important alteration and improvement. The whole frontage of several large warehouses, upwards of seven stories in height, and which project into the street for nearly twenty feet, and opposite to which there is not room for two carriages to pass each other, are now being pulled down, and new fronts, on a line with the other buildings, erected. The contemplated improvements in Piccadilly have been postponed until the ensuing autumn, in consequence of some difficulties on the subject which have arisen on the part of St. Martin's-in-the Fields, whose limits extend to the basin in the Green-park. The parish of St. George, Hanover-square, is willing to accede to the proposals of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, to facilitate the widening of the street, and there is no doubt that this desirable improvement, though now at a stand still, will be ultimately carried into effect. Last week a new bridge, over the piece of ornamental water leading from the Inner Circle in the Regent's-park across the Park to Macclesfield-gate, was opened to the public, and there are now two other bridges in course of erection, which, when completed, will facilitate the visits of the inhabitants of this great metropolis to Primrose hill.

THE TRINITY-HOUSE.—On Trinity Monday, the Elder Brethren of the Trinity-house, according to annual custom, visited the houses of the corporation at Deptford. About half-past twelve o'clock his Grace the Duke of Wellington, grand-master, and the officers and brethren of the corporation, landed at Gordon's dock-yard, and proceeded, escorted by a body of police, to the Trinity-house, in Church-street, where his Grace was sworn in, and the usual scrambling for biscuits and wine took place. The brethren afterwards proceeded to sit down to dinner, which was very unseemly, a disturbance having taken place, from the interference of the police with the arrangements made by the parochial authorities. The churchwardens and other parish officers loudly protested against the police remaining in the church at all, and several constables were ordered out. Mr. Maidden, the superintendent, said the police acted under written orders from some person whose name was not distinctly heard. Much confusion followed; but the service was ultimately proceeded with, and a sermon preached by the Rev. A. E. Sketchley, vicar. The brethren then returned to town. An immense concourse of spectators assembled in the town; and there was a great number of small craft on the river.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SOUTHAMPTON.—A bench warrant was issued on Saturday against Mr John Sadler Moody, lately a brewer in this town, and one of the recent batch of magistrates, for sending a challenge to Mr. T. L. Harman, the registered proprietor of the Hampshire Independent newspaper, in consequence of some severe strictures which appeared in that journal, on the evidence given by Mr. Moody before the late Southampton Election Committee. Mr. Moody's evidence, as reported in the local papers, has excited a great deal of attention in the town; and it has been determined by a body of the reformers, as soon as the short-hand writer's notes are published, to call the attention of Government to the subject with the view of memorialising for Mr. Moody's removal from the commission of the peace. It appears that Mr Moody sent a challenge to Mr. Harman, which that gentleman, on moral grounds, declined to accept. Mr. Moody, therefore, at an early hour this morning, before any of the members were in attendance, privately stole into the club room, of which he is not a member, and posted Mr. Harman as a coward. Mr. Harman being a member of the club, his brother members, on perceiving the paper, were highly incensed at this intrusion into their room, and have since expressed themselves very strongly to Mr. Moody on the subject. Mr. Moody was soon afterwards taken before the magistrates, and compelled to find sureties to keep the peace.

HORBURY.—ATTEMPTED MURDER.—On Monday night last an attempt at murder and robbery was made in Horbury, on the person of an old man named Hurst, who is a small shopkeeper in that village. About eleven o'clock at night, after the old man had retired to rest, some villain, knowing that Hurst lived alone, and generally had a little money in his possession, knocked at the door, and, on its being opened, he immediately rushed in, and demanded the money of the old man. On the latter refusing to deliver up his property, the ruffian fired a pistol at him, but luckily the ball missed its object, and the old man escaped with his face pierced. The assassin made a desperate attempt to stab him with a knife, but fortunately this was struck from his hand in the struggle; and thus being prevented from accomplishing the dreadful crime he had contemplated, he retreated through the still open door, glad to escape without his booty. We are sorry to say that the offender has not yet been discovered.—Leeds Mercury.

SUICIDE ON CROYDON COMMON.—On Monday morning an inquest was held at the Mail Coach, Croydon Common, before the Coroner for Surrey, on the body of a respectably dressed young man, apparently about twenty-five years of age. Jeremiah Bryant, a labourer, residing at Croydon, deposed, that on Friday morning, about four o'clock, he was at work mowing tares, in a field on Croydon Common, belonging to Mr. Henry Soames. During his performance of that work, he found the body of a man lying on his back in the field, which intercepted his operations. He was quite dead. His head was shattered to pieces. A percussion pistol, which had recently been discharged, was lying across his arm. His hat, which was blown to a considerable distance, was torn to pieces. Other evidence to the same effect was adduced. In the pocket of the deceased was found a book entitled, "Remarks on the Influence of Mental Cultivation and Mental Excitement upon Health," by Amariah Bregham, M.D. On the fly-leaf was written in pencil—"Having no watch, I cannot say what is the hour, but the sun appears to be down or below the horizon, and I hear the crows and other birds are busy and pleased, and all nature content and happy but me. Because of not knowing how to make a better use of my brain, I have come here to have it shattered. It rains, it is cold, or at least I feel so, and it is darkish." After some further evidence, the jury, without hesitation, returned a verdict, "That the deceased destroyed himself, but what state of mind he was in at the time there was no evidence to prove.

The approaching second centenary of the Church of Scotland in Ireland, is to be observed as a day of general prayer and thanksgiving, Friday, the 10th of June, 1643, the first Irish presbytery was held in Carrickfergus. The Rev. Dr. Cooke suggests that each of these bodies do hold a special meeting upon Friday, the 10th of June next, and that a collection or subscription be commenced for building churches in the principal towns in the south and west of the kingdom.—Limerick Chronicle.

CRICKET.—A cricket match was played in the College grounds on Saturday last, between the students of Eton and the officers of the 15th Foot, who were allowed to have Lord Drumlanrig and another first-rater on their side. The match excited a considerable degree of interest, and many of the nobility and gentry were present, including Lord Howe, Lord Carzon, the Hon. W. Ashley, Lord Braybrook, Colonel Beal, the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, and other masters of Eton, Lord Lennox, Lord G. Manners, several officers of the Royal Blues and 15th Foot, &c; the band of the 15th being in attendance. At the first innings, the score of the parties (59) was equal, but in the second inn ngs the Etonians proved victorious, with five wickets to go down. The bowling of Young and Marson, Eton side, were of the first order; and the batting of Horrocks and Lord Drumlanrig, and the bowling of Sir F. Baltarst on the other side, were equally scientific.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE.—On Monday evening the peaceful and romantic village of Ashover, about six miles from Chesterfield, became the scene of one of the most deplorable and heart-rending tragedies that ever occurred in this or perhaps any other country. Mr Richard Eaton, a gentleman in independent circumstances, about 60 years of age, in loading his gun in the house to go in pursuit of a mad-dog, accidentally shot his son, a youth about 16 or 17 years of age; and immediately after, in the frenzy of the moment, took a pistol and shot himself through the head, and fell dead upon the spot. The gun was loaded with slugs, and its contents first struck the young man's arm, and, after passing in an oblique direction and shattering the bone, entered his side. He instantly dropped, but he did not expire till about seven o'clock on Tuesday morning. On seeing his son fall, the father was seized with an agony of grief, and exclaimed, "My dear son! what shall I do! what shall I do! my dear, dear son!" He took a loaded pistol, rushed out into the garden, applied the muzzle just below his right ear and fired, when the bullet, after penetrating the head, passed out a little above the left ear, causing instantaneous death. Inquests were held on the bodies before Mr. Hutchinson, the Coroner for the Hundred of Scarsdale, and verdicts returned to the effect, that the son was accidentally shot, and that the father put an end to his own existence in a fit of frenzy consequent upon the previous accident. Mr Eaton was a gentleman very highly respected by an extensive circle of acquaintances, to whom his urbanity of manners and his known worth greatly endeared him. His melancholy end will be a subject of unfeigned regret to all who knew him. He has left a wife and daughter, who resided with him at Ashover, and a son who is in business in Nottingham. The younger son, who has lost his life as above described, was an apprentice with Mr. Hickin, the counsellor, in that town, and had returned home to spend a few weeks at home, in consequence of indisposition. What adds to the deplorable character of this sad catastrophe, is the circumstance that the elder son was to have been married on the following day, and the wedding party were to have visited Ashover in commencing their tour of pleasure, and preparations were made to receive them. Alas! how changed is the scene!

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.—A few days since a remarkable case of spontaneous combustion of a bed occurred in the family of C. D. Archibald, Esq., of Portland-place, Leamington, which, but for its timely discovery, might have led to very disastrous results. The alarm was given of a fire occurring in one of two bedsteads in a bed-room, one on which there were two beds, the one a palliasse and the other what was supposed to be a hair mattress. It was promptly extinguished by the application of water, when it was ascertained that a hole about eight inches in diameter had been burned completely through the floor, directly under the bed, and on examining the bedding, a corresponding circle of combustion was found both in the mattress and palliasse. The former turned out on examination, instead of hair, to have merely a thin superficial covering of this substance, the interior being made up, amongst other things, of roughly-broken flax, tow, and oakum, which substances only require the contact of oil or grease to ignite of themselves. This process, which goes on under ordinary states of the atmosphere, would unquestionably be promoted even by such elevated temperature as mere animal heat. It would appear that after having commenced in the tow or other contents at the under side of the mattress, it thence burned downwards through the palliasse, the straw and ignited materials setting fire to the floor, and thence to the curtains and hangings. Mr. Booth, lecturer on chemistry, who has paid much attention to this curious subject, and to whom these facts were thus related, thinks there is no question that this may be added to the authentic cases of spontaneous combustion; and as many such mattresses are undoubtedly in use, it should operate as a wholesome caution.

STRANGE DELUSION AND CRUELTY.—A woman named Barns, the wife of a labouring man, residing at New Pound Common, in the parish of Wanborough-green, having been ill for a long time, and unable to account for her lengthened indisposition, supposed, as did her neighbours also, that she was bewitched, and looking about them for the cause of the evil, their suspicions fell on a woman of about forty years of age, said to be a very decent, inoffensive creature. This idea had been entertained for a long time, and many schemes were put into operation to destroy her influence, but all had failed up to the latter end of last April, when, by some means, they became possessed with the notion that if they got some pigeons, and burned them alive, keeping every part of the room stopped up close, and not speaking while the operation was going on, they would effectually destroy the witch's power. In order to reduce this scheme to practice, they procured pigeons, and tied them in pairs, back to back, by their wings, and ignited a large fire, and stopped up the room as close as possible; some of the poor pigeons they opened at the breast, in order that the fire might burn their hearts while alive. How many were burned the writer cannot say, but he heard a neighbour state that he himself burned four, and he thought they should have destroyed the witch, if the house had been clear. It is supposed by the neighbours that from 20 to sixteen pigeons were destroyed in this cruel manner.—Sussex Express.

INTENSE THEFT OF BOOKS BY AN EDINBURGH M.D.—A few days ago two gentlemen—one from Glasgow and the other from Paisley—appeared at the Police Office, at Edinburgh, and stated that a variety of books, drawings, &c., had disappeared from their respective premises, and that they suspected a certain M.D. of their acquaintance, then residing in Edinburgh, of having stolen them. The police accordingly repaired to the lodging of the suspected party, and there found a number of the missing articles, besides others which have since been claimed as the property of persons in this city. Having learned also that the mother of the learned delinquent resided in Aberdeen, a letter was immediately forwarded to the superintendent of police in that quarter, requesting him to order her house to be searched. The result was the arrival on Tuesday night of two large boxes of books, supposed to have been stolen from houses and shops both in Edinburgh and Glasgow. The individual, who has hitherto moved in a most respectable sphere, is now in custody.—Scotsman.

THE BROWNS.—A circumstance of rather a novel character occurred last week at Stockton-on-Tees. It appears a jolly tar, named Thomas Brown, was pleased to take unto himself a wife, in the county of Kent, about two years ago. Since then, his vessel having made several voyages to Stockton, a report somehow or other reached the ears of his loving spouse and her father, that her "gude-man" had actually got married again, in the above-named town, to another wife, since the unsuspicious father, having every reason to believe the report to be true, immediately offered a reward for the apprehension of his apparently faithless son-in-law for the crime of bigamy. This week, however, application having been made to the vicar of Stockton for the marriage certificate of the supposed transgressor of the law, it turned out that the Thomas Brown married at Stockton is not the Thomas Brown married in Kent, the one being a sawyer, and the other a sailor, and the report alluded to had been circulated in Kent by some wags, "all to astonish the Browns." The Kentish fair one, no doubt, will be overjoyed to learn that the lord of her affections is still "true blue." Had it been otherwise she would have been "done brown" to a certainty.—Halifax Guardian.

The British merchants residing at Smyrna have recently addressed a letter to Lord Aberdeen, representing the expediency of a direct steam communication between Great Britain and the Levant. According to this memorial, the advantages, in the way of communication, possessed by Continental over British manufacturers in the Smyrna market are so great, that, in default of some alteration of the present system, there is danger of the British being driven out of competition altogether.

LONDON CHARITIES.

The wealth and extent of London, its innumerable buildings, and their teeming population, cannot fail to speak forcibly to the mind of every visitor, whether from the country or from foreign climes. Its charities and works of mercy, happily for the national character and its prosperity, are as boundless and as beneficial, though not perhaps so visible to the cursory glance, except on a few great occasions, like the one of which we now treat, when the sunlight of June streams on nearly six thousand children, brought together beneath one roof, from the various parishes of the Metropolis, to display a living monument of the gratuitous distribution of knowledge, and its consequent beneficial effects. The warm-hearted wish of George the Third, "that every child throughout his dominions should be able to read the Scriptures," has been so enthusiastically responded to by his people, that no reasonable excuse can now be offered by any class of the community for an inability to do so. "Ignorance," it has been well observed, "is not so much the mother of devotion as the parent of vice: many have sinned who knew no better: ignorant of the just distinctions between right and wrong, they have trusted to self-interest only, as the chief stimulus to their duty; it requires but a simple system of education to lead them to a better principle." Experience, from the examination of many instances, has likewise proved that, of those who suffer for their crimes, the far greater number have been unable to read; and though this instruction may not always have been found to operate as a certain security, it has been so successful in its influence, by leading the way to a knowledge of the Gospel, as to entitle its value to be estimated at one-third of the means of safety. Legislators have from the earliest periods been fully aware of this fact. and the benevolent mind of our sixth Edward, in 1552, incorporated Christ's Hospital for the reception, maintenance, and education of poor fatherless children. They are strikingly distinct from the ordinary school-boys of the capital, and look like the relics of a race that has long passed away. The belted gown, and mall, useless, and in reality never used, cap, have descended as an heir-loom from one generation of scholars to another, from the days of Edward to those of Victoria, modified a little, it is true, by the knee-breeches and shoe-buckles of George I.; but the general appearance of the boys preserving to us the ordinary dress of a lad of that early period, and also giving a fair idea of the generally adopted costume, the long girdled open gown, and "city flat cap," usually worn by merchants and tradesmen of the reign of Edward's sisters and successors, and which was the peculiar distinction between themselves and the more gaily decorated tenants of the courts—the wealthy and aristocratic. In Camden's time this school maintained six hundred orphan boys, and one thousand two hundred and forty poor on alms. One thousand poor children have been maintained at one time on this excellent foundation, of whom from one hundred and sixty to one hundred and eighty have been apprenticed every year to trades, and girls to service; but the numbers have fluctuated from various causes, as also have the rules and regulations in some degree—the limitation to orphans alone has ceased, though the greater number of the scholars have been deprived of one parent. But amid all minor changes of rules or of time, the institution still remains to attest the benevolent utility of its first foundation, and preserve to this and future ages the lasting good of well-directed charitably-given knowledge.

The great Sir Thomas Sutton, the munificent founder of the Charter-house, whose memory is worthy of all reverence, has left to London an institution no less magnificent. The boys of his school are perfectly collegiate in their appearance. They wear the cap and gown of the university, with the long hanging sleeve, never intended for use, but which adds considerably to the picturesque appearance of the wearer. By his will he directs that no children whose parents have any estate in lands to leave unto them, but only the children of poor men that want means to bring them up, are to be admitted.

We owe (among other benefits) to the Revolution of 1688, the extension of these ideas, and the formation of parish schools. At this time was instituted that of St. Botolph, Aldgate, the "fertile parent of a hundred more." The attempt of James the Second to darken the land by the re-introduction of the errors of Popery, and the indignant repulse offered by the whole country having at length succeeded in for ever incapacitating himself and family from its government, this school was founded for the gratuitous education of children in the Protestant faith, in order to secure the country from the dangers of any relapse into Popery. "These poor children," says Dr. White Kennet, writing at the period of the first formation of the school, "in walking in procession to church, do so strike on the eyes, and win on the hearts of all good people, that I doubt not but that the example will be followed in this metropolis; and that the fame thereof will reach to other parts of this kingdom, where the same plan will be adopted, and extended to remote places; and that some pious persons will, in their lives, or at their deaths, endow schools for poor children, or bestow sums to place them out in the world." Seldom has a benevolent wish been so triumphantly responded to, and carried out by a great nation. A characteristic feature of a British Sabbath in all our towns and villages is the procession to church of such schools, a quiet, but strongly indicative memento of much good done where much was to be done.

The costumes of the London charity schools vary considerably, though all have an air of antiquity, in some instances unnecessarily grotesque. The old "city flat cap," before alluded to, and so frequently mentioned by writers of the Elizabethan era, including Shakspere, graces, or rather disfigures, the heads of most charity school-boys; and has become as distinctive a badge of one of them, as it used to be of a citizen in the days of the virgin queen. Its unlucky resemblance to that comfortable adjunct to the tea-table—a muffin—has become proverbial; and is as "familiar in the mouth as household words," to all who have a taste for the ridiculous.

Added to the leather breeches, buckled at the knee, and the shoes, also buckled on the feet, we have the costume at once of the earlier part of the reign of George III., when these schools began to be extensively established, presented to us. The crimped-cap school-girl also exhibits the female costume of the same period, with its quaker-like stiffness of cut, and comfortable plainness of contour; the clean apron and tippet bespeaking the future neatness of the incipient servant of all work—the Pamela of modern life. In some instances, as in that of St. Botolph, a change has occurred; the more modern trouser of the boy, and the less rigid stiffness of the girl, bespeak a distant, a very distant, approach to modern taste, and argue the possibility of the dress of the children actually becoming in some degree fashionable, a century after it has ceased to be considered so. In the eye of the antiquary this may be very delightful, in the instance of the Christ Church costume it undoubtedly is; but with all due deference to what Mr. Bumble so proudly refers to as "the parochial authorities," we think a little improvement might be made in this matter, without the slightest danger of too much innovation or expense.

But England has successful competitors in this race of benevolence, to be found among the men who are united beneath the sway of her Sovereign. "The Ancient Britons," as they delight to designate themselves, have also a charity school, founded for the purpose of instructing, clothing, maintaining, and apprenticing poor children, descended of Welsh parents, born in and near London, who have no parochial settlement therein. It began to be established on the first of March, 1714, in honour of the birthday of her Royal Highness Caroline, then Princess of Wales, which happened to be the anniversary commemoration of the titular saint of the principality. It increased considerably in 1718, by the exertions of a few spirited Welsh gentlemen; and in 1772 the building in Gray's Inn-lane was commenced, which has since existed for the accommodation of the children. The dresses of these children are picturesque in their effect; the boy's cap has, in fact, a military look, not to be seen in any other school costume, and when ornamented by the leek it has an exceedingly smart appearance. His corduroy trousers, close-fitting jacket, and lay-down collar, give him an aspect little differing from the ordinary dress of a boy among the working classes. The girl, however, is much more distinct; she still exhibits the mittens and close plaited cap of sixty years ago, and which, at that time, royalty itself did not disdain to wear. West's portraits of the young princesses, daughters of George III., at Hampton Court, appear thus habited; and this may declare to us the original intention of the founders of these schools, to have been the comfort and decent appearance of these children among the members of the community, when they were first founded.

The Caledonian school-boy appears in the "Garb of old Gaul." The light Scottish cap of blue, bordered by the venerated plaid; the plaid jacket and tunic, or antique breacan; the naked leg, covered only by the plaid stocking and the buckled shoe, present to us a picture of national interest certainly unsurpassed by any in its pleasing effect, aided as it is by the hardy, shrewd, and intelligent looks of the little wearers.

The Irish boy and girl differ in nothing from many of the English school-boys, except in the colour of their clothes. While the prevailing colour with us is blue, theirs is universally green; and this allusion to the Emerald Isle is at once appropriate and tasteful.

We may add that the two last-named schools are the most odern of the national series.

The assembling of the charity children in St. Paul's is an event looked forward to by themselves and the inhabitants of the metropolis with much interest. On one occasion they were expressly assembled here by royal command; this was on the 23rd of April, 1789, the day of the general thanksgiving for the King's recovery. This has been beautifully delineated by Dayes. The King is represented attended by his Queen and family, passing up the nave to the centre of the building, surrounded by the vast array of children his own benevolent wishes had helped to foster and educate.

London certainly affords no more gratifying sight than on an occasion such as this, and it was one that impressed the late Prussian Monarch during his sojourn in this country, with the strongest emotion; a feeling that must be shared by every spectator.

Let us anticipate the scene: we stand beneath the vast dome of St. Paul's, the very focus of its architectural glories; around is ranged a vast amphitheatre of seats, occupied by thousands of children, all well clothed and educated by voluntary charity. They are taught self-respect, and respect for their superiors, and consequently command respect toward themselves Fancy them, for one moment, deprived of such advantages; ragged, dirty, and uneducated; thrown by the thousand (for we must count them by high numbers—they exist thus) upon London life, in its lowest form; in the vast social machine where each individual exists for good or for evil, the amount of mischief cannot be fully guessed at. See the difference. They meet beneath one roof to testify the beneficial effects of education and benevolence. They feel this as well as the spectators do. If that boy before us has not the finished grace of an opera singer, at least he sings as much from the heart as he could do. What a high salary does for one, a grateful soul does for the other. There is an honest, manly, old English roughness, that no man need feel ashamed of, in his simple earnestness, that is worth all the shakes and trills meant only to amuse. Look, too, at these girls, each so prim and neat; her cap and tippet starched and ironed, with her glossy apron uplifted before her mouth, in prayer. The effect of this combined movement afterwards, of thousands of sinking arms after those solemn moments, has been not inaptly, or unpoetically, compared to a fall of snow. Must not each girl feel honestly proud of her station in society, which, however humble, commands respect, by her propriety of manner and appearance, from the crowd of richer countrywomen who surround her. Can she feel herself a unit in so important an assembly of her fellow-scholars without a throb of gratitude at her position on this day? It is not in the heart of childhood to do so.

One more look before parting. A native American Indian, fond as he is of pantomimic gesticulation, might be not a little puzzled to comprehend the movements of the gentleman, who, baton in hand, is placed in a commanding situation against that pillar. He alternately raises his arm to the right, to the left, up and down, with various degrees of energy. He is the leader of the band, the mighty magician, who controls and modulates the army of voices that surround us; a chosen disciple of "St. Cecilia" herself; on the movements of his arm depend the correct intonation of each sound. At his bidding the chorus swells as if it would burst the stone walls that confine it, or anon sinks like the sea after a storm. No antique enchanter "witched the world" of spirits more potently than he, whose baton is now wielded over the realms of sound, discoursing, as it does, "most sweet music" by its every movement. He is the wizard of the nineteenth century, one of the few undestroyed by the march of intellect, who live, and move, and have their being amidst us, to soothe, by their magic art, the rougher cares of the toilsome world which we inhabit. [We purpose next week to insert an engraving of the interior of St. Paul's as it appears upon these occasions.]

FLORICULTURE.

THE AMARYLLIS.

The Amaryllis is noted not only as commemorative of a favourite nymph of Virgil, but as embellishing the wilds of Mexico and Southern Africa; it is moreover valued from the facility with which its bulbs can be transported from their native beds to our frames and hothouses.

There are of this genus nearly forty species, chiefly natives of the hotter parts of the isles and continents of America and Africa. One only is a native of Siberia; and one is found wild in North America, which is the A. formosissima: this latter species is, from the deep red colour of its ample flowers, one of the most conspicuous of the whole genus.

Much practical tact is necessary in the culture of the Amaryllis, to cause them to flower frequently and well. It has been found, that in the autumn they generally require to be turned out of their pots of soil, and laid on a dry shelf in a warm place, till they show their flower buds, when they must be immediately potted, and set where it is intended they should flower—that is, on the curb of a pit or other platform in the hothouse. In summer they may be flowered in frames or in the greenhouse.

The best soil for the generality of the Amaryllis family, is a mixture of a light sandy loam, to which might be added, one-fourth of white sand turfy peat. This should not be sifted, as sifted soil is apt to become close. Care should, moreover, be taken that the hole in the bottom of the pot does not get stopped, and prevent the escape of water.

The seeds of these bulbs ought to be sown directly they become ripe, and when the plants rise a few inches high, they should be planted singly in pots. If placed in a frame, they will then progress rapidly.—Florist's Journal.

Deaths by Eating Hemlock.—Two lamentable accidents occurred at the parish of Llanerlyl, Montgomeryshire. A poor woman of the name of Davies had occasion to leave her home on Monday, and during her absence her three children discovered some roots of water hemlock near the river side, of which they ate freely, and an old woman in passing by found two of the children very ill. Upon inquiring what was the matter, the eldest informed her what they had been eating. Information was immediately given in the village of what had occurred, and a messenger was despatched for a surgeon, who was quickly in attendance, but on his arrival he found two dead (one aged ten years, the other three years and a half), and the other in a hopeless state, but who, through prompt and judicious treatment, is recovering. Inquests were held on the bodies, and the jury returned their verdict—"That their deaths were caused by the eating of poisonous roots, commonly called water-hemlock."—Cambrian.

WHERE ARE THEY NOW?

Where are they now?—who used at morn to gambol
Like bounding roebucks in our sunny path;
Where are they now?—who shar'd our evening ramble,
And made the green wood vocal with their laugh;
Where are they now?—from earth's glad pathway riven,
We trust, in heaven!

Where are they now?—the early birds are singing
Their joyous melodies to earth and air;
While all around the song of hope is ringing,
Why come they not, with us the scene to share?
No! higher joys than ours to them are given,
We trust, in heaven!

Where are they now?—the spring's young charms are breaking,
To deck fair nature with their budding bloom;
All things from winter's cold embrace are waking;
All,—save the tenants of the dreary tomb!
Their spring shall dawn, and death's dark bonds be riv'n.
Trust we but in heaven!

Mrs. Cornwall Baron Wilson

ANECDOTE OF A CLERGYMAN.

When in the act of composing a sermon, he made use of the term "ostentatious man." Throwing down his pen, he wished to satisfy himself, ere he proceeded, as to whether a great portion of his congregation might comprehend the meaning of the said term, and he adopted the following method of proof. Ringing the bell, his footman appeared, and he was thus addressed by his master:—"what do you conceive to be implied by an ostentatious man?"—"An ostentatious man, sir," said Thomas; "why, sir, I should say a perfect gentleman."—"Very good," observed the vicar; send "Ellis (his coachman) here. Ellis," said the vicar, "what do you imagine an ostentatious man to be?"—"An ostentatious man, sir," replied Ellis; "why, I should say an ostentatious man means what we calls (saving your presence) a d—d jolly fellow." I need scarcely add, that the vicar substituted a less ambiguous word, the schoolmaster not having been at that time abroad.—Bentley's Miscellany.

MATRIMONY.

Some men think themselves very clever in tantalizing their wives—some, unpossessed of feeling themselves, may not understand how a vile word or stupid act can vex a keener soul; but it is meet they know and remember this—there is no greater crime than to take a woman from her father's earth, where she stood in blooming independence, to load her with the cares of a family, and then to trample on her hopes, proving that he is no better than those for whom she never cared by sighed—that he is no worthier than those who were forgotten in her dreams, and passed unheeded as she clung with fondness to his arm.

EDUCATION.

There are several ways of reforming men—by the laws of the civil magistrate, and by the preaching of ministers; but the most likely and hopely reformation of the world must begin with children. Wholesale laws and good sermons are but slow ways: the most compendious way is a good education: this may be an effectual prevention of evil, whereas all after-ways are but remedies.—Tillotson.

CONTENTMENT.

Contentment is a blessing not to be slighted. it goes before the one that possesses it, a very harbinger of peace; and, in this way, it may be likened to the Baptist in its ministry, for it makes the crooked parts in life straight, and its rough places plain. True! the wailing cry of the melancholy-loving poet ascends continually, echoing that there is nought of happiness in this, our nether world. Thanks be to God! she does abide here. Ours is a glorious world, fallen and sin-stained though it be: the declaration of the satisfied Creator, that all was "very good," is not effaced, though at times it be dimmed and indistinct. And to prove this we have only to refer to the brightness of the scenery of our globe, to her lovely glens and sunny mountains, her tinkling streamlets and her stupendous oceans. All, all these assure us that joy and peace are her proper tenants, and that is a perversion of feeling and an unhealthy fancy which would crown Melancholy, the uncertain queen, the imperious mistress of a world so bright and so beauteous!—Dublin University Magazine.

THE EVENING CLOUD.—BY PROFESSOR WILSON.

A cloud lay cradled near the setting sun:
A gleam of crimson tinged its braided snow.
Long had I watched the glory moving on
O'er the soft radiance of the lake below.
Tranquil its spirit seemed, and floated slow:
E'en in its very motion there was rest;
While every breath of eve that chanced to blow,
Wafted the traveller to the beauteous west.
Emblem, methought, of the departed soul,
To whose white robe the gleam of light is given;
And, by the breath of mercy, made to roll
Right onward to the golden gates of heaven,
Where to the eye of faith it peaceful lies,
And tells to man his glorious destinies.

A COMPLIMENT.

In a large party, Dr. Parr had been endeavouring to hammer an argument into the convictions of an auditor, who replied, when he ceased speaking, "I do not quite understand your object: but, as far as I comprehend it, I can only say, that my mind refuses to receive the impression you would give it."—"Why, then, sir," lisped the doctor, "I can only say, that your mind has the dullness of lead, without its malleability."

IN LUDO'S LAST SONG.

The last song he ever sung was in the kitchen of the Reindeer, at Worcester. He had attended the glee-club held at that house as usual, but declined singing, and left the room rather depressed in spirits, and accidentally in his way out strolled into the kitchen; where, recovering his spirits, and gathering the servants about him, he sang them, "Then farewell, my trim-built wherry," in his most brilliant style; scarcely had he finished it, however, when he lapsed into his previous gloom, quitted the house, and, not many days after, died.

SABBATH PROFANATION.

Oh! call it not profane to wander forth
On Sabbath-eve—to gaze, with gladden'd eye,
On all the beauties of the teeming earth,
The sea mysterious, and celestial sky.
Then sacred Meditation oft is nigh,
Prompting the heaven-ward hope—the holy thought
That leads to pray'r. Sometimes unwittingly
The careless Spirit is heart-worship taught,
And meek devotion comes, although unsought.

Sweet is the bird's song—lovely seems each flow'r
To toil-worn crowds who rove at Sabbath-eve;
Some note the vast economy and pow'r
Display'd in all God's works—these will not leave
Nature with hearts untaught. Nor should we grieve
If lovers rove in quiet privacy:
A pure affection can from vice retrieve—
For virtuous love is heav'd-born; and may be A joy perfected in eternity. Ta.t's Magazine.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

QUEEN'S BENCH.—Wednesday.

MANDAMUS.—BECKWITH v. THE TOWN COUNCIL OF NORWICH.

A rule for a mandamus had been granted by the court to compel the payment of an amount of compensation awarded by the Lords of the Treasury to the plaintiff, who was town-clerk of Norwich. He was, together with his office of town-clerk, employed in the capacity of solicitor to the charities, and visitor to lunatic-houses in the town of Norwich. In 1836 he was removed from the office, and he then sent in a claim to the Town Council for compensation, and they offered £365 a-year. The plaintiff was dissatisfied with this, and the case was heard before the Lords of the Treasury on appeal, and they decided that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation to the amount of £469 a-year.

The Solicitor-General, with whom was Mr. Watson, opposed the rule on the part of the Town Council. Although the plaintiff had been deprived of his office as town-clerk, the parties who had since been appointed trustees to the charities had employed the plaintiff, in his private capacity, as a solicitor, to conduct the legal business of the charities. He was not, therefore, entitled to compensation, inasmuch as he had sustained no actual loss, although he had been removed from his office.

The Attorney-General, in reply, contended that the rule should be made absolute, as the employment of the plaintiff, in his private capacity, as a solicitor, might determine at a day's notice. This was not a question as to whether compensation ought to be awarded, as that had been decided; the only question was one of amount. The fact of the plaintiff having been employed in the same office in his private capacity of solicitor, might be a consideration in awarding the amount of compensation; but their lordships had no reason to suppose that the consideration had not been entered into by the Lords of the Treasury, in awarding the sum of £469 a-year

Mr. F. Kelly appeared on the same side, and supported the rule.

Their lordships held that this case was precisely the same as the Bridgewater case. The question was altogether a matter of amount, and the Court had therefore no control over it; but it was entirely a matter for the consideration of the Lords of the Treasury.—Rule made absolute.

BAIL COURT.—Monday.

NEGRI v. THE DUKE OF NORMANDY.

Mr. Humphrey stated that the plaintiff in this case was Signor Benedic Negri, a professor of music, and the action was brought to recover between £300 and £400 for teaching the Duke's daughter music, for which he was to receive a guinea a lesson, and an additional half-guinea if he was to remain longer than an hour in attendance. It appeared that the plaintiff was recommended by a person called the Count de Labat, a friend and adherent of the family and fortunes of the Duke, as one capable of giving the best instruction. The lady had made great progress, and it was for the recovery of compensation for the services he performed for the defendant that the action was brought.

Tagerio Negri, son of the plaintiff, proved that the Count de Labat came to his father's residence in Regent-street in 1838, and engaged his father.

Mr. Casson, a surgeon-dentist residing in Percy-street, saw Signor Negri instructing the Duke's daughter at Camberwell, about half-a-dozen times in 1838, but had no conversation with his Royal Highness on the subject of the engagement of Negri.

A young and extremely graceful lady, who stated her name to be Amelia, Princess of Bourbon, was next examined by Mr. Millar:—

I am daughter of the Duke of Normandy; am acquainted with Signor Negri; he has been in the habit of giving me instructions in music for some time; he was brought to me by the Count de Labat; Signor Negri first instructed me in May, 1839. He was instructing me about two years and ten months. When I came to this country, I expressed a desire to my father to receive instructions in music, but he did not comply with my wish; he did not know that Signor Negri was attending me till a month after he came. Signor Negri presented himself as a friend to our house, and my father told him that he would be well rewarded when he obtained his rights.

Cross-examined by Mr. James:—

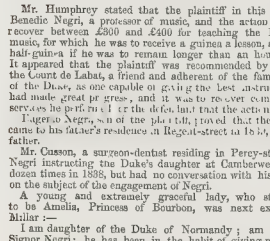
My father has seven children. The Count de Labat is about forty-five years of age. He is attached to my father and his cause. He expended a large fortune in my father's cause, and leave up a magistracy in France. Signor Negri, the plaintiff, said he was very poor; he solicited money from us at times. The Count de Labat was often present when he was instructing me; he lived in the house with us; he is our guardian.

Signor Vitali Albera resided in the Duke's house for a year and a half. Made a demand on him for Signor Negri. The Duke said, he did not owe anything, but, when he was in a position to pay, he would remunerate the plaintiff.

Mr. Humphrey, on the part of the plaintiff, here intimated that he could not carry the case any farther, so the plaintiff was nonsuited.

Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Millar appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. James for the defendant.

POLICE.



GUILDHALL.—A CASE FOR THE DENTIST.—On Monday William Halford, a fellowship-porter, attended before Mr. Alderman Thompson, to answer the complaint of Charles Howcroft, one of the turnkeys at the Giltspur-street Prison, for biting him. The turnkey stated that the prisoner was brought into the gaol, from Bolingegate-market, as a drunken and riotous person, by one of the officers of the Thames Police, and, for this offence, he was fined at the Mansion House next day; and when he was brought into the prison, witness attempted to search him, according to the rules of the prison. The prisoner, who was not so drunk as not to know what he was doing, threw himself down, clung fast to his right leg, and bit a piece out of the upper part of the calf. There was considerable inflammation on the following day, but, under the care of the prison surgeon, the wound was now healing. The prisoner was notorious at Billingsgate for biting when he was offended; he had severely bitten Childs, the ward-officer.—Mr. Alderman Thompson said, if the prisoner behaved like a mast ff, he must be treated as one and the prison surgeon must file or draw his teeth. The prisoner burst into tears on hearing this, and said, if the Alderman would forgive him this time, he would never be charged with such an offence again. Mr. Alderman Thompson said, he was afraid there would be no safety for the public, unless he ordered the doctor to draw his teeth. The prisoner cried louder than before, and protested he would never bite any one again. He was so drunk that he had no recollection of what had occurred, and was astonished when he awoke in the morning and found himself lying handcuffed in a cell. The Alderman said it was such an unmanly thing to bite an opponent, and he had done it so often, that there was a necessity for impressing on his mind that such conduct would be punished. The defendant, still weeping bitterly, begged for mercy, on the ground that he supported two young children of his brother-in-law, having no family of his own. Mr. Alderman Thompson asked the complainant if he chose to take some private compensation for the injury he had received? The complainant said he did not wish for any compensation for the pain he had suffered, but he should like to have reparation for the damage done to his trousers, which the defendant had torn and spoiled; for the harder complainant bit, the faster he held on with his teeth, and it required the aid of two men to beat him off. The defendant again cried for mercy, and was permitted to retire and make compensation, the Alderman warning him that he would never escape so easily again.

WORSHIP-STREET.—THE CHASE OF CRIME.—George Moss, alias Edwards, a man of sullen and dejected aspect, was charged with having attempted to enter the house of a gentleman named Stack, in Old-street-road, by means of skeleton keys.—Police constable N 145 stated, that he was on duty in Old-street-road at eleven o'clock on the preceding night, when he saw the prisoner standing at the front door of the house, in company with another man, whom he recognised as a convicted thief, and he resolved to watch their proceedings. The prisoner's companion, however, appeared to be equally observant of the movements of witness, for he made a signal to the prisoner, who slunk away from the door, and slipped something into his pocket. Witness went up and seized them both by the collar, but the prisoner's friend struck him a violent blow on the breast, which obliged him to relinquish his hold, and his assailant effected his escape. After a desperate struggle, he succeeded in securing the prisoner; and on searching him, found no less than nine skeleton keys in his possession. The only remark the prisoner made was, that if the witness were in his situation, he would do as he did.—Serjeant Halifax said that the prisoner had suffered eighteen months' imprisonment, as a convicted burglar, and he had done no work since his liberation. Prisoner. It is false. I have worked occasionally in the docks, and done my best to get regular employment, without success. How can I to get work when I am pointed out wherever I go as a convicted thief? You keep a man bad and then punish him for being so. The magistrate said that it was not the law, but the prisoner's own depravity, that kept him in such a degraded condition; for he had got that a strong, able bodied man like the prisoner would be able to get some sort of employment if he were so inclined. The policeman said that the prisoner expressed a wish to be transported. Prisoner: And so I do. I don't care where I go so that I get away from this d—d country, where I must either steal or starve. Mr. Broughton said, that if his wish was gratified, he would find that transportation was a much more serious thing than he appeared to anticipate. He was committed to the House of Correction for three calendar months.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—A ruffian, William Wheels, the conductor of one of Powell's Brentford omnibuses, was charged with assaulting a gentleman, of the name of Burrell, residing at 111, Long-acre. From the statement of the complainant, it appeared that he was frequently in the habit of going to Hammersmith, and had never paid more than sixpence for his fare. On Saturday evening he returned from Hammersmith by one of defendant's omnibuses, and, on its stopping in Oxventry-street, he heard an altercation between the defendant and a lady who had tendered him sixpence for her fare. Complainant got out, and also tendered sixpence. He said his was not a "sixpenny 'bus," and he should not take less than one shilling. He replied that he had never paid more than sixpence, and had paid that sum that day for going to Hammersmith. The defendant immediately called out to a person standing near, "Bill, you tackle the lady, and I'll have it out of him." He then violently assaulted him, and tried to throw him down; he was then given into custody. A gentleman, who was passing at the time, corroborated the complainant's evidence, and said, he never witnessed a more ruffianly assault.—Mr Maltby observed, in a very indignant tone, that a most deliberate assault was proved to have been committed. It was necessary to protect the public, and females in particular, against the ruffianly conduct of omnibus conductors. As a warning to others, he should inflict the highest penalty, viz., £5, or, in default of payment, two months' imprisonment.—The fine was instantly paid.

A REGULAR GAME CHICKEN.—Wednesday, at the Marlborough Police-office, the business of the court was somewhat varied by the apparition of a cab-driver with a bloody nose, who had, moreover, contrived to render his appearance as appalling as Banquo's ghost, by smearing the sanguinary stream over a considerable portion of his face. At the bar, the bravery fame of a well-known character, old Joe Arnold, the Piccadilly waterman, commonly called "Thirsty Joe," was conspicuously visible. Something had evidently occurred out of the common way to ruffle his temper; and he stood, rubbing his brass badge, to restore its damaged respectability, at the same time casting wrathful glances at the sore-befuddled complainant. Though the snow of three-and-seventy winters was displayed on the remnant of bristly hair that still stuck on his head, time had yet so little impaired "Old Joe's" enormous strength, that he was, even now, more than a match for any rough and refractory cabman, and quite as well able—at least, so he boasts—to renew the feats of his youth, namely, taking the conceit out of two of the biggest coachmen in London, and getting none the worst in a glove-fight with the unconquered "Game Chicken."—Mr Hardwick (to the cabman): Who has assaulted you?—Cabman: Vy, old Joe, the waterman.—Joe: Served you right.—Cabman: Yes I can to the Piccadilly rank, old Joe wouldn't vorter my cab.—Joe: Because you never hacts busyness right like a man. You never drops no penny, nor no ha'penny, nor no nuth.n'.—Officer: Silence.—Cabman: Ve gets into a bit of a hargument, and then Joe knocks me down.—A second cabman came forward as witness. He confirmed the story about the argument and the knock-down blow; and added, that, on going to help the other cabman, he was himself knocked down.—A third cabman gave the same testimony, and he, too, had fallen beneath the victorious arm of the waterman.—Mr. Hardwick: Well, what have you to say to this, Joe?—Joe: Say! vy that the whole lot is the three verry worst vot puts on my rank; and any nobleman or gentleman vot I've a respect for, never gets in their cabs without leaving their property with me, if I knows it. They owes me pounds and pounds, and they expects me to lend 'em my buckets, but I vont have that 'ere at no price.—Mr. Hardwick: But why did you strike this man?—Joe: Cos he called me a name not to be Englishman will stand.—Officer: What?—Joe: Vy, a vagabone.—The Alderman declared that the waterman had no ground to show sensitiveness at the term applied to him, for he had used the same epithet to them in the first instance; and that, at all times, the old waterman's vocabulary was more remarkable for energy than politeness.—Mr. Hardwick: You must pay 10s.—Old Joe turned rather glum at this decision, diving first into one pocket, and then another. Upon finding his numismatic researches perfectly unavailing, he slipped his hand under his apron, and, drawing forth his watch, whispered to a sympathising friend certain instructions, of which the only part audible was, "As on it as much as will river the fine, and pay for a drop of summut for our two selves." The mission of the friend was so effectual, that in five minutes old Joe was quenching his thirst at a favourite public-house.

BOW-STREET.—On Tuesday Nicholas Suisse, who has been several times remanded on charges of stealing property to an immense amount, belonging to his master, the late Marquis of Hertford, was again placed at the bar, before Mr. Jardine, and after some evidence had been adduced, the magistrate expressed his intention to commit him for trial, but finally consented to remand him for another week.

MARYLEBONE.—POLICE TYRANNY.—Mary Hartwell and Thomas Wade, adults, and Elizabeth White and John Lacey, children, were placed at the bar before Mr. Long, charged under the following circumstances:—Police constable, 165 D, stated, that on the same morning (Tuesday), at 20 minutes before nine o'clock, he saw the prisoners and five others together in High-street, and he took the prisoners into custody. Mr. Long—What were they doing? Witness—They were selling water-cresses, your Worship: they stop every person who goes past and we have had a great number of complaints. Mr. Long—Were their baskets on the ground? Witness—No sir; they were carrying them in front of their persons. Mr. Long—I don't see what harm they have done in merely asking people to buy cresses of them. What became of the other five? Witness—They got away, sir. Mr. Long—Were they obstructing foot passengers? Witness—They were on the pavement. The poor creatures in reply to the charge, said they were compelled to sell water-cresses for a subsistence, and they were not aware that they had done anything wrong. Mr. Long, addressing the prisoners, said, I discharge you now. You have as great a right to sell water-cresses as other people have to dispose of anything else; but you must not all get together so as to offer an impediment to foot passengers proceeding along the pavement. It was quite evident that the magistrate considered the charge to be one of a very trumpery and insignificant nature.

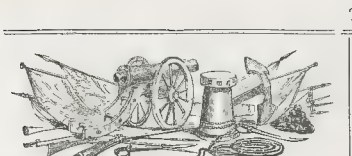
In the course of Wednesday, one of the partners of a firm in the Borough, accompanied by a young man, his clerk, attended at Union Hall, to give information of a robbery committed on the latter that day in the Borough. The applicant stated, that the clerk was sent to the Branch Bank of the London and Westminster Bank, near London-bridge, to get a £50 check cashed. Having received the money, namely, £40 in gold and the remainder in silver, he was proceeding homewards, when his attention was attracted near the Town-Hall, on seeing a man under the influence of the laughing gas. He (the clerk) stopped in the crowd to look on, and then proceeded home, where, on his arrival, to his dismay he discovered that the bag containing the forty sovereigns had been taken from his coat pocket, and the silver which he had in the other pocket remained untouched. The magistrate recommended the applicant to give information of the robbery at the station-houses; but as the money stolen consisted of gold, which could not be identified from any mark, it was improbable that its recovery would be effected. There was little doubt that the theft was committed at the time the clerk imprudently ventured into the crowd, to gaze at the buffoonery of a man, who was very likely connected with the thief. he circumstance of the robbery, however, showed the folly of persons stopping to look at sights with large sums of money in their pockets.

BIRMINGHAM.—The magistrates were engaged on Saturday morning investigating a charge against a man named Samuel Hines, which caused considerable interest. The room was quite full, and amongst those present were Mr. Joseph Sturge, some of the officers of the staff, and many of the Society of Friends. Sergeant Walter Cronen, of the 1st Royal Foot Guards, appeared to prefer the complaint, and stated that he was on duty in Smithfield the day before, beating up for recruits, when he was interrupted by a great crowd, who collected around him and the party. He saw the prisoner delivering a great quantity of bills among the people, who were using violent language. He heard the mob say, "To hell with the Queen;" "To hell with the Government;" "To hell with the soldiers." He applied to one of the head officers of police, to know what he should do, and was told that he must apprehend the prisoner, or any man who obstructed him in the exercise of his duty. He then proceeded through the fair, and the prisoner came close to him, delivering his bills, and he (witness) took one of them out of his hand, and found it was an advice to the people not to enlist. It was headed "Hints to the Army," and all tended against enlisting. When he saw the nature of the bill, and found his passage obstructed by the people, he took hold of the prisoner, and brought him to the ranks of his party, and then called a police officer, and gave him into custody. He could not swear that the prisoner was with the mob when he made use of the language against the Government and the soldiers. The prisoner did obstruct him, by causing a crowd to assemble around him. (He the sergeant) was not a police officer, but he considered that it was his bounden duty, as a soldier, to protect the Government; and, when he found the nature of the bills which were being delivered out, he thought he ought to take the prisoner up. Mr. Morgan, the prisoner's attorney, cross-examined the sergeant, who said he should not have interfered with the prisoner, had it not been for the bills he was delivering. He caused a great crowd to assemble about him, and the people obstructed him in his passage. Mr. Gem, the magistrate's clerk, said there was quite sufficient against the prisoner to warrant the magistrate in remanding him, until they could learn from the Crown what was to be done with him. They must take the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor-Generals upon the subject. Police-constable 173 then produced a large bundle of hand-bills, which he took out of the prisoner's apron. One of them was headed, "Rhymes for the Army; Blood, Battle, and Plunder." The second was the case of a poor woman, named Crassman, a soldier's wife, who applied, some time ago, for relief, to the magistrate of London, having been left in a state of great distress by her husband, who lately left this country for India. Mr. Gem said the prisoner could be admitted to bail to appear to answer any charge which might be preferred against him, on the receipt of the Government instructions. Mr. Morgan said Mr. Sturge would be bail for the prisoner's appearance. Mr. Joseph Sturge then rose, and entered into £20 surety for the prisoner's appearance. Hines was also bound in the same sum, and left the office.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—The eighth concert of ancient music took place on Wednesday night under the direction of the Duke of Wellington. Conductor, Mr. Bishop. Leader, Mr. F. Cramer. Organ, Mr. C. Lucas. His Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived about half-past nine, and remained during the first part. There were also present the Duchess of Gloucester, the Duke, Duchess, and Princess Augusta of Cambridge, the Duke of Wellington, the Archbishops of York and Armagh, and about 600 persons of rank and distinction.

ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.—The anniversary meeting of this Society was held on Monday, in Hanover-square, and was attended by Mr. H. Handley, president; the Duke of Richmond, Marquis of Downshire, Earls Spencer, Rosebery, March, and Ducie; Lords Worsley, Portman, and Camoys; Hons. Captain Spencer and G. C. Agar; Sirs Charles Morgan, H. Hoskyns, C. Lemon, M.P., John Johnstone, M.P., R. P. Joddrell, and General Sir W. Rooke; Messrs. Brunston, Childers, Estcourt, Sotheron, and Pendarves. M.P.'s of all shades, Hall, Vernon, Harcourt, and Scudamore; the Mayor of Oxford, and a large assemblage of the most distinguished agriculturists of the kingdom. The Earl of Hardwicke having been unanimously elected president for the ensuing year, and Mr. Colville, M.P., chairman of the Local Committee for the Annual Country Meeting of the Society, to be held at Derby, in 1843, the report of the council was read and adopted.

A STRIKE STRIKE.—The Hereford Journal states, that it is estimated that in the coal and iron districts, not less than from 10,000 to 14,000 operatives struck work on Saturday se'nnight. This includes workmen discharged by blowing out several blast furnaces; and it is gratifying to state that there has been no infraction of the public peace. At the Stourbridge iron-works, a machine has been invented for squeezing the cinder out of the puddled iron; consequently, there will be no further use at those works for the services of the men called shingles.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

MALTA, MAY 15.—SHIPS OF WAR IN PORT.—The Queen, 110, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E W. C. R. Owen; Ceylon, 61, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir John Louis; Impregnable, 104; Vanguard, 80; Calcutta, 78; Cambridge, 78; Phœnix, Devastation, and Vesuvius, war-steamers; and Alecto, Polyphemus, and Prometheus, steam-packets.

DISPOSITION OF THE REST OF THE FLEET.—The Howe, 120, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir F. Mason; Thunderer, 80, and Savage, 10, on their way to Tripoli in Barbary; the Rodney, 92, on her way to Alexandria and Beyrout; and the Cyclops, steam-frigate, at Beyrout. The Formidable, 84; Lizard, steam-tender; and Java, 16, at Gibraltar. The Monarch, 84, and the Vernon, 50, Medea, war-steamer, and Beacon and Magpie, surveying-vessels, on their way to the Pireus of Athens. The Belvidera, 38, at Cadiz. The Stromboli, war-steamer, and Locust, steam-tender, at Constantinople; and the Scout, 18, and Snake, 16, at Corfu.

Prince George of Cambridge, on taking his farewell of the 12th Lancers, in which he has served three years, entertained the entire regiment at dinner, including the women and children of the corps. His Royal Highness, in addition, gave half-a-sovereign to each colour-sergeant, five shillings to each non-commissioned officer, two shillings and sixpence to each female belonging to the regiment, and a quart of ale to every one of the men.

LIGHTNING.—On Tuesday evening se'night a paper on lightning conductors, in connexion with the accident at Brixton Church, was read at the meeting of the London Electrical Society. Its author, Mr. Walker, the secretary of the society, had made a survey of the damage done to the tower of Brixton Church, and found in it so practical an illustration of Dr. Faraday's opinion on the "lateral discharge," as to induce him to investigate the subject more closely. It seems that no arrangement of metals could have been better adapted than that met with in this steeple to invite a flash of lightning to do mischief. There was a regular series of stepping-stones as it were—first, an insulated metallic cross, then 20 feet of stone-work; in passing this interval the roof of the lantern was shattered. Then came 20 or 30 feet of conductor, in the form of the clock wire and a water-pipe; and then a break of 12 feet. Here, again, was an explosion, and an immense mass of masonry was shattered away from the base of a column intervening between the termination of the water-pipe and the commencement of the next series of conductors. Within the belfry "a lateral discharge" took place; the fluid passed from one conductor to a vicinal one, for no other reason than to obtain a wider path. The author showed that electricity not only chooses a short but also a wider path; and that the "lateral spark" arises from the latter property. He then explained that it is not enough to have a continuous or an insulated lightning rod, but that it is most important to have it far away from other metallic bodies; for however capacious the rod may be, and however adapted to convey, not only what passes down it, but ten thousand times more, yet, if another conductor is near, a flash will pass between the two, and ignition of neighbouring combustibles will be the result. Fortunately, in the case in question, only a small part of the whole fluid passed within the tower, consequently the lateral explosion was not severe. As it is not always possible to place lightning rods entirely out of the neighbourhood of other conductors, Mr. Walker showed that the possibility of the fluids between them should then be converted into a certainty, by making metallic communication between them, and thus tracing out a path along which the fluid might pass without the development of light and heat. He spoke of the peculiar property of the points of leaves, twigs, &c., in drawing off quietly charges of electricity, and stated his conviction that tall trees would always be found valuable, if not in entirely averting, at least in greatly mitigating the force of a lightning shock. The theoretical opinions given in this communication were based upon the experiments of the Royal Institution, the object of the author being to show how closely they were illustrated on the grand scale of nature, and to direct the attention of the public generally to a closer study of the properties of lightning-rods, a subject on which, perhaps, more than on any other practical point, greater ignorance prevails than can be well conceived.

POOR-LAW SURGEONS.—The Poor-law Commissioners have issued new orders for the regulation of medical officers of unions: amongst the most important, it is the wish of the Commissioners that the competition of the candidates for offices should turn upon their respective character and skill, and not upon the sum at which they may be severally willing to undertake the office; the guardians are required to fix the remuneration, to be approved by the Commissioners, previously to advertising for tenders.

EXTRAORDINARY GOOD FORTUNE.—Edward Hibbert, a porter in the employ of Messrs. Bramah, Prestage, and Ball, 124, Piccadilly, has been discovered to be heir-at-law to property situated in Isleworth, Whitton, Fleet-street, and Devonshire, to the value of £1,200,000.

MALICIOUS ACT AT A PIGEON-MATCH.—An extraordinary occurrence took place at a pigeon shooting-match, at Peake's Meadow, Fenton, on Monday afternoon last. Between four and five hundred persons were assembled, when suddenly a man named Edward Brinsley, a potter, took a deliberate aim with his gun, and fired into a crowd of persons who were standing at the back of the spot occupied by the pigeon-shooters. The man was about fifty or sixty yards distant from those at whom he fired. Sergeant Pike happened to be present, and he states that although the man was "fresh," he must have known what he was doing. There was no bird loose at the time. About a dozen men and boys were wounded in the head and breast; but we are happy to hear that no serious effects are at present apparent. A warrant has been issued for Brinsley's apprehension, he having escaped from Pike's custody immediately after the occurrence.—Staffordshire Advertiser.

The police and military Lancers were called out on Monday to prevent disorder, which was expected to arise from sundry unemployed tradesmen, who paraded the streets, and were said to threaten mischief in some quarter or other. The day, however, passed off without further disturbance.

ST. MAWES.—On Wednesday last that section of the village which constituted the late borough was put under the hammer by Messrs. Francis Fuller and Co., at Pearce's Hotel in Truro. Several cheap lots were sold, but some were reserved, the value fixed by the vendor being considered too unreasonable. The Quay, which is in a very dilapidated state, and a few adjoining houses, were purchased by Sir Samuel Spry, which furnishes the pleasing expectation that this useful pile will be speedily restored to its pristine efficacy, and, under the knight's agency, be proof against a recurrence of such a disaster as lately befel it. Several of the late burgesses, who had been in the enjoyment of their houses for many years past, at nominal rents, were ousted by this auction; but to the credit of the Duke of Buckingham, it must be recorded, that, previous to the sale, he tendered them all a reasonable pecuniary compensation for their removal, and has thus taken his leave of them very honourably. This obscure village, which has so long retained the elective franchise, and which had been cherished as a hallowed spot by the patrons and their happy tenants since the days of Elizabeth, and which could boast of the balmy smiles of the Trefusians, the Clares, the Nugents, the Boscawens, the Grenvilles, and the Hares; the Plantagenet, has at length been shorn of the semblance of its previous honours, and has its wonted charms and emoluments are scattered to the wind.—Falmouth Packet.

A SPRING CAROL.

The Spring's free sunshine falleth
Like balm upon the heart;
And care and fear, dull shadows!
Are hastening to depart.
Oh! time of resurrection
From sadness into bliss;
From death, decay, and silence,
To loveliness like this.
Oh! season of rejoicing,
That fills my heart and brain
With visions such as never,
Methought, should come again.
Oh! blessed time, renewing
The light that chi dhood wore;
Thi thought, and hope, and feeling,
Grow earnest as of yore!

Though youth has faded from me,
Perchance before its time,
Like a flower, pale and blighted.
Amidst its gayest prime;
Though now I value lightly
The noisy joys of life,
And deem its vain ambition
A mad and useless strife,
Thank God! the fount of feeling
Hath kept, exhaustless springs,
And the love once poured so freely
On frail and worldly things,
Is now more freely given
To the blossoms of the sod,
So the trees, whose leafy branches
Are whispering of God.

The young green lime bends o'er me,
Through its boughs the sunbeams pass,
Making here and there bright islands
'Mid the shadows on the grass.
The butterfly is wending
Its way from flower to flower,
Like a free and happy spirit—
Meet emblem of such hour!
Loud sings the hidden cuckoo
In his bow'r of leaves all day,
And many a voice of gladness
Is answering his lay.
The rose is opening slowly,
The lilac's scented cones
Are musical 'til nightfall,
With the wild-bees' drowsy tones.

The oaks, moss-grown and aged,
How beautiful they seem;
With glory wraps about them,
Like the glory of a dream!
How low ugly the sunshine
Clings round the tufts of green:
And all is fair and joyful
As if winter had not been!
Far off, the furze is blooming,
With spaces far and near,
Or lawn, where snow age straying
Large herds of graceful deer;
And turfy pathways wending
Through sunshine and through shade,
And wooded hills enfolding
This lovely forest glade.

In this season of life's triumph
Man's spirit hath a share,
It can see the grave unceasing,
Yet feel all ends not there.
It smiles to see the conquest
Of beauty o'er decay,
With the merry lark up-soaring
It greets the dawning day.
Not vainly by such gladness
The poet's heart is stirred,
These sights and sounds not vainly
By him are seen and heard.
All tears that crowded o'er him,
Like clouds asunder roll,
Spring's hope and joyful promise
Sink deep into his soul.

PRESENTATION OF PLATE.—The committee of officers of the medical department of the army, appointed for the purpose of expressing to Mr. Guthrie their sense of the kindness and liberality with which he had placed his lectures and hospital instructions at their service for many years, delivered to him on Tuesday, the 15th of May, a service of plate.

The colossal statue of George III., situated at the end of the Long Walk, upon the summit of Snow-hill, in the Great Park at Windsor, and erected in 1831, is now undergoing a thorough and extensive cleansing and repair, under the superintendence of Sir Richard Westmacott, by whom it was executed by the command of the late George IV., and elevated at the commencement of the succeeding sovereign's reign. From its extremely exposed situation, it is subjected to the effects of all weathers, the repairs it requires are considerable. As soon as these are finished the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have determined that it shall be restored. An extensive scaffolding is now erected around the statue (considered to be one of the finest works of art in the neighbourhood), and several men are engaged to complete the works, under the orders of Sir Richard Westmacott.

THE MARKETS.

FRIDAY, MAY 21.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of all kinds of grain this week were moderate. Wheat was firm at Monday's prices. In other grain no variation, excepting in good oats, which were rather dearer. Flour remains as last reported.

SMITHFIELD.—The supply of cattle was but moderate, with a dull demand, prices 2d per stone lower; in sheep and lambs a small reduction was submitted to; of calves the supply was plentiful, with a middling demand; for pigs the demand was heavy, with full 2d per stone lower.

TEA.—The public sales went off with much heaviness, and the prices accepted were rather lower. Common Congou, 1s. 7d.; Company's, 1s. 8¾d.

TALLOW.—There were few buyers of Tallow, but prices firm. P. A. candle, 48s. 3d. on the spot, and 48s. for delivery.

DEATHS.

On the 4th of April, at Charlotte Town, Prince Edward's Island, Louisa Margaret, wife of the Rev. Frederick Betts, M.A., and fourth daughter of the late Rev. Francis Baker, rector of Wyrne, Wilts.
On What Sunday, at Worthing, Jeremiah Gladman Cloves, Esq., M.D., Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. He had been at the sufferer for more than twenty years; but no suffering seemed capable of repressing the energies of his cultivated mind or the benevolence of his heart. Supported by a high sense of religion and great mental activity, which never forsook him to the last, his chief pleasure, during his short intervals of ease, was to promote the happiness of his friends and to alleviate the sufferings of the poor. His loss will be long and deeply felt.
On Monday night, the 17th inst., at Alton, Hants, after a prolonged illness, attended with unmitigated suffering of more than seven years' duration, Henry Rowland Hartley, Esq., in the 76th year of his age.
On the 1st inst., at Farnborough, Charles C. Saxon, aged 33, eldest surviving son of the late Colonel George Saxon, of the Madras Artillery.
On Thursday, Surrey, on the 22nd inst., aged 44, John Barfield Tredgold, Esq., the late Secretary of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. His long and stable efforts in the anti-slavery cause, combined with the Christian excellence which distinguished his personal character, renders him, while living, an object of affectionate esteem to the numerous friends of the African race, and will now secure for his memory their deep and lasting veneration.
At St. Petersburgh, on the 3 d inst., the celebrated and excellent Sir Robert Kerr Porter, of apoplexy. Sir Robert was paternally descended from Sir William Porter, who was distinguished at Agincourt. He was in his 62nd year, and married, 1811, daughter of Prince Troubetzkoi, of Russia. His distinguished consul both in the diplomatic and military service of the state, and received the order of St. Joachim of Wurtemburg in 1807, and that of the Lion and Sun of Persia, in 1815. He was also chamberlain of Venezuela, and brother of the Misses Porter, the celebrated novelists.
On Thursday week, at Bray-head, near the family residence, Master John Pennefather, the eldest son of the Lord Chief Justice. The unfortunate young gentleman, who was approaching his 17th year, off his father's residence about a quarter of a mile each, accompanied by a younger brother, in order to enjoy the pleasure of a morning walk, and when on Bray-head he had was blown off by a gust of wind which suddenly sprung up from the land. While in the act of saying where it was blown to, and approaching for that purpose too near the precipice, it is supposed that either his foot slipped or his head became giddy, and he was precipitated down the fearful abyss, and killed on the spot. On being taken up, a wound was found on the left side of the forehead, which it is supposed the blow on the head. He must have been instantly killed. His remains, followed by a numerous concourse of friends, were interred on the 19th. He was attended on the bier. An inquest was held, and a verdict of Accidental death returned by the jury.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,

AND THE LARGE ENGRAVING OF LONDON IN 1842.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have the gratification of acknowledging our obligations to the leading London Journals for the very handsome and flattering manner in which they had thought proper to notice the exertions of the Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and we have also a similar duty to discharge towards our brethren of the provincial press and sister kingdom, from whom we have received an unanimous verdict of approval, couched in such terms that it really looks like egotism to quote their opinions. The sin of vanity, however, is much less heinous than that of ingratitude, and in this dilemma we cannot hesitate on which horn to impale ourselves. From all parts of the civilised globe, and from all parties, whatever their political shade or colour, have we received those flattering testimonials to our merits (which can only serve to stimulate us to future exertions); but our space precludes the possibility of quoting more than the few following, which may be taken as fairly indicative of the general tone with which our labours have been hailed:—

(From the Times, of Tuesday, Jan. 10.)

LONDON IN 1842.—A splendid print under this title has been published by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, representing a bird's-eye view of the great metropolis, from the summit of the Duke of York's Column. The pictorial effect is really very fine; the perspective is well managed; the accuracy with which individual objects of interest are presented in it is admirable as the beauty and the boldness of the general picture: while the nicety of execution, along with the softened blending of lights and shades, reflects high honour on the artist, and shows the extent to which wood-engraving has been perfected in this country. There could not be a more appropriate and acceptable present (in so portable a form) for country friends; and we can imagine no interest with which the "young ones," to whom London is "but as a dream," would gaze upon this fine picture of its glories.

(From the Morning Post, of Thursday, Jan. 12.)

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The proprietors of this ably-conducted paper have just presented to their subscribers a tableau monstre view of the west-end of London and the parts adjacent, which for neatness of finish and beauty surpasses anything of this kind that we ever inspected. It is said that M. Claudet, with his apparatus, perched himself, like Asmodeus, upon the top of the Duke of York's Column, for the purpose of taking the view. What could not the artist, he has given an accurate representation of London as it is at the present moment, and all the steeples, including the scaffolding round the Nelson Monument, are handed down to posterity with wonderful precision; and in addition to the usual mass of valuable information and the beautiful illustrations which adorn this journal, a compendious index is appended, which will render the volume when bound up invaluable as a book of reference for the events of the past year. The first volume is now published entire, and we most cordially congratulate the proprietors on the unprecedented success with which their endeavours to improve the public taste and morals have been attended. The extraordinary increase in their circulation must also necessarily tend to depreciate that portion of the infamous trashy prints which have long been a disgrace to the weekly press of this country, and which we hope to see superseded by the healthful influence of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

(From the Morning Herald, of Wednesday, Jan. 11.)

It is with much satisfaction that we have observed the rapid progress which has been made in general estimation within the last few months by this publication of an entirely novel and decidedly meritorious character. This publication is the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, a weekly newspaper, which not only bids fair altogether to supersede many of its less worthy rivals, but has already made considerable progress towards effecting that desirable object. The weekly prints to which we allude have long enjoyed a factitious reputation, founded ostensibly upon their assuming to address themselves more particularly to the wants and wishes of the people at large, but, in reality, working for the abasement of all moral feeling, subverting all religious principle, and widely extending opinions of the most disloyal and pernicious character. These publications had unhappily absorbed a large number of that class of readers who have only the opportunity of seeing a newspaper once a week, and to their evil influence may be attributed much of the discontent which has done to much mischief during the late distress among the working people.

The scope and tendency of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are entirely the reverse of that which we have condemned; its purpose is to improve at the same time both the mind and the taste of the people: to elevate the moral tone of the weekly newspaper readers, and combine amusement with instruction. This end has been fully attained by the judicious management of those who conduct the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. It presents at once an epitome of all the intelligence which the labours of the daily press have accumulated, and adds to that information original articles of abiding merit, communicating the most important or interesting topics of the day—the whole illustrated in the fullest and most satisfactory manner by the choicest artists. The first volume of this work now lies before us, richly embellished with the most attractive engravings, and replete with the most compendious information. Its cheapness would excite our wonder at the possibility of giving so much for so small a sum (the price being only sixpence), were we not assured, from good authority, that its circulation already nearly equals that of the most prominent among the Sunday papers. This is a natural result; for the attraction being as much for the eye as the understanding, the weekly reader is inevitably led towards that which gives him pleasure to look at as well as to read. It is not to be inferred that the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS has created a new class of readers—such a result is only the work of much time; but it has done even better, it has drawn within its vortex numbers of those who formerly read the only publications accessible to them, which added nothing to their information but a knowledge of vice or infidelity. At the same time, we are gratified to learn that the list of subscribers comprehends a large number of the well-informed and highly-educated.

The most recent achievement of the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS is the publication, in one enormous sheet, of a superb view of the metropolis, taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, combined to form two pictures—one a north and the other a south view of London, the point from whence they are taken being the summit of the Duke of York's Column. These views are admirably executed; every object of interest and every minute feature of the great city are at once discovered. To publish a plate like this was a great undertaking, but it has been as successfully accomplished as it was boldly conceived.

To insure the complete success of the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS, it has only to continue steadily in the career which it has so well begun.

(From the Morning Advertiser.)

LONDON IN 1842.—This is the title of a new and magnificent plate which has been presented by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to their subscribers on the occasion of the new year. It is certainly the most extraordinary example of pictorial illustration which has ever yet been offered to the public, and giving convincing proof of the capabilities of the Daguerreotype process, applied on a large scale, and through the medium of a wood-engraving. The extent of the prospect, comprising the whole length and breadth of the imperial City, from two points of view, the breadth of the masses into which the artist throws his subject, the richness of the groups, the skilful contrasts of light and shade, all combine to make this the most delightful "Picture of London" which has ever been produced. It is, in short, the sole means by which foreigners and country readers can form to themselves any idea of the grandeur of the British metropolis, which, we may be pardoned for reminding our readers at this holiday season, is known to be paved with gold. The present number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS is accompanied by a supplement of equal size. Both are replete with interesting letter-press, illustrated by wood-cuts of various excellence, and such as must present a rich banquet to the lovers of the pictorial art, the taste for which we rejoice to remark daily acquires greater strength and extension throughout the country.

(From the Globe.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is unique in its character and design. The proprietors select the most interesting subjects connected with the passing events of the day, and supply a series of beautifully executed wood engravings, accompanied by letter-press descriptions, to illustrate and perpetuate their occurrence. In addition to the enterprise which marks the progress of this weekly publication, its proprietors have shown their sense of the patronage their undertaking has obtained from the public, by presenting their regular sub-cribers with a colossal engraving from a steel plate, the size of a sheet of this journal, which have cost a very considerable sum: the value of each impression, on a mode ate estimate, must go far to equal the sum of the entire cost of the journal from the publication of its first number. We draw attention to the journal as meriting unqualified approval, and invite an inspection of the engraving, which is exhibited in the window of the office, in justification of the terms of praise in which we have felt impelled to speak of it.

(From the Hereford Journal.)

The enterprise of the British press in procuring information is admitted on all hands, but it was reserved for the LONDON NEWS to go far beyond all its compeers in pictorial embellishment. "London in 1842," a view taken from the summit of the Duke of York's Column, is not merely remarkable for its gigantic dimensions, but for the correctness and delicacy of its details. It is worthy of a more elegant frame, and a place in the library or sitting-room. Besides this engraving, Nos. 35 and 36, with the Supplement, are adorned with an almost endless variety of superior embellishments.

(From the Derby Mercury.)

In an age like the present, remarkable for the abundant resources to which the intellectual and inquiring mind may have recourse for increasing knowledge and information, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS must be acknowledged to be without a rival. Valuable as an historical record of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria's visit to Scotland, and a faithful delineation of the times in which we live, it abounds no less with spirit-stirring anecdote and affecting incident of every-day occurrence. The magnificence of its pictorial embellishments, alone, cannot but create the most pleasing interest in its favour in the general sentiments and opinions of its readers. We particularly recommend the volume for the past year, if appropriately bound, as admirably adapted for a Christmas present to the young of both sexes, certain that they will be delighted with its pictorial, while, at the same time, it will form a useful and attractive addition to their libraries, and prove an entertaining companion in a lady's boudoir, or drawing-room.

(From the Liverpool Courier.)

Decidedly the most spirited literary effort of the day is the getting up of the above periodical, the plan of which is as novel as the execution is beautiful. The design, indeed, is one which would scarcely fail to be successful, combining, as it does, information on the passing topics of the day, with pictorial representations, and thereby appealing to the eye of the strongest of the popular appetites, curiosity and the love of amusement. The only marvel is, how it can answer the purposes of the publishers, seeing the enormous expense they must be at, for a continued weekly succession of new cuts. By a most extended circulation alone can they possibly be remunerated; and we cannot doubt but in this they will not be disappointed. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is honourably distinguished from many of the popular periodicals of the metropolis, and may be safely admitted into any family, being not less unexceptionable in its tone than it is attractive in its aspect.

(From the Wilts and Gloucestershire Standard.)

We have been favoured with a copy of London, presented by the spirited proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to their subscribers. This artistical production is really of a first-rate character, and gives a convincing proof of the adaptibility of the Daguerreotype process applied on a large scale, and through the medium of a wood engraving.

(From the Western Luminary.)

VIEW OF LONDON.—The publication much gratified with the slight of a new view of London, recently published by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. It was taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, which form two pictures—one a north, and the other a south view of London, the point from whence they are taken being the summit of the Duke of York's Column. These views are admirably executed; every object of interest and every minute feature of the great city are at once discovered. As a work of art, this picture deserves to be most favorably spoken of, and the proprietors of the LONDON NEWS are entitled to great credit for their liberality and spirit in bringing it out. Of that paper itself we are glad of an opportunity of saying a word in commendation. Its illustrations are executed with great skill, and its epitome of the news of the week is very full and correct.

(From the Liverpool Chronicle.)

We suppose the paper appellated the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is now known to everybody, and purchased by almost everybody; if not, we would advise a commencement at once, for everybody ought to be in possession of so rich a fund of art as it embodies. Unlike the generality of illustrated works, the subjects get better and better, both as regards finish and design. The view of London, given with the final number for 1842, are beautifully and correctly engraved, and are of themselves prodigies of art. We wish the proprietors of this spirited paper all the success they deserve, and feel assured that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will outwing and outlast all the cyhemera of the day.

(From the Liverpool Albion.)

We believe that all our readers have either seen or heard of this paper, which has recently been making such creditable efforts to gain public favour, that it has become popular throughout the three kingdoms, and we have even read its praises in the journals of the West Indies and North America. All who have seen the numerous illustrations published in each number must be aware of their great excellence. The artists employed must be individuals of high ability, for the freedom, grace, and truth displayed, are indications not only of long practice, but of great genius. In addition to the lavish embellishments given in each number, the proprietors have recently presented their subscribers with two superb views of "The Great Metropolis of England," which ought to be preserved with extreme care, as they are certainly extraordinary specimens of art.

(From the Bristol Gazette.)

It is really, in this age of puffery and pretension, quite refreshing to be able to speak sincerely in terms of praise of any new publication, and we are able to do so most unqualifiedly of the above. The whole is unique in its conception, design, and execution; bringing the aid of the pencil to the description of the pen; and thus giving, in an elegant, cheap, and compendious shape, the "very form and pressure" of the times we live in, but those of by-gone days. With the first number of the present year, the proprietors have presented to the subscribers a splendid engraving of "London in 1842;" a picture which, whether we regard the extent of the design, or the beauty of the execution, stands, we think, quite unrivalled in its kind.

(From the Waterford Mirror.)

We have received the number containing the Colosseum Print of London, 6—4 feet large, beautifully executed, and certainly one of the greatest wonders ever produced in printing

(From the Tipperary Constitution.)

LONDON IN 1842.—We have been favoured with two very splendid views of London, by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. We have shown them to several persons, who are intimately acquainted with the Great Metropolis, and they are unanimously pronounced them to be most faithful and accurate. Indeed, we must say, that we were not a little surprised when we opened those very beautiful and ornamented prints.

(From the Kilkenny Moderator.)

The last number of this very cheap, interesting, and ably-conducted publication contains the promised print of the "New View of London," which represents the Great Metropolis from the summit of the Duke of York's Column. The print, which is given on an enormous sheet, is really magnificent. The views appear to be admirably executed, and the various objects of interest are fully developed. The last number is also accompanied by a large Supplement, both containing a variety of interesting letter-press, and a great variety of beautifully executed wood-engravings, illustrative of the different subjects treated of. In fine, we consider the ILLUSTRATED NEWS one of the best and cheapest publications of its kind.

(From the Ulster Times.)

LITERATURE AND FINE ARTS.—Some months since, a weekly newspaper was established in London, called the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, which presented, or, rather, at its commencement promised to present, the rare attraction of combining pictorial illustrations of public events and of the scenes of their occurrence. We have not seen anything but samples of its success when looking over the prospectus, and still less so when we obtained the first number, as the literary matter was excellent, well selected, and well arranged, and the illustrations equally meritorious. We could not even conceive how the proprietor would contrive to remunerate himself for the immense outlay of capital which was evidently required to support weekly the talent which the first number displayed. In fact, we considered that it was merely a gauntlet thrown out to catch a whale, and that each succeeding publication would be inferior to its predecessor, until eventually it would die a natural death. From a feeling of curiosity, we confess, we purchased the paper, and we were not less pleased as astonished to observe, that, instead of diminishing, it was weekly increasing in beauty and strength. Every subject of popular interest for the time we found illustrated in a manner which reflected credit to every one of the numerous class; and not those alone, but foreign scenery, metropolitan churches, public characters, Nooks and Corners of Old England, came from the hands of the artist with surprising accuracy and delicacy of finish. The publisher, however, although his readers were getting treble value for their money, considered that, at the close of the year, he would treat them to a bonne bouche, surpassing anything they had previously received at his hands, and accordingly, with an enterprise seldom, if ever, equalled by a weekly paper, he engaged M. Claudet with his Daguerreotype apparatus, perched him on the top of the Duke of York's Column, and, from that view there taken, produced the most accurate, and decidedly one of the most admirably-executed pictures of London we have ever seen. In the Times, Herald, and Post, we observe this achievement noticed in terms of the highest eulogy; but were those notices even more favourable than they are, they would not have exceeded the truth. We feel gratified in having it in our power to recommend this agreeable and unique newspaper to public attention, as well on account of its literature as of the high style of execution of its illustrations.

(From the Somerset County Gazette.)

NEW VIEW OF LONDON.—We have received a copy of the last number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, published by the proprietors of considerable ability, embellished with a variety of woodcuts, accompanied with an engraving on an enormous sheet, representing London as it at present exists. The engraving is cleverly executed, every object of interest is most distinctly defined, and the most remarkable features of the Modern Babylon are at once recognised.

(From the Drogheda Argus.)

LONDON IN 1842.—We took occasion, early in the past year, to notice a weekly paper then newly published, under the title of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. Since then, this periodical has been progressing in public favour, and very deservedly so. The tendency of the "News" is to improve at the same time the mind and the taste of the people, which object it seeks to do by well-written original articles, and by beautiful engravings illustrating all the interesting occurrences of the day. We notice it now chiefly on account of a magnificent plate presented to its subscribers in the opening of the new year. It is a tableau monstre of London, in two parts, a north and south view, taken by the Daguerreotype from the south summit of the York Column. The picture must be correct, since it was delineated by the glorious Sun himself. All the prominent features of London can be at once recognised by any one who knows that city, and, for those who do not, the "Illustrated News" contains an index. To give some idea of the difficulty of preparing this enormous print, which is four feet six inches by three feet, we may mention that the Daguerreotype impression was first taken upon small plates of silver from the sun's rays; then copied, and the deficiences filled in from nature; then engraved upon wood; to effect which, a perfect plane was formed of a number of small blocks of four or five inches square. This plane had to be formed without line, speck, or flaw. The drawing upon the wood was the next step, and this was followed by the engraving. To effect this, eighteen artists were employed for two months, night and day, at the different departments. It was finally stereotyped, to guard against accidents of the press, and finally launched to the public. To subscribers of six months previous, the plate is given gratis; to others, it is sold for a guinea; if coloured, two guineas.

(From the Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse Herald.)

LONDON IN 1842.—The last number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS—a weekly newspaper of considerable ability, and which is embellished with a variety of appropriate wood-cuts—is accompanied with an engraving, on one enormous sheet, representing London as it at present exists. The engraving is cleverly executed, every object of interest is nearly defined, and the most remarkable features of the Modern Babylon are at once recognised. The two views—one of which is a north, and the other a south view of London—have been taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, and the point of sight selected by the artist is the summit of the Duke of York's Column. Altogether, the picture is the completest of the sort we have ever seen, and must have cost a world of time and trouble.

(From the Scotch Reformers' Gazette.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—Truly this is the age of enterprise, and we may say that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is one of the most remarkable periodicals in Great Britain. We have been politely favoured with the number for the week ending January. Not only does it give many splendid wood-cuts or engravings, illustrative of the articles discussed in it; but it is accompanied with a splendid sketch or engraving of the vast city of London, on an entire sheet of paper measuring 52 by 36 inches. This is truly prodigious. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is published weekly. The price of it is only SIXPENCE. It can be sent free by post for 6d. Such a cheap newspaper assuredly deserves every encouragement, and we shall be glad to see it extensively patronized in Scotland.

(From the Sheffield Iris.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—We believe all our readers have either seen or heard of this paper, which has recently been making such creditable efforts to gain public favour that it has become popular throughout the three kingdoms, and we have even read its praises in the journals of the West Indies and of North America. All who have seen the numerous illustrations published in each number must be aware of their great excellence. The artists employed must be individuals of high ability, for the freedom, grace, and truth displayed, are indications not only of long practice, but of great genius. In addition to the lavish embellishments given in each number, the proprietors have recently presented their subscribers with two superb views of "The Great Metropolis of England," which ought to be preserved with extreme care, as they are certainly extraordinary specimens of art.

(From the Newcastle Courant.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. The embellishments of this admirable publication appear to become more numerous and excellent with each succeeding week. The first volume has just been completed; and the supplementary part is literally filled with pictorial illustrations, whilst the index affords a key to the social and political history of the world during the last six months. The most surprising effort of the proprietors is an enormous plate, entitled "London in 1842," and presented to the subscribers on the occasion of the new year. It represents a bird's-eye view of the great city from the top of York's Column, and, as a work of art, is really surprising, having been taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet. The effect is very striking: every object of interest is clearly discernible, and the neatness of execution and finish honourable to the artists of the country.

(From the Dundee Herald.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The proprietors of this splendidly-illustrated newspaper have presented their readers with a beautiful engraving of London, as it at present exists, on an enormous sheet, as a New Year's gift, and a frontispiece to the first volume of the work. It is a first-rate picture, cleverly executed, and, as a noble triumph of art. There are two views—north and south—of London, taken from the summit of the Duke of York's Column, by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet. A key to it is given, by which every object of importance is readily distinguished, and a pretty accurate idea given of the vastness of the "City of the World."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is a most admirable family paper, and gives, for sixpence, an excellent summary of the news of the week—a rich fund of literary matter—and, what is its chief attraction, a number of beautiful pictorial illustrations of objects of interest.

(From the Preston Pilot.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The proprietor of this paper has nobly redeemed his promise of providing a weekly newspaper that should do honour to the press. The first number which it was produced has so faithfully performed his part, we trust that he has not been disappointed in receiving that ample support which his unexampled endeavours have so well entitled him to expect. Devoted to the numerous and interesting topics of the day, and public art, given weekly, the proprietor has presented the subscribers with two very magnificent views of "the City of the World"—our own great Metropolis, the talent evinced in the production of which is unrivalled; indeed, the art of wood engraving must have received so powerful a stimulus through the instrumentality of this paper, as cannot fail to raise it to an eminence which must make it the envy and admiration of the whole world of letters.

(From the Kilkenny Journal.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—We have already expressed our opinion of the merits of this extremely interesting paper. But the fact of the spirited proprietors having made a present to their subscribers of a magnificent print, entitled "London in 1842," calls for a fresh meed of approbation. These splendid views of London have been taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet—one is northern, and the other southern. They are executed in the highest style of art, and are contained in one immense sheet. If anything were wanting to complete the popularity of this elegant and admirable journal, it is now supplied by that chef-d'œuvre, "London in 1842."

(From the Kent Herald.)

LONDON IN 1842.—Under this title the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have published a print, gratuitously presented to the subscribers, of unequalled magnitude and excellence. It is a view of London, taken from the summit of the Duke of York's Column, looking to the south over St. James's Park and the Thames, to the Surrey hills. The panorama thus presents almost every object of architectural interest in this vast expanse—Buckingham Palace, Westminster Abbey, Regent-street, the Athenæum, St Martin's Church, the Horse Guards, the Admiralty, United Service Club-house, Downing-street, Whitehall, the Parks, St. Paul's Cathedral, &c. &c. It is probably the largest wood engraving ever undertaken, and could only be executed by the application of modern science, under the direction of first-rate artistical talent, and a very large pecuniary outlay. The views were first taken separately by the Daguerreotype, combined by skilful darughtsmen, and then transferred to sixty of the largest slabs of box-wood that could be procured. The junction of lines, and the obtaining from the whole an engraving of uniform excellence, is among the miracles of modern art. We understand that it has occasioned quite a sensation in the metropolis, and that it will, no doubt, largely contribute to increase the already extensive popularity of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.*

* The Westminster Bridge Railroad Company published, at the outset of their business, a large print, taken from the same position, bearing some semblance to the present work, but it is needless to say, much inferior to it in size and distinctness.

(From the Cork Southern Reporter.)

LONDON IN 1842.—We have received the first number for the new year of a weekly Journal, entitled the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, accompanied by a splendid engraving, containing two views of the "Great Metropolis." Of the taste and ability displayed in the design and execution of this splendid work of art, we cannot speak in terms of sufficient admiration. It is, unquestionably, the most useful and elegant production in that line we have ever seen, and we are satisfied that some years since such a print could not have been purchased under at least One Guinea. It has been, however, presented gratis to the subscribers of that journal, and will be a most acceptable present to all who wish for a correct and comprehensive representation of the several interesting and conspicuous features of the great city. This unique production has been executed by the Daguerreotype process, and well, no doubt, largely contributes to increase the already extensive popularity of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 4.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

REPRINT.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF THE QUEEN.

Loud and loyally as the universal voice of England has outspoken its affection for our Sovereign, from the first happy omen of her accession to the throne of her ancestors, through all the events and influences of her interesting career, it would still seem that national love is insufficient to guard against the insidious approaches of isolated crime, and that the person held most sacred, and deemed most dear by all the good and virtuous who dwell in the land she governs, may have to brook the hazard of individual treason, and dare the peril of madness or murder, in the bosom of her people and at the threshold of her throne.

Our dear and noble Queen has been once more exposed to the danger of assassination, and once more protected by the providence of God. The passions of the million are indignant in the conviction of her peril, but anon, the heart of the empire is electric with the joy of her escape.

Our readers will find elsewhere a detail of all the features and circumstances of this new atrocity, but we shall presently show that it is a theme for reflection in a broader social sense than that in which it is first taken under the delirium of popular excitement, and the warm impulses and agitation of a loyal love.

It is an event that should run into the deeper channels of thought, and be regarded with other aspects than that which it presents in the first blush of its dire enormity. Morality and philosophy should combine to defend themselves against the growing up of that morbid and insane species of wickedness, of which this is only the last and most execrated example.

Let us describe the crime—the second (and therefore the more serious) that has directed its malignity against her Majesty's life.

We are supposed to dwell in a well-ordered country—a land wherein social virtue has been more studied, and social decorum more firmly maintained, than in any other within the pale of civilization. A land where peace is the result of prowess—wealth, the landmark of order—manliness, the symbol of the people and their institutions—and loyalty, the motto engraved upon the national heart. Religion, too, holds a strong and temperate sway over all—none despise it—none dare outrage it. Society has undergone none of the disorganizing influences that have made a wreck of the morality of France. There is no public infidelity, and revolution is a word hated by all but those whom all men ought to hate.

Political excitements have gathered upon us; but we are still far from having allowed these to stir one brick in the beautiful social fabric which enshrines the love, the religion, and the happiness of the empire.

Well, in such a condition of national existence, a Sovereign and a woman—young, beautiful, and virtuous—sways our destinies and commands our respect. She sits like the spirit of goodness and purity—the grace of England's throne. As a Queen, she wears the lofty aspect and the proud bearing of one in whom dignity and decision are inborn. As a woman, she tempers her queendom with the mild and winning gentleness of her sex. As a wife, she is exemplary; and has the happiness, so rarely awarded to those who have in marriage to consult expediency more than affection, of loving and being loved. As the mother of her children, she is (the best virtue we can give her) what her mother was to her; and, lastly, as the mother of her people, she has blessed the common family with benignant sway—she has promoted their interests—partaken of their diversions—sympathised with their depressions—listened to their grievances—and participated in all their joys. She is, in a word, at once the focus and embodiment of the people's affections.

What then? Why, in the pleasurable exercise of a daily familiarity with her subjects—in the very disporting of her beautiful confidence in the loyalty she has earned—in the strength of her own virtue as a Queen—in the companionship of her husband—and under the shield of a popularity, as universal as it is intense, the arm of the assassin is raised to take her life; and the unconscious being who, in the happiness of her cheerful spirit, believed that all was love around her, might, in another second, have winged her soul to heaven; to leave behind her, along with a blessed memory, a husband widowed—children orphaned—and a whole nation weeping, and darkened with the mourning garments of grief!

What human motive could point to such a result—what passion could be gratified—what accountable design achieved? There are but two clues to the commission of such a crime, and they are either treason and conspiracy of the blackest dye, and couched in the most inconceivable spirit; or madness, engendered by an imaginative gloating over similar works of evil that have made loud notoriety, and registered their hideous example for the dangerous contemplation of wild and morbid minds.

This last is what we fear; and in the instance before us, both fear and hope.

It seems impossible to find the impulse in mere treason; for, had the Queen been shot, no proximate aim of treason could have been attained. There is a future King training for the succession; and were revolution the aim, there is nothing in the Sovereign's death that could revolutionize the empire. The King of Hanover does not now stand next the throne; and, were her Majesty to be hurried into immortality by any sudden event, there is not manifest one single element of unpopularity that she could leave behind her. No commotion, save that of sorrow, could be stirred—no ambition of party could be forwarded—no malice could be gratified—there would be nothing to triumph over, and no one to rejoice.

No! it should seem that madness—madness only—is the incitement to the crime.

The wretched being who has attempted an act for which no punishment could be too dreadful, no retribution too severe, if sense were linked with sin—seems, with the singular mental sympathies of criminals of his morbid class, to have followed precisely in the wake of his predecessor, Oxford; he is equally without a motive, he takes the same weapon, he repairs to the same spot, he seeks to work out his wanton mischief with total absence of contrivance, as if he knew no responsibility but the goading impulse of a resistless infatuation.

We are of those who believe that the spirit in which this would-be regicide went to his deadly purpose, is a spirit engendered by the notoriety of crime. We apply the remark not less to the fearful act before us, than to some of the remarkable suicides, and still more atrocious murders, of recent date.

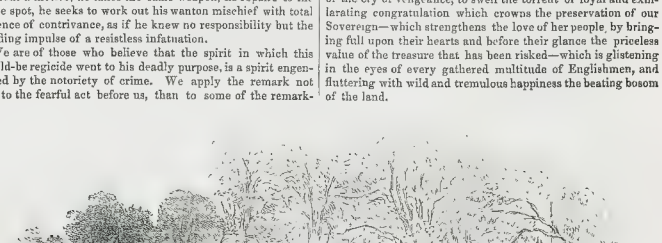
In the celebrity of a most paramount wickedness, with men of morbid imagination, consists its charm. It fixes them with the eye of a basilisk, it haunts their visions, it colours their waking fancies, it lures them into the circle of monstrosity, it plunges the mind into delusion, and steeps the eye in blood.

A bad example is ever more contagious than a good one; but there is nothing to equal the contagion of any glaring and outrageous enormity to the hopeless, idle, ever-dreaming wretch, who gazes upon its notoriety with envy, and, with the wild ambition of a fanatic, resolves to build up the shrine of a bad eminence in the blackest corner of the temple of crime.

It is against the "growing up of this insane species of wickedness" as a wondrous social evil, that we would enlist "philosophy and morality," in the spirit of one of the earlier sentences of this article—the first of several which we purpose writing on the subject -and, to the end of our future arguments, as well as of our present hope, we predict that in this morbid madness lies the secret of the attempted assassination of our beloved Queen.

Should it prove otherwise, we are of those who would rush into the very heart and vortex of that mighty flood of popular passion, which is everywhere raging for punishment upon one who is only not a monster and a miscreant, unless he be horribly and hopelessly mad. We would not fly in the face of an affliction from Heaven, but we would visit upon the same assassin the most woeful of the retributions of earth.

Now, however, let us leave alike the speculation of philosophy or the cry of vengeance, to swell the torrent of loyal and exhilarating congratulation which crowns the preservation of our Sovereign—which strengthens the love of her people by bringing full upon their hearts and before their glance the priceless value of the treasure that has been risked—which is glistening in the eyes of every gathered multitude of Englishmen, and fluttering with wild and tremulous happiness the beating bosom of the land.



THE COWARDLY AND DISGRACEFUL ATTEMPT ON THE LIFE OF HER MAJESTY.

Shortly after the return of Prince Albert to Buckingham Palace on Monday afternoon, her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness, proceeded in an open carriage and four horses, preceded by outriders, for her accustomed drive in Hyde Park, &c., the Royal Equerries, as usual, accompanying the carriage on horseback.

On her Majesty's return, about ten minutes or a quarter past six o'clock, down Constitution-hill, when within a few yards of the spot at which the former attempt at her assassination was made by the boy Oxford, a young man, who had previously been noticed standing with his back against the brick wall skirting the garden of Buckingham Palace, was observed to advance towards the road along which the Royal carriage was passing, and upon the carriage approaching the spot at which he stood, he was seen by police constable Tounce, A, to advance within three yards of it, and at the same instant take from his waistcoat pocket a pistol. Tounce instantly rushed towards him for the purpose of knocking it out of his hand, seeing that it was aimed at her Majesty, but at the moment he seized him the pistol went off without injuring any person.

The instant the report was heard, a soldier of the Foot Guards who happened to be near, ran to the assistance of the policeman, as did several other persons who came rapidly up to the spot.

The Royal carriage, which was at the moment of the attempt proceeding at a quick pace, continued its course towards Buckingham Palace, and the prisoner, who did not appear to be more than 20 years of age, rather smartly made, about 5 feet 6 inches high, dark complexion, long visage, dressed in a black frock coat and waistcoat, and drab trousers, and presenting altogether a rather respectable appearance, was conveyed in the lodge adjoining, where he was searched by Mr Russell, the inspector on duty, who found in his pocket a bullet and some powder, as well as the pistol, which was still warm, and affording convincing proof of its recent discharge.

No questions were put the prisoner while at the palace, nor did he show any desire to speak; and in the course of a quarter of an hour he was taken, through the equerries' entrance, and put into a cab, Inspector Russell, one of the officers on duty at the palace, and the soldier who arrested him, accompanying him.

The prisoner was driven off at a rapid rate to Gardener's-lane station-house, where he was questioned by Inspector Hughes as to his name, for the purpose of entering the offence in the usual manner upon the charge sheet, but he refused to give his name, or make any statement, and maintained an extreme sullenness of manner.

After a delay of about half an hour, the door suddenly opened, and a rush was made through the people outside by the police, one on either side of the prisoner, two in front clearing the way, and two more taking up the rear; and in this manner he was conducted from the Gardener's-lane station-house to the Home-office, into which he was conveyed by the back entrance, from the park, an immense concourse of persons having assembled at the front entrance opposite Whitehall.

The principal Ministers present besides the Home Secretary and Sir R. Peel, were the Duke of Wellington, Lord Stanley, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Jersey, Sir E. Leatchbull, Lord Fitzgerald, the Earl of Denbigh, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Ripon, the Earl of Aberdeen and Viscount Lowther. The Attorney-General was present, as also were Mr. Maule, the Solicitor of the Treasury, and Colonel Rowan, the Police Commissioner. Mr. Hall, the chief magistrate of Bow-street, was also present.

The investigation was, of course, strictly private, and no particulars of what occurred at the Home Office transpired officially. It was, however, ascertained that upon being interrogated, he still refused to give either his name or residence, or to make any admission on the subject of the charge; but during the examination of the persons who witnessed the transaction, it appeared that a youth who happened to be in the park at the moment of the prisoner's apprehension, had followed him to the station-house, and subsequently to the Home Office, and had recognised him to be a person of the name of Francis. On the prisoner being pressed as to whether that was not his name, he, after some hesitation, admitted the fact. The youth was then questioned as to his knowledge of the prisoner, when he stated that the prisoner's father resided at No. 100, Tichfield-street.

Inspector Pearce, A division, was instantly despatched to the above address, which he found to be correct; and shortly before ten o'clock, the father, who is a very respectable, honest-looking man, came down to the Home Office in a state of the deepest anxiety. He was not examined before the Council on Monday night, as the evidence was already sufficient for a remand, but it was stated that he (the father) was connected with Covent-garden Theatre, and that his son was by trade a carpenter, but could in no way account for his extraordinary conduct. He had never heard him make any allusion to her Majesty, or express any dislike to the Queen or the Government; the prisoner had been absent from his family for more than six weeks past, and he (the father) happened to be at Deptford when he was informed that a youth, who was believed to be his son, had committed this crime. Scarcely believing the possibility of the thing, he nevertheless hurried up to town, and the first certain news he had heard of his son for so many weeks turned out to be that he was in the hands of justice charged with this most serious offence. At first an attempt was made, probably from a human motive, to lead the poor man to believe that he was mistaken; but it ultimately turned out that his fears were too true. When asked about the residence of his son, he said he did not know. The last he had heard of him was three or four weeks ago, when he lived in Great Portland-street.

Shortly before the proceedings in council terminated, the Duke of Wellington left the Home Office in his cab to proceed to Buckingham Palace. After an absence of about half an hour, his Grace returned to the Home Office, shortly after which the council broke up, and the prisoner was removed by the back of the office through Kingstreet and the streets at the back of the Abbey to Tothill-fields; consequently the large crowd that had collected in front of the Home Office, in Whitehall, were spared the opportunity of venting their feelings of rage and execration upon him.

When the prisoner arrived at Tothill-fields, the governor, Lieut Tracy, placed him in a separate cell, leaving a turnkey to watch him.

A courier was in attendance to convey the intelligence to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl de Grey, immediately on the breaking up of the council.

Intelligence of the desperate attempt flew like wildfire throughout the metropolis; and in a very short time the various members of the Royal Family, as well as several of the Foreign Ambassadors, besides large numbers of the nobility, &c., hastened to the palace, for the purpose of congratulating the Queen and Prince Albert on their providential deliverance; and throughout the evening a dense concourse of persons of all classes, amongst whom were a number of elegantly-dressed women, surrounded the gates of the palace, all of whom appeared to be animated by one feeling of abhorrence of the individual who had thus made the regicidal attempt.

The prisoner, who was narrowly watched, passed a very quiet night, and although often visited by the governor, he did not enter into any conversation, or make the least allusion to his diabolical offence, or the motives by which he was actuated. He was stripped, and most carefully searched, when he first arrived at the prison, but nothing was found on his person of a suspicious character.

At a quarter before twelve o'clock on Tuesday morning, the prisoner was conveyed in a hackney-coach, in the custody of Lieutenant Tracy, the Governor of Tothill-fields Prison, and two policemen, to the Home-office, for further examination before the Privy Council, which met at twelve o'clock; and it was astonishing to every one present to observe the remarkably calm, cool, and firm manner in which he conducted himself. After he left the hackney-coach, and whilst waiting for the assembling of the Council, two policemen kept close hold of his arms, but there was not the least tremour, not the least apparent sensation of fear, or dread of inquiry. No one, of course, was allowed to ask the prisoner any question, and whilst waiting to be examined before the Privy Council he kept a profound silence. The crowd in front of the Home-office was very considerable, but no one, under any circumstances, was allowed to enter; and, by order, two policemen, who were stationed at the door, peremptorily refused admission to every one not personally concerned in the inquiry. Applications from those connected with the public press, to be present at the examination, were also peremptorily refused.

A few minutes before twelve o'clock orders were given to take the prisoner into the room where the examination was to take place. He heard this order with the greatest coolness and apparent indifference. At twelve o'clock the Lord Chancellor left the House of Lords, and proceeded to the Home-office. A great number of other members of the Privy Council had at this time assembled, and the examination proceeded.

The examination of the prisoner occupied from a quarter after twelve to a quarter past four o'clock in the afternoon; and during the whole of that period the crowd in Whitehall continued undiminished.

At half-past four o'clock, the few persons on the parade had their attention drawn to the opening of the wicket-door of the Home-office, and the instant emerging of the prisoner from thence, having on each side of him one of the turnkeys above spoken of, and preceded by Lieutenant Tracy, carrying in his hand the warrant for the prisoner's committment. The prisoner held down his head as he traversed the garden, but still sufficient of his face could be seen to convince all who saw him that he felt but slightly the highly dangerous position in which he had placed himself. The induction of the prisoner into the hackney-coach was but the work of a moment, and the two turnkeys having followed him in, Lieutenant Tracy mounted the box and desired the coachman, in a loud voice, to drive to "Newgate." The progress of the prisoner from the park to the place of his confinement was scarcely noticed, so adroitly had his removal been managed.

The warrant of commitment charged "John Francis" with "shooting at our Sovereign Lady Victoria the Queen, with a pistol loaded with powder and ball."

On the arrival of the coach near the prison, the driver, in consequence of the alterations which were being made in the wooden pavement opposite Newgate, pulled up at the end of the Old Bailey, and the prisoner descended, and walked between two of the gaolers of the House of Correction, with Lieutenant Tracy, the Governor of the prison, behind him. His appearance attracted not the slightest attention, so private was the whole affair kept, and he was taken into Newgate, and the doors closed after him, without one person following him from the end of the Old Bailey to the prison steps. Upon entering the ante-room, or hall, his handcuffs were taken off, when he sat down on a form, and gazed with the most perfect sang froid on the objects around him. During the time the preliminary arrangements were making previous to his being taken to his cell, he conversed with the gaolers with apparent indifference generally; but once or twice he asked questions in a rather excited manner. His sojourn here lasted a quarter of an hour, and, owing to the hurry incident to his removal, we had scarcely an opportunity of speaking with him, but he seemed rather to avoid the notice of a stranger, and averted his face. His appearance denoted neither agitation nor the slightest want of self-possession.

There have been some doubts expressed as to whether the pistol actually went off; but these misgivings were cleared away yesterday by the evidence of Mr. Fitzgerald, a highly-respectable gentleman, who swore that he was not more than ten yards off when Francis aimed at her Majesty, and that he distinctly heard the report. This evidence was strengthened by the testimony of Colonel Wylde and two gunsmiths, who declared the pistol to have been recently discharged.

Almost immediately after the perpetration of the crime on Monday, a female of respectable demeanour, whose name was not mentioned, applied to one of the park-keepers, and requested to be directed to the police-station, as she was desirous of making an important statement respecting the attempt on the Queen's life, having been but a short distance from the prisoner when he fired the pistol. She stated that she resided in Grey's-inn-lane, and said she was walking up and down Constitution-hill, waiting to see her Majesty on her return to Buckingham-palace, when her notice was drawn to the prisoner and another man, who wore a flannel jacket. She then heard the prisoner say "Damn the Queen; why should she be such an expense to the nation? It is to support her in such grand style that us poor persons have to work hard." At that moment her Majesty's carriage came in sight, and on the Queen passing the prisoner, he took from under his coat a pistol, which he instantly discharged. The female added that she distinctly saw the flash, but at the instant she became so confused and alarmed that she did not hear the report.

The following particulars, all more or less relating to the event, are gleaned from various sources:—

It is stated that on Sunday last, as the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert were returning from the Chapel Royal, a letter from a bystander among the crowd that had assembled to obtain a glimpse of royalty was thrown into the carriage, which, it is said, contained threatening matter, and caused great alarm. The contents, however, were carefully concealed from the public, for fear of producing any unpleasant anxiety in the minds of her Majesty's loyal subjects. Means will be taken to compare the handwriting of the prisoner Francis with that of the letter.

A pistol was seen in the prisoner's possession on Sunday morning, at the St. Ann's Coffee-house, Oxford-street. He was observed to place it carefully under his coat when he left the house

On Monday, after the attempt, we are told that her Majesty's demeanour, and that of her illustrious consort, underwent no change on their return to the palace; and they expressed their intention of joining the Royal dinner party. The event did not make any difference in the arrangements of the Court.

The house of the prisoner's father was minutely searched on Monday night, and again on Tuesday morning, but nothing whatever of a suspicious character was found. Colonel Arbuthnot and Colonel Wylde were close to the Royal carriage when the pistol was fired, and the prisoner was so close to them, that the smoke came into their faces; had the shot taken effect, it would have been more likely to have injured one of them than either her Majesty or her Royal Consort. The Privy Council have given instructions to the Commissioners of Police, to cause the most full and rigid investigation into every circumstance connected with the atrocious deed. The prisoner has been under the notice of the police for the last day or two, having been seen loitering about the parks; and on Sunday last he was observed by one of the police-sergeants on duty, to pull out of his pocket something that appeared like a pistol, as the Royal cortège was passing. This circumstance was mentioned, but the inference drawn from it was, that he contemplated suicide; therefore orders were given to notice his actions, and this accounts for the silence observed as to the occurrence.

It appears that, previous to her Majesty's return to the palace, the assassin had attracted some attention, by making use of improper language, saying that the Queen lived upon the vitals of the people, and at the same time making use of the most abusive epithets towards her. The policeman had, about a quarter of an hour prior to the occurrence, noticed the prisoner leaning on the pump, and was persuaded, by his somewhat strange behaviour, to watch him, it being his (the constable's) opinion that he intended to destroy himself. As the Queen's carriage approached, the constable noticed the prisoner vacate his post and fumble in his pockets. He then hastened towards him, having a presentiment that something was about to happen; and when within ten yards of him, the villain fired a pistol in the direction of the carriage. The policeman immediately seized him, and was assisted almost immediately afterwards by a soldier, as before stated; and in less than two minutes from the time of the attempt, he was housed in the palace, being taken into the lodge. The pistol was what is commonly called a holster-pistol, with flint lock.

It was stated that he exactly answered the description given of the person who attempted to assassinate her Majesty in the park on Sunday evening. We were not inclined to credit this story of a previous attempt on her Majesty's life, but on inquiry, we find that it was too true that such an attempt was made; but, as her Majesty was not aware of it, the circumstance was not allowed to transpire. Upon this occasion, however, both her Majesty and Prince Albert were perfectly aware of the attempt, and, in fact, perceived the pistol flash. Her Majesty, however, displayed her usual presence of mind, and did not betray the least symptom of alarm.

It was quickly rumoured that the prisoner had associates in his crime, and that a clue had been obtained to their discovery. One of these, a tall individual, who was seen in his company in the park, was stated to be in custody.

According to the information of persons who had been present at the attempt made by Oxford, the spot where the present outrage occurred was not six yards distant from that place. A vast number of persons had been drawn to the place, and the expressions of abhorrence at the attempt were unanimous.

In the course of the evening, the Secretary of State informed the Lord Mayor of the occurrence, as follows:—

"Whitehall, May 30, eight o'clock, P.M.

"My Lord Mayor,—It is my duty to inform your lordship that her Majesty, on her return from the park this evening, was shot at on Constitution-hill. The criminal has been apprehended; and your lordship will rejoice to hear that her Majesty is safe and unhurt.—I have the honour to be, my Lord Mayor, your faithful servant,

"J. R. G. Graham.

"The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor."

BEHAVIOUR OF HER MAJESTY AFTER THE ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION.

As soon as the Queen and Prince Albert had returned to the Palace, Count Mensdorf went over in one of the Royal carriages to the Duchess of Kent, at Clarence House, St. James's; and after communicating in the most delicate manner what had occurred, instantly returned to Buckingham Palace with her Royal Highness, who was received by her Majesty (whose nerves did not appear in the slightest degree shaken) in the most warm, affectionate, and, at the same time, cheerful manner. The Duchess of Kent was, on the other hand, deeply affected, and fell upon her Majesty's neck, shedding a flood of tears. The Queen, however, gaily caressed her royal mother, and assured her that she had not sustained the slightest alarm or inconvenience, and that there were no grounds for alarm.

Her Majesty had a dinner party and an evening party fixed for last night. The dinner party took place, but the evening party was put off by the Queen's command. A great deal of excitement pervaded the palace during the evening. The attempt of the previous day could not be "hushed up;" and although it was known that something had occurred, few persons, even within the walls of the palace, had been made acquainted with the circumstance. The second attempt, however, precluded all conceal ment, and considerable alarm was experienced at the determined spirit which had induced the miscreant again to endanger the life of their beloved Sovereign

Requisitions were got up on Tuesday in most of the principal parishes, for meetings to be held to agree to addresses of congratulation to her Majesty on her providential escape. The individual expressions of loyalty and attachment were everywhere heard with great fervency.

Let us hope that the late sad event, while it has excited so much highly painful feeling in every quarter, will yet, in the demonstrations of loyalty and attachment to her Majesty which it has been the means of calling forth, prove to our Sovereign how deeply implanted are the love and reverence and affection for her person in the hearts of the vast body of her people.

The circumstance has given rise to the development of a trait in her Majesty's character, which we venture to say will not soon be forgotten. It would seem that on Monday morning, before proceeding to take her accustomed airing, her Majesty became aware of what had happened the previous day. Actuated, however, by a high sense of heroism and duty, her Majesty would not allow the circumstance, alarming as it was, to prevent her from taking her usual out-of-door exercise; but, at the same time, with a fine generosity, she would not suffer the lady in waiting (Lady Portman, we understand), to accompany her, lest in so doing she might share the threatened danger. We feel sure that it is no flattery to say that a finer trait of mingled heroism and generosity than this it would be difficult to find; and it will deepen, if possible, the affection and the admiration so universally felt for her Majesty's character by her subjects.

As early as eight o'clock on Tuesday morning, numbers of respectable persons began to congregate in front of the entrance of Buckingham Palace, and before ten o'clock the carriages of the nobility and gentry began to arrive at the principal entrance of the palace. Towards four o'clock in the afternoon, the crowd collected in the front of the palace continued rapidly to increase, in the anticipation that her Majesty would, notwithstanding the fearful attempt at her assassination, still appear on the balcony, as announced, and we are happy to say the public expectation was not disappointed. Precisely at twenty-five minutes to five o'clock, the side gates at the north-eastern wing of the palace were suddenly thrown open, and the Royal outriders appeared in scarlet liveries, preceding the Royal carriage (an open barouche), drawn by four horses and postilions, which contained her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Duke of Saxe Coburg, all in plain morning dress, coming into Hyde-park, the crowd of spectators was so great, that it was miraculous that some serious accident did not occur.

The area in front of the statue in Hyde-park was occupied by hundreds, and upwards, who were anxiously waiting to evince their gratitude, and give a hearty welcome to her Majesty after her providential escape from the attempt of the assassin. The drive was rendered almost impassable from the great number of equipages of the nobility.

On her Majesty's entering the park, the cheering from the gentlemen and the waving of handkerchiefs by the ladies, were general, and not a head was covered during the passage of the Queen down the Ride; indeed, the delight of all classes, assembled apparently to offer homage to the presence of their illustrious sovereign, can be but feebly described, and the rapturous acclamations that saluted the Royal ear were such as to affect her Majesty, who was evidently overcome by the loyal display of public affection evinced on the occasion.

It was some time before the excitement caused by her Majesty's appearance had subsided; and the same manifestations of regard were shown on the Queen's return to the palace.

Both her Majesty and the Prince acknowledged the cordial greetings by repeatedly bowing in every direction from which the cheering emanated.

Her Majesty, we regret to say, looked rather pale, and not so well as on Saturday last.

In the evening her Majesty visited the Opera, and her presence produced an enthusiastic demonstration of the feelings, which, at this moment, must be universal among her subjects. Before the commencement of the opera, and before her Majesty's arrival, "God save the Queen" was sung with great effect by the whole strength of the company. During the first scene of the piece her Majesty and Prince Albert were observed in a private box Royal. The whole audience, which was crowded, instantly rose, and received her with a burst of acclamations which seemed to shake the walls of the theatre. As if by a sudden impulse, the business of the scene was suspended—the whole vocal band was at once engaged in performing the national anthem, instantly filled the stage, and began it once more. During its performance every phrase applicable to the occasion was enthusiastically rounded by it, and the whole was lost in the shouts of the audience, and waving of hats and handkerchiefs in every part of the house. We never saw this theatre present so splendid an appearance as at this moment. The fair and graceful occupants of every box were standing in its front, and showing by their animated gestures how much they partook of the general excitement. This gratifying scene lasted for several minutes.

It is a fact worthy mentioning, that on Sunday last, during a sermon preached by the Rev. Mr. Smith, at Trinity Church, Queen-street, Holborn, on the restoration of King Charles II., the reverend preacher very zealously, and it may almost be said prophetically, took up the subject of the Divine protection of kings, and after alluding to the hair-breadth escapes of the sovereigns of the illustrious house of Hanover, he particularly alluded to the attempt of the lunatic Oxford against the life of her Majesty: and after urging that loyalty was not merely required by the laws of man, but also by the commandments of God, said that the all-seeing eye of Providence was ever watching over the safety of the Lord's anointed; and that the same Providence which had hitherto shielded our beloved Queen, would guard her from similar attempts. It is rather remarkable that within twenty-four hours the recent attempt was made, and so providentially frustrated.

So great was the anxiety in the City on Monday night, immediately the report gained circulation, that her Majesty's life had been a second time attempted by the hand of an assassin, that many of the principal tradesmen got copies of the letter of Mr. James Graham, and exhibited them in their windows. Many of the omnibus and short stage drivers got copies, and posted them on their vehicles.

On Tuesday morning the Lord Mayor forwarded copies of the letter from Sir J. Graham, conveying the information of the traitorous attempt on her Majesty's life, to the Governors of the Bank of England, and to the Directors of the East India Company, upon which the executive of each body took steps to call a meeting to congratulate her Majesty on her providential escape. A copy was also posted at the temporary Royal Exchange, in Broad-street, as official information to the merchants. Parochial requisitions were got up during the day in most of the principal parishes, for meetings to agree to addresses. The individual expressions of loyalty, attachment, and detest tion of the meditated crime, were fervent and general, and, as an instance of the strong and general feeling manifested by all classes of her Majesty's subjects, it may be here mentioned that on the assembling of the Working Men's class, at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday evening, immediately before the lesson on which commenced the whole class spontaneously rose, cheering, and demanded "God save the Queen," before they began the lesson. They called on the spectators in the gallery of the Hall to stand up, and then sing the National Anthem in the most enthusiastic manner. Their cheeers were most vociferously renewed before they sat down.

At the close of the inquiry before the Privy Council on Tuesday, the noble lord who presided, addressed the prisoner, and after the depositions had been read over, told him that what he had just heard read would be taken down and produced in evidence in any trial against him at the trial. The prisoner replied, "Then I shall say nothing now;" and the warrant of commitment having been made out, this closed the proceedings.

On Wednesday morning the father of the prisoner went to the Home-office for an order of admission to Newgate to have an interview with his son. He says that the prisoner is not twenty years of age until next January, that he was always a very steady lad, and that he is utterly at a loss to imagine what could have prompted him to the commission of such a heinous offence. He (the prisoner) left his father about six weeks since, but during that time he generally dined with him on the Sunday, but nothing remarkable was observed either in his conduct or conversation. He has only been out of work for the last few days. He (the father) was informed at the Home-office that the Home Secretary had no authority to give an order for admission to see a prisoner in Newgate, but that he must apply to the city aldermen.

The following particulars, respecting the man charged with the commission of this atrocious crime, may be completely relied upon. The prisoner's real name is John Francis, and he is about 20 years of age. On the 14th of January last, he engaged the second floor back room, at the house of Mr. Foster, a respectable master tailor, residing at 105, Great Titchfield-street, Marylebone, and he occupied that room with another young man named William Elam, and they jointly paid the rent. The prisoner was considered a good tempered, inoffensive young man, and came home regularly to his meals, and he was never out late at night. One person of a rather superior class of society, from his dress and general appearance, has latterly been in the habit of visiting him, and remained for some time along with him in his room, but no parcels were ever sent to him, as appears from very particular inquiry made upon the subject by the police. During the last few weeks the prisoner has been backward in paying his rent, but Mr. Foster, from his good opinion of him, did not press him upon the subject, and on Saturday week the arrears amounted to £114s. The prisoner's conduct during the last few days appears to have been most extraordinary. He had been all along getting his livlihood by working as a journeyman carpenter, but on Monday week he engaged a shop and parlour at No. 65, Mortimer-street, which adjoins Great Titchfield-street, at the weekly rent of 24s., and expressed his intention to open in the trade of a tobacconist. He then employed a painter to put his name over the door, as it now appears, "Francis, tobacconist," and expressed his intention to open the shop on Thursday morning. In the meantime he caused cards to be printed, and a great quantity of snuff, tobacco, cigars, and such articles were sent in, and on Thursday morning the shop was opened, and the prisoner attended in it all day. On that night, having closed the shop, he went home to bed, as usual, and the next morning he again proceeded to the snuff shop, and remained there until his fellow lodger had gone to work, and he was then seen to go up into his room, and remain there a short time, when he again left the house. Upon the young man then returning, he found that his box had been broken open, and that five pounds ten, in gold, had been stolen. He immediately gave information to Mr. Foster, his landlord, who at once proceeded to the snuff shop, in Mortimer-street, when he found the prisoner sitting in a most unconcerned manner, behind the counter. He immediately said to him, "What have you been about? I suppose you know what I have come here for?" The prisoner immediately replied, "Oh, I suppose you want the money;" and he directly pulled out the gold, and gave it to Mr. Foster, who then told him not to enter his house any more. The prisoner expressed some anxiety about his boxes, and said he supposed Mr Foster would not object to letting him have them. Mr. Foster suspecting, from the discovery that had been made, that the prisoner might have committed some other depredations, that would be discovered by searching his boxes, determined upon retaining possession of them; and he told him that he would take care of them for him, but that he should not have possession of them for the present, and he went away. It appears that on this same day the persons of whom the prisoner had purchased the articles to stock his shop, and to whom he had promised immediate payment, came to him and insisted upon receiving the amount of their goods. He told them he was unable to pay them, and they insisted on having back their property, and the whole of the goods were accordingly removed, and the shop cleared. This occurred in the latter part of the day, and about dusk on Friday evening the prisoner shut up the shop, and was seen to walk away. He then, it appears, not having the opportunity, for the reason above stated, of going to his own lodgings, proceeded to a coffee-shop at the end of Oxford-street, where he hired a room, and where he remained until yesterday, when the desperate act was committed. It has already been stated that the police obtained access to his apartment in Titchfield-street, and that they searched his boxes, but although, for the sake of establishing the identity of the accused, it was deemed advisable that they should be taken charge of by the police, we are enabled to state that there was nothing at all suspicious discovered in his boxes, and the contents were merely dirty linen, and some scraps, and poetry, and other writings of no importance, and nothing of a political tendency was discovered. The conduct of the prisoner in engaging the snuff shop, was looked upon by the persons who knew him as a very singular proceeding, as it was known that he had not the slightest knowledge of that business, and was entirely without means to carry it on; and it is supposed that, being pressed for the money by the parties of whom he had obtained the goods, he was induced on the Friday morning to steal the money of his companion, under the circumstances above described.

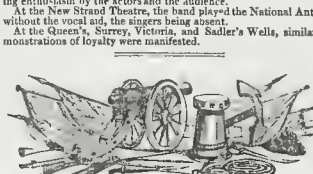
DEMONSTRATION OF LOYALTY AT THE VARIOUS THEATRES.

The news of the attempt on the life of her gracious Majesty, was communicated to the leaders of the various theatres during the evening; and at the Olympic Theatre, the moment it was made known to Mr. Baker, the stage-manager, the entire company were mustered on the stage, and the Anthem was sung, the audience joining in the chorus in the most enthusiastic manner.

At the English Opera, Mr. Vining addressed the audience on the same subject, and the National Anthem was sung with a corresponding enthusiasm by the actors and the audience.

At the New Strand Theatre, the band played the National Anthem, without the vocal aid, the singers being absent.

At the Queen's, Surrey, Victoria, and Sadler's Wells, similar demonstrations of loyalty were manifested.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PORTSMOUTH, JUNE 2.—The Actæon, 26, may be expected to arrive from the Brazils about the end of June. Letters from her of the 25th February state that her freight of dollars and gold bars would amount to nearly two millions; she was then at Santa Bias and was to touch at all the northern ports, leaving Rio de Janeiro for England.

The only vessel at Plymouth fitting for foreign service is the brig Philomel, 10, Commander Sullivan, destined to proceed to the South American station, on surveying service.

The Winchester, 52, Capt. Eden, will be paid the usual advance of wages on Thursday, and proceed in the ensuing week to the Cape of Good Hope, to relieve the Southampton frigate. Rear-Admiral the Hon. J. Percy, with his Secretary, Mr. Dyer, have arrived here.

The Talbot, 26, Capt. Sir T. Thompron, Bart., and Cleopatra, 26, Capt. C. Wyvil, are rapidly getting manned at Chatham. Several of the crews of the Benbow and Comus have joined these ships.

The Malabar, 72, Capt. Sir G. Sartorious, destined for the Brazils, remains ready for departure in Plymouth Sound, awaiting further orders. It is said she will take out a new Consul for Bahia.

The Imaum, 72, is being proceeded with, in order to be sent to Jamaica, to receive the broad pendant of Commodore the Honourable H. Byng, as a receiving-ship, in lieu of the Magnificent.

The Dee is preparing at Woolwich as a steam transport, to be commanded by Mr. Thomas Driver, master, R.N., destined by report to take troops to Canada.

The Fly, 18, Capt. Price Blackwood, with her cutter tender, Bramble, 10, received the Racha Roads, Maderia, on the 20th April, and left again on the 24th, for the Cape of Good Hope and Torres Straits, on a voyage of discovery.

The brig tender, Nautilus, 10, Lieut. Paulson, has returned from the Sussex coast to re-victual, having been employed in protecting the fishery in that quarter.

The cutter Sylvia, Commander Sherringham, has proceeded on surveying service, off the adjacent coast.

The President, 52, is ordered to be docked and surveyed, to ascertain her fitness for re-commissioning.

The Crocodile, 27, troop-ship, Mr. Elson, master, has had her orders countermanded, and is now to go to Halifax and Quebec.

The Columbia steam-vessel is ordered to be prepared for commission, by Capt. W. Owen, for surveying service on the coast of Ireland.

At Spithead—Crocodile.

In Harbour—St. Vincent, Victory, Excellent, Royal George yacht, Winchester, Albatross, Satellite, Echo, Volcano, and Nautilus.

THE WRECK OF THE ROYAL GEORGE.—During the past week a considerable portion of the loose timbers have been brought up and landed at the Dockyard. It is expected that during the summer the wreck will be so completely removed that the anchorage will be quite clear. A long brass 24-pounder, that formed part of the armament of this ill-fated ship, has been mounted on the King's battery, on a carriage made from a portion of the wreck. The gun was cast in 1743, and appears to be but very little injured by its lengthened immersion.

BRANDING DESERTERS.—A circular has been issued from the Horse-Guards, recommending that the marking of deserters shall hereafter be conducted on an uniform system throughout the army, and directing attention to an instrument recently invented. This instrument, which is of brass, is shaped at the end into the form of the letter D, from the outline of which is protruded, by means of a spring, a series of needle points, which are regulated by a screw at the end, and by turning which their length may be increased or diminished. By pulling back this nut, after the points are regulated, they recede into the box, when the instrument may be considered charged. A slight pressure on a small brass lever delivers the needle points, inflicting a puncture on the skin the exact shape of the instrument. These punctures, on being rubbed with a marking fluid, composed of a quarter of a pound of pulverised indigo, two sticks of Indian ink, and enough water to render it liquid, leave an indelible D upon the arm or hand of the deserter. This punishment is only to be administered on parade in the presence of the men; in the cavalry by the trumpet-major, and in the infantry by the bugle-major, who are to be instructed by the medical officer how to apply the instrument. It is, moreover, only to be inflicted in the presence of the surgeon. If marking deserters is considered indispensable, there is no possible means by which it can be accomplished with less pain and more certainty.—United Service Gazette.

THE SCOTS' FUSILIER GUARDS.—The Fusilier Guards were reviewed on Wednesday morning at eight o'clock, in Hyde Park, before his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Colonel-in-Chief, the Duke of Wellington, several general officers, and a brilliant staff. His Royal Highness arrived on the ground precisely at eight o'clock, when the regiment was drawn up in line. The Prince, accompanied by his staff, having closely inspected the troops, took up a position in another part of the park, when the regiment marched past in slow and quick time. The two battalions then went through various evolutions, after which they formed into two columns, and threw out skirmishers, who commenced a brisk fire, as if to repel an attack; the columns then again formed in line, the skirmishers having retreated, and a great deal of desultory firing took place. The regiment then formed into two solid squares, and prepared to receive cavalry, and after several volleys were fired, again formed into line. The Prince looked remarkably well, and expressed himself highly gratified at the manner in which the regiment had performed the various evolutions. The early hour at which the review took place, prevented the concourse of persons being great at the commencement; but before it terminated, an immense assemblage had collected together. The beautiful appearance of the morning, and the splendid attire of the numerous general officers, gave to the whole a most brilliant and animated appearance. Prince Albert and the Duke of Wellington were most enthusiastically cheered, both of whom acknowledged the same by repeatedly bowing most respectfully to the vast multitude around them.

A BOUQUET FROM THE GODS.—The Dublin papers relate the following circumstance as having occurred in the course of the performance at Mr. Balfe's benefit, in the Theatre Royal, on Monday evening:—"It has lately become the fashion here for the fair ones of the boxes to fling bouquets of choice flowers on the stage in honour of those vocalists who have become more than common favourites. Thus, during the recent Italian engagement, the stage nightly was literally strewed with "all sorts of duties and delicate bits;" but it was reserved for a deity in the gallery last night to afford a practical satire on this absurd custom, which, we think, will put a period to it here When the enthusiasm created by Miss Kemble's performance was at its height, there dropped from the upper region—not a garland of roses—but a good subs antial bunch of radishes—the voluntary tribute of some enamoured greengrocer to melody and beauty! Miss Kemble raised the precious offering, which she did not press to her bosom, as is the custom; but handed it to Balfe, amid shouts of laughter from every part of the house, the stage included.

The Times remarks, with reference to the recent attempt on the Queen's life:—"We cannot but feel pleased and proud of the warm feelings which this attempt has everywhere called forth. East and west—Parliament and 'working men's class'—the lower and the theatre—we are happy to see vie with each other in the display of enthusiasm towards the person of our Queen, and indignation at the atrocious and deliberate attempt, which has been so providentially frustrated. And on this, now, one word. Nothing could be more cruel or unjust than to allow our zeal for the safety of our Sovereign to transport us into the infliction of a punishment not authorised by the laws of the land or natural justice. If there is (or rather were) any doubt as to the deliberate intention of the miscreant to perpetrate the alleged crime, he should, of course, have the benefit of that doubt. If it become clear, by the evidence on the trial, that he is really beside himself, let him be dealt with accordingly. It is a belief we would gladly indulge in if it is the belief which first suggests itself on the mention of a crime so apparently devoid of motive. At the same time none would deprecate more strongly than ourselves the entering upon this investigation with any determination to pardon—nothing could more entirely abhor that fatal promise of impunity which an over-lenient procedure in this instance would hold out to all those whose vanity or discontent, exaggerated into a kind of moral madness, may tempt them to similar unnatural attempts. If it is not a clear wrong, it is an imperative duty to make an example."

A MAD BULL.—On Monday evening at six o'clock, a large black bullock was seen proceeding at a furious rate along Bermondsey-road, in the direction of Deptford. Men, women, and children, took to their heels, and left the road clear for the infuriated animal, which met with nothing to stop it until it arrived at the Windmill, in the Lower-road, Deptford, where it knocked down two boys, who were standing in the road, and a little further on rushed at a woman, who was standing with an infant in her arms at her own door. The woman slipped in doors, and hastily shut to the door, but the beast rushed in with sillts force against it, that the panels in pieces, to the great terror of the poor woman. It then turned short round, and ran into a ditch, when a rope was thrown over its horns, and, with considerable difficulty, it was dragged out by the crowd that had collected. The poor brute plunged about so violently that its capture, after fastening the rope to a post, very prudently stood out of its way until it became exhausted. It had gradually wound the rope round the post until it was, in every sense "wound up," when the crowd, with the assistance of several policemen, succeeded in securing it, and about 11 at night it was safely lodged in the slaughter-house of Mr. Beale, New King-street, Deptford. A mob of about 500 persons accompanied it.

AN AUTUMN SUNSET.—From the new work of Dickens, entitled the "Life and Adventures of Martin Chuzzlewit," a book replete with the humorous utility of Boz, we extract the following beautiful passage:—"It was pretty late in the autumn of the year, when the declining sun, struggling through the mist which had obscured it all day, looked down brightly upon a little Wiltshire village within an easy journey of the fair old town of Salisbury. Like a sudden flash of memory or spirit kindling up the mind of an old man, it shed a glory upon the scene, in which its departed youth and freshness seemed to live again. The wet grass sparkled in the light; the scanty patches of verdure in the hedges—where a few green twigs yet stood together bravely, resisting to the last the tyranny of nipping winds and early frosts—took heart and brightened up; the stream which had been dull and sullen all day long, broke out into a cheerful smile; the birds began to chirp and twitter on the naked boughs, as though the hopeful creatures half believed that winter had gone by, and that spring was already. The vane upon the tapering spire of the old church glistened from its lofty station in sympathy with the general gladness; and from the ivy-shaded windows such gleams of light shone back upon the glowing sky, that it seemed as if the quiet building were the boarding-place of twenty summers, and all their ruddiness and warmth were stored within. Even those tokens of the season which speak emphatically of the coming winter, graced the landscape, and, for the moment, tinged its livelier features with no oppressive air of sadness. The fallen leaves, with which the ground was strewn, gave forth a pleasant fragrance, and subduing all harsh sounds of distant feet and wheels, created a repose in gentle unison with the light scattering of seed hither and thither by the distant husbandman, and with the noiseless passage of the plough as it turned up the rich brown earth, and wrought a graceful pattern in the stubbled fields. On the motionless branches of some trees, autumn berries hung like clusters of coral beads, as in those fabled orchards where the fruits were jewels; others, stripped of all their garniture, stood, each the centre of its little heap of bright red leaves, watching their slow decay; others again, still wearing theirs, had them all crunched and crackled up, as though they had been burnt; about the stems of some were piled in ruddy mounds, the apples they had borne that year; while others (hardy evergreens this class) showed somewhat stern and gloomy in their vigour, as charged by Nature with the admonition that it is not to her more sensitive and jo us favourites, she grants the longest term of life. Still athwart their darker boughs the sunbeams struck out paths of deeper gold; and the red light, mantling in among their swarthy branches, used them as foils to set its brightness off, and aid the lustre of the dying day. A moment, and the scene was no more. The sun went down beneath the long dark lines of hill and cloud which piled up in the west an airy city wall heaped on wall, and battlement on battlement; the light was all withdrawn; the shining church turned cold and dark; the stream forgot to smile; the birds were silent; and the gloom of winter dwelt on everything. An evening wind uprose too, and the slighter branches cracked and rattled as they moved, in skeleton dances, to its moaning music. The withering leaves, no longer quiet, hurried to and fro in search of shelter from its chill pursuit; the labourer unyoked his horses, and with head bent down, trudged briskly home beside them; and from the cottage windows, lights began to glance and wink upon the darkening fields."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

There is little news of interest in the Paris Papers. Some of the Opposition prints condemn the delay allowed by the Minister of Finance to the contractors of the loan of one hundred and fifty millions of francs, being the first part of the loan of four hundred and fifty millions authorised by the Chambers for the payment of each instalment. The period of one month is now increased to three months, the interest being reduced from 5 to 4 per cent. The Commerce remarks, that whilst M. Lacave Laplagne was representing the finances of France to be in the worst condition, during the debates on the navy estimates, he was issuing a decree stating that the funds of the public treasury exceeded the amount of the demands for the public service.

In the Chamber of Deputies on Monday afternoon the Budget of Marine was voted, after a short discussion on the slavery question in the French Colonies. The Budget of French Finances was then entered upon, and the entire Budget of Expences was expected to be passed at the close of the sitting.

A report was prevalent in Paris that a conspiracy against the King of the French had been discovered at Vernon The King was about to visit a cotton spinning manufactory of that town, which is close to the chateau of Bizy. Several of the workmen, it is said, plotted to make an attempt on his life. Three were arrested, and the principal flung himself into the river and perished The King visited the manufactory in question with his suite, and nothing remarkable took place.

The Journal des Debats, of Tuesday, defends the Finance Minister from the charge of favouring M. Rothschild, by allowing the holders of the rest of the loan to defer the payment of their instalments, paying but 3½ per cent in lieu of 5 per cent. during the delay. It explains that the French Treasury has 130 000,000 in the Bank, producing no interest, and does not want money. It would lose even the 3 per cent. interest on whatever was paid up regularly, as all no doubt would. Half the loan of 150,000,000f. has been paid.

The debate on railroads in the Chamber of Peers presents nothing remarkable; but M. Barthelmy and M. C. Dupin reminded the Government, that twenty years ago money had been voted for more than a dozen canals; that the estimates were but a small portion of the requisite expense; and that none of the canals were terminated. The same would be the case were a dozen railroads to be attempted at once.

The Moniteur de l'Armee mentions that the different brigades destined to form the corps of operations on the Marne would be concentrated on the banks of the river immediately after their inspection by the Dukes of Orleans and Nemours in the first fortnight of August. The presence of the Princess and the Frontiers of Luxembourg would coincide with the opening of the States of the Grand Duchy by the King of Holland, and it was thought that an interview between those illustrious personages would take place on that occasion.

SPAIN.

Barcelona journals of the 23rd and 24th ult. contain little news of interest. The fête of the operative weavers had passed off quietly, and we find no traces of the alarming state of things in that town described in the Bayonne papers of the 27th The latter intimate that the Regency was about to be proclaimed in Barcelona, and that General Van Halen had been concerting measures to put the forts into his possession in that city, having sent for reinforcements from all the strongholds in Catalonia, leaving barely sufficient troops to perform garrison duty therein. Some Madrid correspondence dwells on the excited feelings in Barcelona, and looks for some outbreak, and letters of Monday also mention that the tenor of the advices from Catalonia led to the conclusion that the ultra-Exaltados projected some movement.

The project of the law for the permanent establishment of 90,000 men and 40,000 men as a reserve, passed the Deputies by 80 against 33

The resignation of M. Surra, the Spanish Minister of Finance, and M. Camba, the Minister of War, was in consequence of the Congress, after a sitting of thirteen hours, having passed, on the 23th, the following motion, by 85 to 78 votes:—"The Congress declares that in the position in which the Ministry has placed itself, it wants, notwithstanding its good intentions, the influence and moral force necessary to insure the well-being of the country. There remains for it no alternative save retirement or the dissolution of the Cortes."

Ministers have as yet taken no resolution.

M. Ayllon has been appointed Minister of Finance ad interim. The duties of the War Minister have been transferred ad interim to the Minister of Marine

The King of Prussia will, says a letter from Berlin, commence his journey to St Petersburg on the 8th or 10th of next month After visiting some of the eastern provinces in his own kingdom he will embark at Dantzic, in the Russian Government steamer Iachora, for Cronstadt, whence he will proceed to St. Petersburgh.

THE HAGUE, MAY 30.

His Majesty the King went on Saturday to Loetsdyk. It is believed that his Majesty has gone to the Loo to welcome there his son King William Frederick, Count of Nassau, who was expected there yesterday evening. The commission for receiving subscriptions for Hamburgh has resolved that a contributions shall be handed over to the Consul of Hamburgh at Amsterdam; the sum of 10,000 florins was paid in last week On examining the project of law respecting a loan for defraying the expence of an iron railroad from Maestricht to the Prussian frontier, with a branch to Kerkrade, most of the members of the second chamber have observed that, however willing they may be to promote any useful undertaking, yet is so important a matter as the present, they are called on to consent to a measure which may add a considerable burthen to the financial condition of the kingdom, which is already so much embarrassed; they cannot come to a resolution without a fuller knowledge of the affair than they at present possess.

The Minister of Finance has sent an order to the receiver of taxes, expecting the mode to be adopted in receiving the contributions for Hamburgh. All the contributions are to be entered in a book, and regularly numbered from one upwards; the receipt on stamped paper for every sum must have the same number as that under which it is booked. A complete account is to be sent to the Minister every Saturday; the amount of each sum contributed, the name, initials, and marks, must be stated.

HAMBURGH, MAY 25

The Prussian Pioneers are now [illegible] settlements, after having completed the work which they undertook at the wish of the Senate. They are accompanied by the grateful acknowledgment of all those who observed their operations, especially of the authorities with whom they were especially connected. The manner in which they blew up the wall of St. Peter's Church, without affecting the steeple, which it was resolved to preserve, excited particular admiration. The police published a notice on the 27th, in which it states, that during the great disaster which had befallen Hamburgh, the assistance of foreign workmen was extremely welcome, and the kindness of the authorities of the neighbouring states in rendering this assistance will be ever gratefully remembered by the citizens of Hamburgh. At present there is no more want of the common class of labourers, and this notice is therefore given, with a request to the neighbouring authorities to prevent those persons who may think of coming to Hamburgh without the previous permission of the police, will be ordered to return to their homes.

TURKEY.

We have received, via Vienna, a letter from Constantinople, dated the 11th ult., four days later than the advices by the Levant Mail of the 21st ult. This communication contains the curious statement, that Semi Pacha, the diplomatic agent of the Pacha of Egypt at the Porte, had succeeded in his mission to induce the Ottoman Government to take off the hands of Mehemet Ali the six or seven ships of the line now rotting in the harbour of Alexandria; and as the price for this act of submission, the amount of the tribute was to be reduced. The old Pacha is stated to have the best of the bargain; as the vessels are scarcely sea-worthy, and were quite useless to him. Semi Pacha was expected to remain at Constantinople, having sent for his harem. It was rumoured in the Turkish capital that the Emperor of Russia had despatched an envoy to Circassia; but whether to propose terms of peace, or to convey a fresh defiance, was not accurately ascertained; but it was supposed, that as General Tchernicheff, the Minister of War, had been appointed, with a reinforcement of 20,000 men, commander-in-chief of the Russian army in Circassia, that a renewal of hostilities might be expected.

UNITED ST TES.

The Caledonia, Captain Lott, arrived at Liverpool on Sunday last, after a passage of ten days, having sailed from Boston at two o'clock, P M., of the 16th, and from Halifax at five P M., of the 18th ult. She brought a double Canadian Mail, and 57 passengers

The papers received by this conveyance extended New York journals to the 14th, Boston to the 15th, and Halifax to the 18th ult., inclusive, but they contain little matter of interest. Lord Ashburton's mission appeared to be prouressing in a satisfactory manner. Daniel Webster, Secretary of State to the United States, had addressed letters to the Governors of Massachusetts and Maine stating to the heavy expenses which had already attended the Boundary question, and recommending that each State should appoint a commissioner to confer with the General Government on a "line, or conventional line, by agreement with its terms, conditions," &c. To this letter the Governor of Massachusetts answered, that the Executive of that Commonwealth was already, by resolutions of the Legislature, authorised to do whatever might be necessary in the premises; and the Governor of Maine issued a proclamation convening the Legislature of that state on the 18th ult.

The New York Herald says that the disputed territory was to be purchased by England, for a sum supposed to be between 1,000,000 dollars and 2,000,000 dollars.

The Secretary of State, according to instructions, had addressed a letter to the House of Representatives, together with a bill to provide a revenue from imports, &c.

No definite settlement is yet announced of the points involved in the questions of right of search or visitation. We are in possession of a variety of letters bearing on the matter at issue, but, considering the state of negotiations, deem it prudent to suppress their publication at present.

Nobody seems to expect any indemnification for the Creole negroes, who got away on their own account, and who merely enjoyed the protection of the laws or the land to which they fled in common with others.

TEXAS.

A private letter, received by the Solway, on Saturday, dated Galveston (Texas), 1st May, has the following passage —" You will probably have odd accounts as to the state of Texas, but in reality everything is safe and quiet here The Indians are beyond the frontier, and as to the Mexicans, the question is whether the Texans shall invade Mexico or not. The uncertainty as to war has put a complete stop to trade."

Another account, by the same conveyance, says the Texans were making great preparations for war, the sinews of which were much wanted in their country, on the other hand, Santa Anna was determined to invade Texas Advices from Tampico state that 700 men had left that place for Matamoras, where 300 men from the south were to join them, for the purpose of entering the enemy's country The brig Tehoka, on her passage from Tobasco, saw a Spanish man-of-war cruising in search of the Texan squadron. The former vessel met the Texan sea force, consisting of a ship, corvette, and two schooners, on the 19th of April, off Sisal Castle, and the same day exchanged signals with a Spanish frigate steering westward. Eight American citizens who were captured in the unfortunate Santa Fe expedition had been liberated.

A proclamation has been issued by the President of Texas, declaring that all the ports of the Republic of Mexico on the eastern coast, from Tobasco in the state of Tobasco, to Matamoras, in the state of Tamaulipas, including those ports, are [illegible] the mouth of the Rio Grande del Norte, and the Brazos Santiago, and all the inlets, estancias, and passes on the said eastern coast of Mexico, and, from and after the date of such proclamation, namely, 20th of March, in a state of actual and absolute blockade by the armed vessels of the nation.

CUBA.

We learn from Manzanilla de Cuba, that a report had obtained there of a conflict between the soldiery and the black peasantry, in which fifty of the latter had been killed. It was stated that a number of runaway negroes had established themselves among a range of hills, about fifteen or twenty miles from St Jago de Cuba, where they form d a settlement very similar to that established among the back woods of Trelawny, near Dromilly, some years ago.

RHODE ISLAND.

A numerous meeting of the insurgents of Rhode Island was held at the Court House-parade, in Providence, the 12th ult, to hear a report from Washington

FINE ARTS.

We have unintentionally delayed to acknowledge the receipt of three very sweet lithographs by Taylor, from drawings by Dutton, of the yachts Zarifa, Mystery, and Kestrel, belonging to members of the Royal Yacht Squadron; each is most accurately delineated, and the execution is highly creditable to the spirited publisher, Mr. Remsden.

"Portrait of Mr. Henry Betty as Hamlet." That exceedingly clever young artist, Ouwhyn, jun., has just completed a characteristic likeness of the son of the celebrated "Roscius," William Henry West Betty, in his favourite character of Hamlet. The likeness, we understand, is admirable, and the costume and minor details are well managed.

"The Vesper Bell." Engraved by Coombs, from a drawing by C. Ruben, is a delicious effort of artistic skill. The subject, scenery, and objects are Italian, and the moment chosen is that when the business of life is suspended for the purpose of devotion. We wish the female had possessed little more attractiveness of form and feature; the countenances of the monk and the boatman are expressive and unexceptionable.

THE ITINERARY OF LONDON.

REGENT-STREET.

THE PROMENADERS.

Will the reader indulge us with the honour of his company in a stroll down Regent-street? Observe that group of loungers! See with what a felicitous blending of the amiable and deferential the gentleman doffs his hat! Shade of Brummell! was there ever such a coat! The genius of ugliness, which, in ancient days, walked the town in bag-wigs and hooped petticoats, has, in these later times, taken refuge in Taglionis, Chesterfields, and their innumerable variations of deformity.

The evocation of Brummell brings to our mind an anecdote of that great man, which we have never seen in print. Some person ventured to inquire of him if his parents were living?

"Haven't the least idea," was the reply.

"Very odd," was the rejoinder, that a man shouldn't know if his father and mother were alive or dead! You surely must know."

"Don't, upon my honour," said Brummell; "but if I might venture an opinion, I should incline to say they were not."

"And wherefore?" pursued the querist.

"Because," explained Brummell, "when I last saw them, they were poking peas down their throats with a knife; and, I suppose, they cut them before dinner was over."

"Will you allow me to assist you to some spinach?" said a friend to Brummell once at dinner.

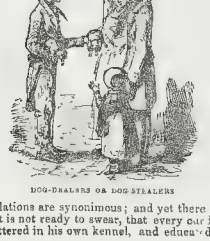
"No, thank you," was the reply.

"Do you never take vegetables?" inquired the other.

"I once ate a pea," said the beau.

OGLING THE SHOP GIRLS.

Apropos of puppies! Look at those two heroes, more fitted for the meridian of Waterloo-place, than of Waterloo; darting their killing glances through three quarters of an inch of plate glass, at the two damsels in the shop, utterly reckless of the pain they inflict, because they know there is no stout cudgel, with the stalwart fist of a father or a brother at the small end of it, to chastise their audacity.



DOG-DEALERS OR DOG-STEALERS

The appellations are synonimous; and yet there is not one of them that is not ready to swear, that every cur in his catalogue was littered in his own kennel, and educated under his own eye. With equal veracity and volubility, he protests that they are all quite young things, whereas there is not a brute among them that is not a great-grandfather; as, in fact, they ought to be; for to bring puppies to Regent-street would, indeed, be to carry coals to Newcastle. And yet some of these are wonderful dogs after all; many a poodle having, on his arrival at his new master's home, cast his skin and come out a turnspit.

THE TIGER.

Although not like his Bengalese namesake, measuring ten feet from the tip of his nose to the tip of his tail, he is to the full as fierce and as full of mischief.

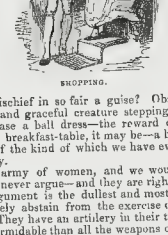
Precocious as his boots, he is a man in everything but inches—ogles the lady's maid, looks horsewhips at his rival, the manncok, and will doubtlessly boast as many conquests as Alexander before he has grown up into groomhood.

Yet, after all, your English tiger and groom are unrivalled in all the world. In France an imitation of them would be but different varieties of the monk-y in leather shorts; in Russia, a ditto of bears; in America—but we had forgotten—it is the land of freedom, and there are no servants there—they have only helps and—slaves!

FOOTMEN AT SWAN AND EDGAR'S.

Behold the living superfluities—the laced lumber of fashion, discussing the characters of their several mistresses, for whom they are waiting, with as little ceremony and tenderness as they would crack nuts withal. Look at you six feet of sleepiness, drowsy from the joint effects of his lady's late hours and his own proper and individual dissipation.

An instance of the modesty which characterises the genus occurred at a public dinner during the past month. The footmen of some noblemen who were guests at the entertainment, sent an application for champagne to beguile the tedium of waiting for their lords. "Their masters do without it," was the pithy reply of the steward, to whom the requisition was conveyed, "and so must they."



SHOPPING.

Came ever mischief in so fair a guise? Observe that elegantly-dressed and graceful creature stepping from the carriage to purchase a ball dress—the reward of a well-fought battle over the breakfast-table, it may be—a battle ending, as every contest of the kind of which we have ever heard, in favour of the lady.

Give us an army of women, and we would conquer the world! They never argue—and they are right—they see that among men argument is the dullest and most profitless thing in life, and wisely abstain from the exercise of any such useless weapon. They have an artillery in their tongue—eyes we mean—more formidable than all the weapons of war, and, failing these, the tear and the smile—worth an army of sappers and miners. We will wind up with an epigram, somewhat germane to the matter in hand:—

> Tom at Howell and James' saw a maid to his liking,
> Her hair was so graceful—her cheeks were so striking;
> But Tom's conduct, methinks, was more striking than all,
> For he gave her at parting two cuffs and a fall.* H.

ANONYMOUS CHARITABLE BENEFACTION.—It gives us unfeigned pleasure to observe that that useful charity, the Charing-cross Hospital, which, during the last year, has sustained the severe loss, by death, of many of its earliest and best supporters, has received a very liberal donation from an anonymous benefactor; and we learn also that the Goldsmiths' Company, so well known for their charity and munificence, and for their patronage of works of humanity and utility, have nobly stepped forward to aid of the Charing-cross Hospital, and presented it, through Mr. Lane, the clerk of the Company, with a second handsome benefaction.

The Middlesex magistrates on Thursday adopted an address to her Majesty on her happy deliverance from the attempt against her life.

* Of the finest Meehlin, no doubt.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND MAGAZINE.—Apart from the theological features of this monthly publication, there are some excellently-written articles upon subjects of general interest. The account of "Rochester Cathedral," which is illustrated, is well drawn up; and some of the poetry interspersed through the same number is of a high character. We would direct attention to an article entitled "The Living Influence of the Gospel Apparent in the Elevation of the Thoughts," by the Rev. J. E. Johnson, pp. 393—409.

THE SPORTSMAN. We have glanced over the June number of this amusing and useful miscellany, and can perceive no diminution of its wonted interest. "The Adventures of a Sporting Gentleman," by the Rough Rider, and "Sporting Writers," by Nimrod, may both be studied with advantage. The embellishments are, as usual, first-rate.

THE FARMER'S MAGAZINE.—This journal, dedicated to the farmers of the United Kingdom, possesses much of exclusive and valuable information upon subjects affecting the agricultural interest; and, we doubt not, possesses considerable influence amongst those connected with it. The illustrations are beautifully executed.

CHAMBERS' LONDON JOURNAL.—Among the multitude of periodicals that are continually issuing from the press, it is gratifying to observe that one so eminently deserving patronage is properly appreciated by the public, and maintains its ground triumphantly. The selections for this miscellany are made with correct judgment and excellent taste; and we know not a work of its class we would sooner put into the hands of the young and the innocent. Some of the articles are equal to any in the higher class of serials now published.

Notices of the following works will appear in our next publication:—

"The Siege of Barcelona," a Poem in Three Cantos. By Lieut. Col. G. B. Hippesley. Cleaver.

"The Traduced." By the Author of "The Fatalist." Boone.

"Sleep at Will, a Farce," By H. L. Carter, Esq. Elliott, Ashford.

"Facts and Figures," No. 10. Hooper.

"Part Music," edited by John Hullah, Class A., Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass, with Score. Parker.

"Manasseh, a Tale of the Jews." Hatchard.

ARTICLES OF LADIES' DRESS,

IN THE TIME OF QUEEN PHILIPPA.

> I beheld them on a day
> When their looks outflourished May;
> And their dresses did out-brave
> All the pride the fields then have.
> BEN JONSON.

Embroidered Shifts.—These, ornamented at the bosoms and collars with needlework, were much in fashion in Queen Philippa's time, and "shifts white and plaited" are frequently spoken of as part of the habit belonging to an elegant lady of the period. The chemise of Lady Triamore is described to be "white chaisil, with embellished borders, and laced on both sides;" another poet speaks of a "chemise of chaisil, delicately wrought with thread." If we may take the word of Mistress Girtred (Heywood), they cost as much as three pounds a piece.

The Partelets.—These were made of various stuffs of the most valuable and delicate kind; they were made generally of Venice gold, white thread, lawn, and wrought with gold about the collars.

The Tippet.—This much resembled the partelet; it was worn about the neck, and varied in size and form, being sometimes large and long as a mantle.

The bands for the neck were propped up with wires; others fell upon the shoulders, and were denom nated falling bands. In a comedy of the time, a gallant bespeaks of a milliner five yards of lawn to make his mistress some falling bands, "three falling one upon the other; that (says he) is the new edition."

The Cote, or Coat.—This dress was much affected by well-made women of fashion; it was a dress beautifully adapted to the spring and summer; it was without lining, and fitted so close to the body, that on slim, personable shapes it showed off the form to great disadvantage. These small coats were called petit-cotes (whence our modern petticoat); they had, however, generally trains to them, and were then called long cotes: women of fashion wore them dashingly ornamented with ermine and miniver.

The Waistcoat. This was also a lady's garment; the following entry among the Harleian MSS. describes them: "Two wascotes for women, being of clothe of silver, embroidered; both of them having sleeves."

The Kirtle, or Kirtel, was frequently a habit of state, and worn by persons of high rank. These were of different textures and different colours, but especially of green; and were sometimes laced so closely to the body, as to answer the service of the bodice, or stays. We find the following measures for the Queen's kirtle, viz., six yards and half a quarter of cloth; and, in another instance, seven yards of purple cloth of damask gold for the same purpose. The young court ladies, however, only wore them made of "three yards of tawney satin."

The Super-tunic.—This vestment was large and loose, having broad and deep sleeves; it was made with marble cloth, or cloth of variegated colours, like the veins of marble.

The Sosquenie, or Surquanye, is mentioned by William de Lorris as the handsomest dress that a lady could wear: when white and nicely plaited, it was perfectly becoming: he preferred it to the coat.

Sleeves.—These were often made distinct from the body-vestment in Queen Philippa's day: so that in the inventories of her women we find them entered by themselves, thus: "three pair of purple satin sleeves for women; one pair of linen sleeves, passed with gold over the arm, quilted with black silk, and wrought with flowers between the panes, and at the hands; one pair of sleeves, of purple gold tissue damask wire, each sleeve tied with aglets of gold; one pair of crimson satin sleeves, four buttons of gold being set upon each sleeve, and in every button nine pearls."

The Stomacher was common to men and women. The Queen and other ladies of the household often wore them of purple gold, raised with silver tissue and damask wire, and another of crimson satin, embroidered all over with flat gold and damask pearls, and lined with sarcenet.

The Apron, called by the old poets the Lap-cloth, became fashionable among persons of the highest rank, and was made of the most costly materials.

The Mantle, or Cloak.—The richest ermines, sables, and furs, adorned this beautiful appendage of the neck and shoulders. Some of them were called by the name of Crocea and resembled very much in length and fashion the ecclesiastical cope; it was at first used by the Cardinals, and for that reason lost its original name, and was called by the ladies a Cardinal.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SATURDAY 11.—Earl of Chatham died, 1778.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1842.

THE providential escape, under God's mercy, of our beloved Sovereign from the hand of the assassin, who has recently attempted her life, has so filled all hearts, and occupied all tongues, that other topics have dwindled into secondary importance; and even national interests of the highest moment and purpose, have become absorbed in the affectionate and almost personal devotion which all classes of her Majesty's subjects have manifested towards their Queen.

The abstract theme of the regicide has been treated on by us in our first page, with as much temper as the enthusiasm of loyalty, blended with the conflicting feelings of indignation at our Sovereign's danger, and heartfelt joy at her escape, would allow us to command; but there are one or two other points connected with the event, that ought not to be lost sight of by a public observer.

And our foremost landmark of admiration should surely be that noble heroism and inherited dauntlessness of heart, which prompted her Majesty to screen the ladies of her court from any participation in the danger she knew she was about to dare; and instead of converting her knowledge of the peril she had just encountered into a caution for the future—to make it only the means of exhibiting a generosity as pure, as disinterested, and as true to the beautiful character of all heroic virtue, as any that ever crowned the name, or hallowed the memory, of woman.

A second topic of the liveliest congratulation and gratitude for all her subjects should be in the fact, that her Majesty has manifested a firm, earnest, and gallant determination not to be separated from her people by any of the contingencies of public life. She will not be debarred from her daily converse with those who have made her the object of their love and reverence. She will meet them in their Houses of Legislature—at their theatres—at their public festivals—in their parks—at their races—and in their streets. In a word, she will court that fearless confidence and relying familiarity which most engenders affection, and has so surely endeared her to the public heart.

Finally, the Queen herself should triumph in the genuine burst of national loyalty, which has been so warmly, so widely, so proudly, and so unequivocally displayed. We never saw a more grand or noble demonstration of public feeling, than has been everywhere made. From the highest to the lowest, the whole land has been astir—addresses have poured in, in every form that affectionate enthusiasm could prompt or loyal energy devise—and our Sovereign's popularity has been confirmed with a glorious confirmation, that, while it must have touched the tenderer susceptibilities of her woman's nature, must have carried pride and happiness and exultation into the bosom of the Queen.

WE are glad to find that the attention of the Legislature has at last been brought to bear upon a subject which we opened to our readers in the second number of this journal, and which we have still further pointed at—as a preliminary paper to many yet to come—in our article on the recent attack upon the Queen. We allude to the prevalence of a disposition to give crime as much notoriety as almost makes it fame; and to foster a kind of prurient humanity, which rather engenders a sympathy with vice, than tends to elevate even the milder virtues of Christianity. And while it produces this distorted effect upon one class—we mean the higher—it actually demoralizes the lower, by creating an avidity for the excitement of criminal acts and punishments, and for all the blacker exhibition of depravity or its retribution, which dishonour the human heart.

On Wednesday night the remarkable instance of the unseemly pressure of public curiosity in the case of the murderer Good, was brought by Lord Clanricarde under the consideration of the House of Peers, and the sentiments which were there elicited, were almost simultaneously responded to in the House of Commons in an answer to an appeal from Mr. Vernon Smith. In the Commons the miserable and destructive social tendency of the morbid appetite we complain of, was at once acknowledged and reprobated by Sir James Graham, so that we may indulge a hope that the best reflection and energies of the Home Secretary's department may be applied to the corrupting influences which Lord Lansdowne in the other house so truly and eloquently denounced.

"Though it was necessary," he said, "for the sake of example, that executions should be public, a man, when in the last moments of an unhappy existence, suspended between life and death, should be left to himself to prepare for his doom. There should be no aggravation of it, and even on that account he should be kept from public view. If criminals received this kind of notice, there were some minds so peculiarly constituted, that instead of aggravation of punishment, it might be a source of morbid gratification, and he (the noble Lord) believed, that in many cases in this and other countries, crimes had been attempted and committed from a morbid appetite for notoriety. He was sorry to say, that in such cases persons, he would not say mischievous or wicked, but injudicious persons, with ill-regulated minds, derived a vicious pleasure from communication with such criminals, and thus supplied them with a motive for committing the most horrid crimes that had disgraced humanity. He rejoiced that his noble friend (Lord Clanricarde) had brought this subject under the consideration of the house."

THE LATE ATTEMPT UPON THE QUEEN'S LIFE.

THANKSGIVING PRAYER (as drawn by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and ordered by the Privy Council on Friday last.)—A form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God, for His late merciful preservation of the Queen from the atrocious and treasonable attempt against her sacred person, on Monday, the 30th of May, 1842. To be used at Morning and Evening Service, after the General Thanksgiving, in all Churches and Chapels throughout England and Wales, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, on Sunday, the 5th of this instant June, or so soon as the ministers thereof shall receive the same; and to be continued for thirty days afterwards.

"Almighty and Everlasting God, Creator and Governor of the World, who by Thy gracious providence hast oftentimes preserved Thy chosen servants, the sovereigns whom Thou hast set over us, from the malice of wicked men; we offer unto Thee our humble and hearty thanksgivings for Thy great mercy now again vouchsafed to us in frustrating the late traitorous attempt on the life of our Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria.

"Continue, we beseech Thee, O merciful Lord, Thy watchful care over her. Be Thou her shield and defence against the devices of secret treason, and the assaults of open violence. Extend Thy gracious protection to the Prince her Consort, the Prince of Wales, and the whole of the Royal Family. Direct and prosper her counsels, and so guide and support her by Thy Holy Spirit, that evermore trusting in Thee, she may faithfully govern Thy people committed to her charge, to their good, and to the glory of Thy holy Name.

"And to us and all her subjects, O Lord, impart such a measure of Thy grace, that under a deep and lasting sense of Thy manifold mercy, we may show forth our thankfulness unto Thee, by loyal attachment to our Sovereign, and dutiful obedience to all Thy commandments.

"Give ear, we beseech Thee, O merciful Father, to these our supplications and prayers, which we humbly offer before Thee in the Name and Mediation of Jesus Christ, our only Saviour and Redeemer. Amen."

About half-past ten on Saturday morning, a calamitous accident occurred at Apothecaries' Hall, in the yard at the back of the premises, adjoining the Laboratory. It appears that, at the urgent request of the East India Company, the authorities at Apothecaries' Hall had undertaken, contrary to their usual practice, the preparation of fulminating mercury for the percussion caps intended to be used in the East Indies. With this view, on Friday and Saturday, Mr. Hennell, the Company's chemical operator, had been preparing about 6lb. of fulminating mercury, containing one third of its weight in water, with a view to ascertain its actual strength. At ten o'clock, attended by only one of the labourers, Mr. Hennell was standing before a block of wood about three feet high, whose circumference could not be less than six feet, upon which was placed a white evaporating dish containing the mercury, the locality being between the distil-house, and what is called the gas-room, where formerly gas was manufactured for the use of the Hall, but which now is used for the purpose of containing various small bottles filled with essential oils. At this moment the labourer in attendance left the operator, in order to look after a furnace fire, where in the earlier part of the day 400 grains of mercury had been drying, and which it is supposed had been taken out by Mr. Hennell, in order to test the condition in which they were. Scarcely, however, had the labourer left the place before he heard three slight explosions between each of which there only elapsed a few seconds, but which was followed by a loud report, the origin of which, to the present time, appears to be perfectly inexplicable, although it is supposed that the slighter reports were occasioned by Mr. Hennell striking a small portion of the preparation with his finger, and the fatal explosion must have arisen from a particle of the matter having fallen upon the larger mass. By this accident, the exploded preparation struck Mr. Hennell immediately below the chest, and, taking an upward direction, carried away the right arm and the same side of the face, together with the whole of the upper portion of the head, as well as nearly the whole of the viscera, laying open the entire chest, and exhibiting the action of the heart and lungs. Some parts of the remains were scattered over the tops of the building, and other portions were actually picked up by the workmen from the roofs of the adjoining houses. The deceased's right arm was found on the roof of Apothecaries' Hall, at a distance of full forty yards from the scene of the fatal event, and had, in its progress, indented considerably the leaden gutter-pipe. One of his fingers was picked up in Union-street, a distance of 100 yards, by a person passing at the time, and must have been forced over the high building of the Hall. The labourers belonging to the Hall collected the scattered fragments, and deposited them in a spot set apart for their reception. The glass contained in the whole of the window-frames (made of iron) were broken, by which at least one thousand panes were demolished, exhibiting a picture of destruction seldom witnessed. The block of wood upon which the dish was placed was so much splintered, as to appear as though it had been struck by a cannon-ball fired from an eighteen-pounder. The large paving-stone upon which the block stood is likewise shattered into twenty pieces. About a yard square in the middle of a wall nearly two feet thick, is thrown inwards four or five inches by the force of the explosion. The deceased gentleman was held in the highest esteem by every person in the establishment, in which he had been engaged upwards of thirty years.

THE Indian Mail, which arrived at Marseilles on Wednesday night, brings, we lament to say, an account of the fall of Ghuznee. The place capitulated and surrendered, on condition that the garrison be safely conducted to Cabul. On the other hand, Colonel Pollock had forced the Khyber Pass, and taken possession of the forts commanding it, and would, no doubt, march to the relief of Jellalabad. General Sale, in a sortie from that place, overthrew the insurgents.

A rumour prevailed that Akhbar Khan had been badly wounded.

General Knott had gained some advantage on the side of Kandahar, but General England had not yet joined him. It is reported that Shah Soojah had been poisoned.

There is no news from China.

We shall next week present a series of interesting Engravings illustrative of the events detailed in the despatches.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert took an airing on Monday afternoon in an open carriage and four, attended by Colonel Arbuthnot, the equerry in waiting on her Majesty, and Colonel Wylde, the equerry to his Royal Highness. On the return of the royal party to Buckingham Palace, and after the treasonable attempt on her Majesty's life, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by his Excellency Count Mensdorff, arrived at the palace, and was followed by their Royal Highnesses the Duke of Cambridge and Prince George of Cambridge, and by his Serene Highness the Duke of Saxe Meiningen. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, sent during the evening to make their inquiries after her Majesty.

Later in the evening the Lord Mayor, accompanied by Mr. Alderman Gibbs, arrived at Buckingham Palace to make his dutiful inquiries after her Majesty's health.

A Privy Council was held at Buckingham Palace on Friday, at which her Majesty presided. The Cabinet Ministers, Great Officers of the Household, and several other Privy Councillors, were in attendance. At the Council, we understand, the Archbishop of Canterbury was requested to prepare a form of prayer to Almighty God for his providence in safely preserving her Majesty from the attempt of an assassin to take her life.

Mr. George Hayter, and Mr. Charles Ross, the artists, received the honour of knighthood at the levee on Wednesday.

A meeting of the East India Company was held on Friday, at which addresses of congratulation to the Queen and Prince Albert, on her Majesty's providential escape from the attempt at assassination, after a few words from Mr. Weeding, Mr. Twining, and Mr. David Solomons, were agreed to with acclamation.

Her Majesty will give another grand state ball at Buckingham Palace the second week in June; but it is yet undecided whether it is to be a bal costumé, or merely a full-dress assembly.

The Queen Dowager will be present at the "second great choral meeting" of the singing-classes at Exeter hall.

The Dowager Lady Lyttelton, the preceptress of the Princess Royal, has been staying at Buckingham Palace during the last week, having entered on the duties of her new appointment. Her ladyship will principally reside in future at the Palace

The Duke and Duchess of Leeds and suite left the Clarendon Hotel on Sunday, for Rotterdam, by the Batavier, whence their graces proceed to the Hague, on a visit to the King and Queen of Holland, during his Majesty's annual hawking parties at the Loo.

Lord George Lennox, Lord in Waiting to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, has arrived in town, from his embassy to the Court of Saxe-Coburg Gotha.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince de Joinville, and the Duke d'Aumale, sons of his Majesty the King of the French, were expected to have arrived in England, upon a visit to her Majesty, previously to the Ascot Races; but their Royal Highnesses are not now expected until about the 15th or 16th of the month.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the illustrious visitors at the Castle, and attended by a numerous suite, will proceed to Ascot on the "Golp Cup day," and, most probably, should the weather prove favourable, on the following Friday.

The race ball will take place on Wednesday, the 8th, at the Town Hall, Windsor, under the stewardship of the four stewards of the races, and the Hon. Henry Ashley, M.P.; Sir East George Clayton East, Bart.; and Colonel Richardson, of the Royal Horse Guards (blue).

The fête given at Charlton on Wednesday, for the benefit of the Royal Kent Dispensary, went off with great éclat. The fineness of the day, and the variety of amusements provided, attracted a very large assemblage, among whom were many fashionables of note. Great praise is due to those who had the management of the fête, for the excellent arrangements made for the gratification of the visitors, and especially to Sir T. M. Wilson, Bart., who so liberally allowed the use of his beautiful park. The entertainment was, in every respect, a satisfactory one, and, from the number of visitors, it is probable that the charity will have been much benefitted.

NATURE AND ART.—Nothing in art can continue to dazzle but so long as we are unaccustomed to the contemplation of it. Let a person dwell for some months—nay, a few weeks—in one of the mansions that has the most ordinary taste and fancy, and he will find that by degrees his vision becomes so used to the objects which first enchanted him, that he soon ceases to be sensible of their presence, or to feel aught more than that general complacency excited in the mind by being surrounded by agreeable objects. It is otherwise with the beauties of nature. The more the eye becomes accustomed to behold them, the more pleasure do they convey: each point of view gains a new interest by being contrasted with others; the different periods of the day or season change the appearance, and throw a fresh light over the scene, that prevents its ever becoming monotonous.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE DERBY DAY.—Monday evening a long investigation was gone into before Mr. Payne, City Coroner, at St. Bartholomew's, on Mr. William Plenty, aged 62, late parish clerk of St. Sepulchre's, who was killed under the following circumstances:—Wednesday evening, deceased and his son were walking along the Kennington-road, at the end of Cross-street, Newington, when, owing to the number of pedestrians, it being the Derby Day, they were compelled with many others to walk in the road. Thus was between seven and eight. On getting near Newington church a horseman was observed coming from Kennington, at the rate of 12 or 13 miles an hour, the horse galloping. The deceased was called to by the people passing to get out of the way, but before he could do so (so furious was the rate the rider was going) the horse struck him with such force that he was knocked down, the animal's hinder legs trampling on him. The rider continued at the same rate for about 50 yards, when the horse was stopped by a waggon, but for which he would have got clear off. The deceased was picked up in an insensible state, and taken to the hospital. On the horse being stopped, the rider, who appeared the worse for liquor, gave the name of A. W. H. Colston, and said he had come from Epsom. The horse appeared much fatigued with the distance and the rate it had come at. On the part of the rider, evidence was given that the horse was frightened by some mechanics on the road, and that he had lost all control over it. The deceased died on Saturday from the severe effects of the injuries he received. The jury, after a most careful inquiry of four hours' duration, returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

RISE AND FALL OF NAPOLEON.—Ten years afterwards (the American war), there broke out by far the most alarming danger of universal dominion which had ever threatened Europe. The most military people in Europe became engaged in a war for their very existence. Invasion on the frontiers, civil war, and all imaginable horrors raging within, the ordinary relations of life went to wreck, and every Frenchman became a soldier. It was a multitude numerous as the hosts of Persia, but animated by the courage and skill and energy of the old Romans. One thing alone was wanting, that which Pyrrhus and the Romans wanted to conquer the world, a general and a ruler like himself. There was wanting a master hand to restore and preserve, to peace at home, and to concentrate and direct the immense military resources of France against her foreign enemies. And such a one appeared in Napoleon. Pacifying La Vendee, receiving back the emigrants, restoring the church, re-modelling the law, personally absolute, yet carefully preserving and maintaining all the great points which the nation had won at the revolution, Napoleon united in himself not only the power but the whole will of France, and that power and will were guided by a genius for war such as Europe had never seen since Cæsar The effect was about truly magical In November, 1799, he was made first consul; he found France humbled by defeats, his Italian conquests lost, he all but invaded, on one frontier threatened. He took the field in May, 1800; and in June the whole fortune of the war was changed, and Austria driven out of Lombardy by the victory of Marengo Still the flood of the tide rose higher and higher, and every successive wave of its advance swept away a kingdom. Earthly state has never reached a prouder pinnacle than when Napoleon, in June, 1812, gathered his army at Dresden; that mighty host, unequalled in all time, of 450,000, not men, merely, but effective soldiers, and there received the homage of subject kings And now, what was the principal adversary of this tremendous power? By whom was it checked, and resisted, and put down? By none, save by nothing but the direct and manifest interposition of God. I know of no language so well fitted to describe that victorious advance to Moscow, and the utter humiliation of the retreat, as the language of the prophet with respect to the advance and subsequent destruction of the host of Sennacherib: "When they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses," applies almost literally to that memorable night of frost in which twenty thousand horses perished, and the strength of the French army was utterly broken. Human instruments no doubt were employed in the remainder of the work, nor would I deny to Germany and Prussia the glories of that great year, 1813, nor to England the honours of her victories in Spain, nor of the crowning victory of Waterloo. But at the distance of thirty years, those who lived in the time of danger, and remember its magnitude, and now calmly review what there was in human strength to avert it, must acknowledge, I think, beyond all controversy, that the deliverance of Europe from the dominion of Napoleon was effected neither by Russia, nor by Germany, nor by England, but by the hand of God alone.—Dr. Arnold

SERIOUS ACCIDENT. A serious accident occurred on Wednesday to Joseph Boardman, Esq., of the Bank of England, 69 years of age The unfortunate gentleman, about half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, was proceeding along the Poultry on his way homewards, when he stepped on a piece of orange-peel, and fell against the kerb with fearful violence. He was picked up in a state of insensibility, and conveyed to a neighbouring surgeon's, when it was ascertained that his left arm was fractured in a shocking manner, and that he had received a severe wound in his head His removal to St. Thomas's Hospital was considered necessary, where he lies in a precarious state

SPECIMENS OF FRENCH ADVERTISING. A dealer in hams advertises that his hams are so well cured that the longer they are kept the better they are, and of such an excellent quality, that, if eaten constantly by women of the worst temper imaginable, they will render them gentle and tractable as lambs! They are particularly recommended as diet for children, to give them a quiet disposition. Another person advertises pommade for promoting the growth of the hair; and states that he is so certain of its efficacy, that he makes a rule of never accepting any payment of a purchaser, however bald, until he have his head covered with hair.—Literary Gazette.

SINCE FRANCIS has been in Newgate he has conducted himself well He appears composed, and exhibits some appearance of being aware of the fearful point on in which he is placed. Of course, none of the officers or others connected with the gaol have had any conversation with him in reference to the offence with which he stands charged. A turnkey is continually with him to prevent all possibility of his making any attempt at self-destruction, but his conduct does not give the slightest ground for supposing that he would commit such an act, even had he an opportunity. The conduct of Cooper, the man charged with the murder of the constable at Highbury, forms a striking contrast with that of Francis. He has been so violent and brutal on various occasions that he has effectually alienated the kind feelings of all those with whom he has come in contact while in prison. Inspector Maclean, of the city police, has ascertained beyond a doubt, that he had John Francis in custody on a charge of robbery about a year ago.

EARLY FRUIT. Some remarkably fine ripe cherries were last week taken from a tree in the garden of Mr. Wm. Hamilton, of Great Corby, near Carlisle

SOUTHAMPTON, Wednesday.—Captain Elliot, the recently appointed Consul-General at the Republic of Texas, who has conducted so much notoriety from the manner in which he managed affairs in China, took his departure this afternoon for the seat of his future diplomatic exertions, in the Clyde Royal West India mail-steamer, which got under weigh and left this port between one and two o'clock. The Clyde will touch at Falmouth to take in her mail-bags; thence she will proceed to Corunna, Madeira, and Barbadoes. She does not carry out many passengers, not above twenty. Among her cargo she has 400 bottles of quicksilver for mining operations. The Great Liverpool steamer, belonging to the Oriental and Peninsula Steam-ship Company, took her departure for Malta and Alexandria between twelve and one o'clock this afternoon. She carries out about forty passengers, including several officers who are about to join their respective regiments in the East Indies, among whom are Captains Prescott, Bennett, and Green; and Lieutenants Bamberger and Wright. The Great Liverpool will touch at Falmouth to take in the mail for Malta and for India, by the overland route.

THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.—It is, perhaps, not generally known, that his Grace the High Commissioner is a descendant of one of the leaders of the Covenanters at the battle of Bothwell-brier. Patrick Macdowal, of Freuch, brought a body of several hundred men into the field, and, after the conflict, was compelled to seek safety in Holland. Having escaped to England, his estate was confiscated, and given to the well-known Graham, of Claverhouse, who made divers attempts to get possession, but was resisted by the tenantry. On the revolution the estate was restored to Patrick, the son of the expatriated Covenanter, who was then dead. John, the grandson, married Lady Penelope Crichton, who was the mother of Patrick Macdowal, of Freuch, who, in right of his mother, afterwards became Earl of Dumfries, and his daughter married Lord Mountstuart, of which marriage his Grace is the eldest, and Lord James Stuart, the member for the Ayr burghs, the second son. Caledonian Mercury

THE MACREADY TESTIMONIAL.—The subscription list for the purpose of presenting Mr. Macready with a splendid testimonial closed on Tuesday. The testimonial is a splendid piece of workmanship, and is composed of silver, standing about thirty-one inches in height, and forms an elaborate group of figures, representing Shakspeare on a pedestal, at the base of which is seated a figure of Macready dressed in the costume of the ancient drama. He is represented as engaged in the restoration of the original text of Shakspeare's plays.

A "DARNATION" GOOD ONE.—An old lady in the west of England, for twenty successive years, had darned her stockings with the same needle: in fact, so used was the said needle to its work, that frequently the lady's leaving the room was the signal for cautious darning without her! When the old lady died the needle was found by her relatives, and for a long time nobody could thread it, nor could they discover what obstructed the threads, when, by microscopic observation, they observed a tear in the eye of it.—New York Paper.

HOW TO OPEN A BANK.—A New York paper remarks that it knows a poor devil of a printer who intends to open a bank as soon as he can borrow a crowbar!

Mr. C. C Martin, who has been recently unseated for Southampton, talks of putting up again for that town, when the present Parliament is dissolved: should he succeed, the Liberals will unseat him again, on the ground of his being an alien. He was born abroad. His mother was a woman of colour. Mr. Martin is immensely rich, having, besides landed property, nearly £300,000 in the funds.

The novel case, at the instance of the Earl of Buchan against Lady Cardross, for restitution of the infant children of her ladyship and the late Lord Cardross, regarding which so many marvellous stories have lately appeared in the London papers, was before the Court of Session, Edinburgh, on Thursday, on a reclaiming note from her ladyship, who appealed against an order pronounced on Lord Buchan's petition, presented to the Lord Ordinary during vacation, whereby the Lord Ordinary ordained the custody of the children to be given to the Earl of Buchan, as their natural guardian. The Lord President, the other judges concurring, pronounced the opinion of the Court that the application to the Court in vacation was competent – that the Lord Ordinary had power to entertain it—that his order was, in the circumstances stated in the papers, and to the effect it was pronounced, quite correct—and that, in the meantime, the children must, in terms of it, be delivered to the interim custody of the petitioner, the Earl of Buchan.—Edinburgh Witness.

THE FORCE OF POLITENESS.—The following pleasing anecdote is told by M. Casimir Bonjour, in the course of an essay on politeness:—"The Marchioness de Coislin one day solicited an audience of Fouché, then minister of police. The audience was granted, but Fouché, who was resolved to refuse whatever the marchioness might ask for, received her standing, with his elbow resting on the chimney-piece, and did not invite her to a seat. 'Citizen minister,' said the marchioness 'I come to ask what crime my sister, Madame d'Avaray, has committed, that she should be exiled?' 'She is an enemy of the Government,' replied Fouché, 'and has the audacity to set it at defiance.' 'She audacious?' retorted the marchioness, 'she defy the First Consul? How little you know her. She is so timid, that she would not even venture to say, "Citizen Minister, have the goodness to hand me a chair."' At these words, Fouché was so disconcerted that he left all his courtesy to be hostile. Mad. de Coislin had a chair, and Mad. d'Avaray received permission to return to Paris."

ANECDOTE OF DR. JOHNSON.—Dr. Johnson, being introduced to a reverend prelate, who had long been desirous of knowing him, the latter took the opportunity of walking with the doctor through St. James's Park, for the purpose of improving his acquaintance. The doctor, however, did not happen to be in very communicative humour, and the bishop was at a loss what kind of a remark to venture upon by way of opening a conversation; at length, after a pause, turning to his companion, he observed that the trees around them grew very large and strong. "Sir," said the cynic, "they have nothing else to do."

CURIOUS ILLUSTRATION.—It is not enough that we have once said, and tried to be sure, that we mean so, as to go ahead, till the whole heart be coloured by their qualities, and show its food in every the minutest fibre

GOOD-HUMOUR.—Of all the qualifications of the mind which are not positive virtues, I do not know any that is more desirable than good-humour. No quality renders the possessor more easy and happy in himself, or recommends him more forcibly to other people It is hardly saying too much in favour of this quality, to assert that it is one of the first requisites in society; for, though strict honour and integrity are of more essential value in the grand purposes of human life, yet good-humour, like small money, is of more immediate use in the common commerce of the world There is no situation in life, no engagement in business, or party of pleasure, wherein it will not contribute to mitigate pain, or heighten enjoyment. Some persons may almost be said to be of a good-humoured complexion, and seem to be constitutionally endued with this amiable turn of mind—a blessing for which they may thank heaven with the same kind gratitude that he ought to feel who experiences the comforts of being born in a delightful and temperate climate. We are naturally attached even to animals that betray a softness of disposition. We are pleased with the awkward fondness and fidelity of a dog. Montaigne could discover agreeable music in the good-humoured purring of his cat; and, though our modern grooms and jockeys bestow all their attention on make, colour, eyes, and feet, yet the best writers on horsemanship consider a good temper as one of the best qualities of a horse.

AFFECTATION OF SCARVITY.—There are some who affect a want of affectation, and flatter themselves that they are above flattery: they are proud of being thought extremely humble, and would go round the world to punish those who thought them capable of revenge; they are so satisfied of the saintly purity of their own minds that they would quarrel with their dearest benefactor only for doubting it. And yet so very blind are all their acquaintance to these their numerous qualifications and merits, that the possessors of them invariably discover, when it is too late, that they have lived in the world without a single friend, and are about to leave it without a single mourner

BOOKS RULE THE WORLD.—As Robinson Crusoe has sent many a spirited youth from the safe footing of dry land, in quest of adventures on the unstable element, so I believe can the influence of the Arabian Nights be traced in the peculiar bent of mind of those to whom it has given an impulse in some path of life. There are those who have shaped their character according to the sage advice annually doled out in the appendix of an almanack; and a select few have laid their souls fired with heroic daring by perusal of the bold achievements of Thomas Thumb. Wherever a book fails, there arises a spark which nothing but death can put out. Every author looks into his book as he looks into his glass, to adjust his opinions, and smooth down some rough spot on the face of his character. A book is a sort of little philosopher, whom we can force to chat whenever we choose, and draw to a him as oracle without a fee; whom, as we bring fresh and warm from the book-shop, we tuck under our arm as if a wife or bosom-crony; and, retreating with into some snug corner, hold agreeable and uninterrupted session.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—In Westminster, Vincent-square is now being enclosed with an elegant iron railing, instead of the present unsightly wooden fence, and will be planted. The centre will still be retained for a cricket-ground for the Westminster scholars. Rochester-row is to be re-paved, and the carriage-road raised to make a more commodious entrance to the elegant squares and streets erecting in the neighbourhood.

PRECOCITY.—The decree of talent and industry displayed by boys is an erroneous index to their future character as men. The fortunate competitors for school and university honours are not always—by any means—the successful eminent men in after life; while the men who have failed in attaining these distinctions, not unfrequently exhibit a degree of ability of which their early years afforded no indication.

TAUS PHILOSOPHY.—Certainly the highest good is to live happily, and not through a life of mortification to expect a happy death. Should we obtain felicity in life, death will be easy, as it will be natural and in due season. Whereas by this rule the system of religious teaching men are enjoined to value chiefly happiness at the end of life; which if they were implicitly to follow, they would, by neglecting the first great duty, that of innocent enjoyment during existence, effectually preclude themselves from attaining.

COLERIDGE.—In a lecture delivered upwards of thirty years ago, at some place in Pettendare, he divided readers into four classes. The first he compared to an hour-glass, their reading being as the sand of urns in and out, and leaves not a vestige behind. A second class he said, resembled a sponge which imbibes everything, and returns in nearly the same state, only a little dirtier. A third class he likened to a jelly-bag—which allows all that is pure to pass away, and retains only the refuse and the dregs. The fourth class, of which he trusted there were many among his auditors, he compared to slaves in the diamond-mines of Golconda, who, casting aside all that is worthless preserve only the pure gem.

A COURT ARGUMENT.—King James held a convocation at Perth, and demanded of the Scotch barons that they should produce the charters by which they held their lands; they all, with one simultaneous movement, rose up and drew their swords

LEGAL MEANING OF THE TERM "DEAR SIR."—The following scene, which took place on Wednesday last, in the writing chamber of an attorney in this town, well known for his liberal propensities, is a tolerably good illustration of the different degrees of respect which gentlemen by Act of Parliament are in the habit of doing out to their clients, and of the cause of that respect. The attorney in question was about to address a "newly-caught" client on some matter of business, and had called in his clerk to write a letter to his dictation:

Attorney: Take a sheet of letter-paper, James.—Clerk: Yes, sir, —Attorney: Address at the top Mr. D——, and then say, "Kendal, 11th January, 1842." Clerk: Yes, sir. Attorney: Then say "Sir." But let me see. Has Mr. D—— paid his account? Clerk: He has, Sir. Attorney: Then address him "Dear Sir."—Clerk: I beg your pardon, sir, that Mr. D—— called yesterday, when you were out, and stated that he wished to consult you as to raising an action against Mr. B——. Attorney: Oh! did he? Then you may say, "My dear sir."—Clerk: Yes, sir.

A SERIOUS VENTURE.

Marriage has been termed a lottery; and, looking to the short acquaintance on which it is often constructed, it is, in truth, little else. If a man, however, has made an imprudent, or, as in many cases it may be called, an unlucky choice, he has a resource—a miserable one though it be—in the dissipation of the world, or, if he be of a better mould of mind, in its business: but a woman so keen her whole wealth of happiness in the purchase of the ticket, and, if it arises a blank, she is ruined

IMMORTALITY

Be time and life ever so vain, and leave us ever so empty, yet existence, without immortality, would be the greatest nothing of all that offers. Our inquiries into immortality are, alas! too often made in the time of mourning and sorrowful bereavement, and, therefore, our views are not sufficiently bright and cheering. We never walk amid the graves, but with crape upon our faces To the earthly-minded, immortality is a formidable thought—to the high-minded, transport Thus the heavens reflected in the sea appear a frightful abyss, but beheld above us, a sublime height.

TO A LADY SINGING.

How like a swan, clear in the azure sky,
The voice upsoars of thy triumphant song,
That wilt-ed awhile reside-ely along
By the great sweep of unreaming harmony,
Seemed, overmatched, to struggle helplessly
With that impetuous music yet ere long
Escaping from the current fierce and strong,
Pierces the clear crystalline vault on high.
And I too am unborne with thee together
In circles ever and ever more round and round,
Over the crowds and thousands—who erewhile,
Like a blest bird of charmed sum her weather
In the blue shadow of some boundless isle,
Was flo ting on the billows of sweet sound.

TRANSATLANTIC EXICOGRAPHY.

Crisis—Weep, sister, if you like it; a lamentable expression Cincinnati Nathaniel twice requested to tran-gress: "Sin, sin, Matty." Analysis An attack on Anne's security. Analysis—Pay attention, Ann. Mollify—O-e-e soo-oo, Molly! Salutary—Stay you here, Sally. Wilful William a little tipsy. Inquire—Put up in 24 sheets. Partaking—Pat turning on his axis!

HOW TO GET A TIGHT RING OFF A FINGER.

Thread a needle flat in the eye with a strong thread: pass the head of the needle with care under the rins, and pull the thread through a few inches towards the hand; wrap the long end of the thread tightly round the finger, regularly, all down to the nail, to reduce its size. Then lay hold of the short end of the thread, and unwind it. The thread pressing against the ring, will gradually remove it from the finger. This simple method will remove the tightest ring without difficulty, however much swollen the finger may be.

WOMAN.

As the dove will clasp its wing to its side, and cover and conceal the arrow that is preying on its vitals, so it is the nature of woman to hide from the world the pangs of wounded affection. With her the desire of the heart has failed The great charm of existence has failed. Look for her after a little while, and you find Friendship weeping over her untimely grave, and wondering that one, who had lately gowed with all the radiance of love and beauty, should now be nought down to darkness and the worm" You will be told of some wintry chill, some slight indisposition, that laid her low—but no one knows the mental malady that previously sapped her strength, and made her so easy a prey to the spoiler.

THE THAMES TOE-NAIL.

Sir Mark Isambard Brunej had the satisfaction of first walking under the river Thames His tunnel is a great triumph of art and perseverance, and will remain a splendid monument of skill to future ages. Of course our readers have heard of the impression made by a French gentleman upon his English auditors as to the immense size of Sir Isambard, when he said to them, "Monsieur Brunei is great man giant engineer—he sail from toe-nail (ongle) goes all across de river Thames onder de vater from von side to de oder."

BATHING.

No habit can be more preventive of disease than frequent bathing: and he would indeed be a benefactor to his fellow-creatures who would apply some of his wealth to the erection of baths to which the poor people might be admitted by tickets or letters of recommendation, as they now are to dispensaries: or subscribers might join to raise the funds necessary for such a purpose The detail as to hot, cold, or vapour bath, the renewal of the water, &c., might easily be arranged Other nations, both in hot climates and cold, maintain public baths for all classes. Why should not wealthy England? Yet so far is this from being the case, that although there is a superabounding plenty of dispensaries, there is not a single bathing institution, where those who require baths for diseases of the skin, &c., can be gratuitously admitted.—Farmer on Consumption

FAMILY WORSHIP.

There is no worship which impresses the imagination, and warms the heart like that of the family. When in the silent hour of night those who are joined together by consanguinity and affection kneel toge her—when the father prays for his children and dependents—there is a touching interest and moral beauty in the scene; and we know not how any, who profess the doctrines of Christianity, can neglect so serious a duty, or deny themselves so delightful a pleasure.

YOUTH.

Alas! for youth! the year has but one spring,
The day but one noon, the heroin's wing
But one bright plume, the heart but one gem,
And the heart's one bright hour is like to them!

Alas! for youth! the pearl and plume shine on
When the fair brow they decked to earth is gone;
Spring may return—a gift bring another morrow;
But when shall youth another lifetime borrow?

Robin Hood.

MOTION OF THE HEART.

The heart is kept in motion, we know not how; nor can the wisest anatomist or physiologist in the world tell us We know that the lungs have something to do in the case; and when once set a-going, we can form some idea of what keeps it in action; but after all, the real cause of the continued motion of either the heart or the lungs is a great mystery, and will probably remain so for ever.—Girtin.

THE GREAT AND GOOD.

Whatever is great and good is seated on a steep ascent: the base and sides are placed on uneven inclined planes, so that the advantage of the ground on which the cause of improvement and emancipation rests, we can keep it suspended half-way down, or from being precipitated with scorn and loud imprecations into the abyss, it is doing something.—Hazlitt.

AFFECTION FOR THE MATERNAL PARENT.

Even in after life the minds of the generality of mankind cherish a warmth of affection for the maternal parent which they feel not for father, brother, or sister. She retains possession, too, to the last hour of their existence, of the same hallowed shrine in their hearts which she occupied at the first. Regard for one's mother is an unvariable feeling in the human breast. As it is the first, so it is the last. Death alone can extinguish one's love for the maternal parent: and it is as strong in the bosom of the savage, as in that of the sage. The most untutored African regards his mother with as pure and ardent affection, as ever burned in the breast of Sir Isaac Newton, towards her who was honoured to give him birth A negro will forgive an insult put on his own life, but to whisper a word against his mother, is to commit an unpardonable offence Hence the African's favourite motto—"Strike me, but do not utter a word against my mother."—Grant's Pictures of Popular People.

THE EMPEROR OF CHINA.

TAOU KWANG, THE EMPEROR OF CHINA.

We are enabled, by the courtesy of a friend, who is in possession of an original portrait of the Taou Kwang, Emperor of China, to present our readers with as correct a likeness of that potentate as the process of copying will allow It was originally our intention to have inserted this portrait with the illustrations that may be necessary upon the arrival of the next despatches from China, but as we have every reason to expect that our engravings for the subject will then occupy a considerable space of the paper, we have determined upon getting rid of his Celestial Majesty, whose size renders him somewhat inconvenient, before the rush of news precludes his appearance altogether. According to the best-informed authorities, Taou Kwang is at present (if, indeed, the crisis be not already passed) in a situation of exceeding peril, both as regards life and empire; as from circumstances that have already taken place in China, the invincibility of our arms, and our national character, now rapidly developing itself, an opinion is gaining ground among the intelligent and influential Chinese at Ningpo, and in the province surrounding it, that the Tartar dynasty is tottering to its fall Startling as this may appear to those conversant with the character of Eastern despotism, it appears far from improbable. For the Emperor to lose face, as it is called in China, by the utter defeat of his best troops and the capture of his strongest forts by the barbarians, whom he has taught his people to regard as the very scum of the earth, is equivalent to loss of empire, where empire is based on the claim of superiority to all the nations of the earth; and for this reason it is as impossible for the Emperor to yield to our demands and preserve his throne, as it would be for us, after what has happened, to expect a peace of any duration with the present dynasty. The Chinese are far too wise not to see the advantages of our just laws, giving protection to life and property, when contrasted with the arbitrary rule of their Tartar conquerors.

On the arrival of the expected reinforcements from India and England, the campaign, it has been said, would begin by the capture of that important position at the south point of the Great Canal. The utility of this proceeding is much canvassed, for many contend that the British expedition ought to proceed at once to the attack of the Imperial province of Pekin, which being, by the constitution of the Chinese empire, placed under the immediate government of his Celestial Majesty, any attack on it would oblige the Emperor in person to examine the causes of the war, and to come to a speedy decision. The great blunder of the late plenipotentiaries was their not persisting in 1840 to demand a settlement of the disputes, when Keshen hoaxed them back to Canton. Sir H. Pottinger must go to Pekin in order to bring the war to a termination; for the mandarins at Hang-kow-foo seem resolved rather to carry on their operations in their own fashion, although they appeared to make an offer of negotiation. The sacred province itself must be assailed, and even the British troops may have to march towards the capital, before the obstinacy of the Emperor will yield. The possession of the Imperial province is, besides, to be considered as an occupation of the Government, and then the Emperor will have either to abdicate or submit to proper terms.

It is known that the inhabitants at Ningpo, and for many miles round it, have implored us to take them under our protection, and without wishing to see this country add to the extent of its dominion unnecessarily, it will ere long become a grave consideration whether we can, either in honour or policy, abandon the people of the province—the scene of our late conquests—to certain destruction, by again yielding them up with Ningpo and its dependencies, to their former rulers; or if we do so, how can we avoid the British name being execrated wherever it has been known, and annihilating all hopes for the future in the good will of the inhabitants of any part of China.

Out of evil sometimes cometh good, and the opium trade, which is little understood in this country, may have been the means intended by Providence for introducing the Gospel, and altering the condition of that benighted country, for that such an event is sooner or later to take place, no Christian can doubt. Speaking of the opium trade as carried on with Bengal and China, it should be observed, that whatever objections there may be to it in a moral point of view, the opprobrium that has been heaped upon it as having been the cause of the war is totally unfounded; the real cause may be easily traced in the many years' submission to insult during the period of the East India Company's charter, and subsequently by the apathy shown to the indignities offered to Lord Napier. The renowned Lin (thanks to him for having put an end to our degradation) might well be justified in acting as he did without fear of consequences, when he reviewed the past, and saw our flag prostrate so long before one of the weakest and most arrogant Governments on earth, and on two occasions endeavouring to purchase favour by costly presents in the character of tribute-bearer to his Celestial Majesty. An immense field for British commerce is about to be opened, and the advantages offered must not be lost by a mistaken policy.

WEST INDIA AND ATLANTIC STEAM NAVIGATION.

The West India Company's steamer Solway, Captain Britton, arrived on Saturday, at Southampton, having delivered her mails, at Falmouth, on Thursday night. She was detained at that port taking in coals, and in the Channel, by a dense fog, which caused delay in reaching Southampton; she lay outside the Needles the whole of Friday night. The Solway was detained at Fayal 24 hours; she only brought mails from Jamaica, Vera Cruz, Havannah, New Orleans, Turk's Island, Demerara, Barbadoes, and Carthagena. She brought the largest number of passengers (71) that any one of the West India steamers has yet brought to this country. Intelligence has been received by her of the safety of the other steamers, The Medway ran on shore at Santa Cruz, and received considerable damage, and the City of Glasgow broke her engine-axle at British Guiana, which caused some delay. Irregularities prevent the outward mails reaching the islands beyond Barbadoes. At the beginning of last month Jamaica had received no mails from England for 50 days. The Severn, the last of the West India steamers that has been built, is expected here shortly from Bristol.

THE WEST INDIA COMPANY'S STEAMER, "SOLWAY."

HER MAJESTY AT THE PALACE ENTRANCE.

The traversing the broad Atlantic by means of steam-ships, and thus creating a rapid and frequent means of communication between two of the greatest commercial nations in the world, is one of the most portentous "signs of the times." The Old World and the New are brought, as it were, side by side;—the distance between Bristol and New York was formerly, to adopt the traveller's mode of reckoning, three or four months; it is now ten days, that short period being amply sufficient for a noble vessel, whose resemblance heads our article, to reach from the shores of Old England to those of New York.

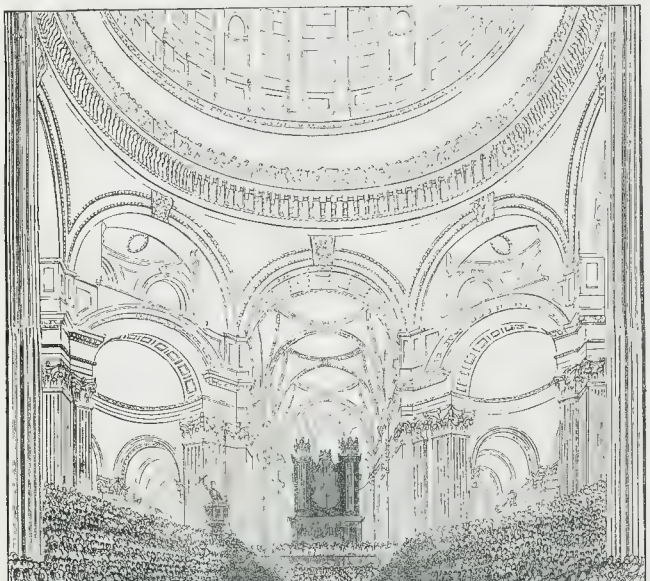
A passenger, during his first steam-trip from America, brought over a splendid bouquet of American flowers, which he was able to present to the lady of one of the managers of the Bristol Packet Company almost as fresh as if the dew were still on the leaves. And at a dinner given on the occasion of the return of the ship, on the twenty-fourth of May, 1838, specimens of flax and cotton yarn were exhibited, manufactured at Bristol, but which was actually growing in America twenty days before.

HER MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

The Queen held her last Levee for the season on Wednesday, at St. James's Palace. It is almost unnecessary to state that it was most numerous y and brilliantly attended; and in consequence of the late attempt on her Majesty's life (as might have been expected), the loyal subjects of our beloved Sovereign assembled in immense numbers, and never did a British monarch witness a more hearty and enthusiastic demonstration of loyalty and attachment.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Court, left Buckingham Palace a few minutes after two o'clock, in four of the Royal carriages, escorted by a detachment of the Horse Guards. The Queen and her illustrious Consort were most loudly and enthusiastically cheered along the line of road. On arriving at St. James's Palace, the band of the Horse Guards played the national anthem. The scene was one of great animation, and nothing could exceed the loyalty evinced by the vast crowd which had assembled. Shortly after one o'clock the carriages of the Foreign Ambassadors, and those having the privilege of the entrée, arrived in quick succession. The equipages and state liveries were truly magnificent.

The Queen Dowager and the other members of the Royal Family came in full state, and arrived at St. James's Palace shortly before two o'clock. Her Majesty and Prince Albert appeared in excellent health and spirits. Her Majesty repeatedly bowed in answer to the rapturous cheers with which she was received. The House of Lords met at two o'clock, and the House of Commons at a quarter past two, and shortly afterwards proceeded to St. James's Palace, to present the joint address of congratulation, agreed to by both Houses on Tuesday night.



INTERIOR OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL 2ND JUNE, 1842.

CHARITY CHILDREN AT ST. PAUL'S.

The annual meeting of the parochial schools of the various parishes around the metropolis took place on Thursday at St. Paul's Cathedral. At ten o'clock the gates were thrown open, and shortly after the children began to arrive, headed by their respective parish authorities. The children were attired in their new clothing, and reflected great credit upon the bountiful charities so liberally bestowed in this great metropolis.

There was a great number of respectable persons assembled around the cathedral to witness the arrival of the children. The Duke and Duchess and Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen, the Duchess Ida and Prince Gustavus, and the Princesses of Saxe Weimar were present in the Cathedral, and appeared to be deeply interested in the affecting and peculiarly English spectacle.

We are happy to understand that of the many thousand youthful objects yesterday assembled, not one suffered the slightest injury, which, considering the difficulty of access to the cathedral through the dense assemblage collected round it, is equally gratifying and surprising. The accompanying view of the interior of the magnificent church will enable our country friends to form an idea of the glorious sight presented to the inhabitants of London on Thursday.

In connexion with this subject, the following letter has been addressed to us. We can only observe in reply, that the circumstances complained of are perfectly in keeping with the grasping and illiberal spirit manifested in every possible way whenever access to our public edifices or exhibitions is sought for by the people. "They manage these things better in France," as Sterne once remarked.

"Sir,—I wish, through the medium of your journal, to ask the authorities of St. Paul's Cathedral, or those parties who this day had the management of the festival or meeting there for the metropolitan charity schools, whether they are aware of or sanction the conduct of the officers stationed at the door to regulate the admission of visitors on the occasion? Having had tickets presented me by a friend, my wife and sister, accompanied by a gentleman, presented themselves at the west door, and the entrance being so constructed as to admit but one person at a time, the ladies were of course directed to enter first, and present their tickets, which one of them had no sooner done (leaving the gentleman accompanying to contribute, as requested, towards the expenses of the preparations) when she was violently seized by a policeman, and half-a-crown demanded before he would allow her to proceed. The gentleman having satisfied the demand, they were permitted to take their places.

"Annexed to the tickets was a slip of paper, stating that the expenses necessarily attendant on the meeting made it desirable that visitors should be as liberal as possible in their contributions, requesting that no one would make their donation less than half-a-crown, and such a request would, in my case, have been cheerfully acceded to; but if the authorities instruct the attendants to constitute this request a demand on which admission is dependent, I think it would be much more honest to state at once on the tickets, 'Admission, half-a-crown,' than to expose ladies to insult because, from the circumstance I have first stated, they are not so readily prepared to comply with the demand as suits the views of these doorkeepers.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant, "A SUBSCRIBER.

Our artist has left us little to say, in the way of description, of the annual assembly of the charity children of the metropolis in St. Paul's—without any exception the most impressive sight in London. We remember the occasion on which our beloved Sovereign, then Princess Victoria, was present. She appeared to be deeply affected by the spectacle. If a thought of her own immediate interest in the scene could have suggested itself to her at such a moment, she must have seen, in the evidence of the care bestowed on the religious education of the lower classes of her future subjects, the surest pledge of their loyalty and love. The simultaneous movements of this youthful multitude have been aptly likened to the action of the summer wind on a field of corn: the Christian will carry the simile further and deeper, and gather from the scene the assurance that the good seed has been sown—and the hope that it has fallen upon good ground—that the vast living field which spread before him, is a harvest of souls ripening for the garners of God, and that thus there is not a voice of that thrilling chorus that will not swell the eternal hallelujahs of the blessed angels in heaven.

The newly-appointed Bishop of Gibraltar is the Rev. George Tomlinson, M.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge. Mr. Tomlinson took his B.A. degree in 1823, and soon after his ordination was appointed chaplain to the Bishop of London. He was subsequently tutor in the family of Sir Robert Peel, and recently one of the secretaries to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The new bishop is a sincere and consistent churchman.

HOUSE OF LORDS—MONDAY, MAY 30.

IRISH POOR-LAW COMMISSIONERS.

The Earl of GLENGALL had to submit a motion to which he did not anticipate that there would be any objection. It related to the salaries of the Poor-law Commissioners in Ireland. He understood that these commissioners had each a salary of £800 per annum, besides which there was an allowance of one guinea per day for table money, and an allowance of another guinea per day for travelling expenses, making the receipts of each commissioner amount to from £1500 to £1600 a year This might be right or it might be wrong, but it would be well to know what the fact was. He would therefore now move that there be laid before the house an account of the salaries, allowances, and travelling expenses of the Poor-law Commissioners in Ireland.—Motion agreed to.

CRIME IN IRELAND.

The Earl of GLENGALL also moved for a return of the number of rewards offered by order of the Government of Ireland for the apprehension of offenders, and also the number of such rewards claimed and paid in the year 1841, and also a return of the number of outrages reported to the Government in the same year. —Agreed to.

The Punishment of Death (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

THE PENTONVILLE PRISON BILL.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE, in moving that the house go into committee on this bill, said, seeing a noble lord opposite who had given notice of his intention to move or the production of the report of Dr Bailey, he would suggest to him that that report was a confidential one, and its production at the present moment would be most inexpedient. The Government were quite aware that there was a lamentable deficiency of the means for secondary punishments. In the new prison the many defects of the Penitentiary had been avoided, and as it was a mere experiment, he trusted it would be allowed a fair trial.

Lord COLCHESTER—After what had fallen from the noble lord, he should not feel himself justified in pressing for the production of the report. He considered the present bill as a great experiment, and he wished it all success.

The bill then went through committee, and was reported without amendment.

REGULATIONS OF NEWGATE.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE gave notice, that to-morrow he would move for a copy of the rules and regulations of the gaol of Newgate relative to the confinement of capital criminals.

JURISDICTION OF JUSTICES BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of the Jurisdiction of Justices Bill, and said, the way he had proceeded—in which, in fact, he had adopted the report of the committee—was to refer all classes of misdemeanour which were most difficult to try, to the judges of assize. With regard to transportation for life there was one exception, which had been reserved to the quarter sessions, namely, transportation for life in cases where the party had returned from transportation before the expiration of his term. There it was not necessary to try the original offence.

Lord CAMPBELL hoped that the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions would be improved.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said this bill had become necessary, in consequence of certain alterations that had been made in the general law. With regard to the chairmen of the quarter sessions bench, he did not know whether his noble and learned friend (Lord Campbell) had seen more of quarter sessions than he had, but, according to his experience, justice was administered by lay chairmen generally with a very accurate knowledge of the common law, and most impartially.

The bill was then read a second time.

(At this moment a communication was made to the Duke of Wellington, upon which his grace started up and left the house very suddenly, followed by Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Fitzgerald, and other peers. The Lord Chancellor likewise quitted the woolsack very hurriedly (his place being occupied by the Earl of Shaftesbury, as deputy speaker), and left the house. It became immediately known that her Majesty's life had been menaced, whereupon all business was instantly suspended: the peers rose from their seats, and collected round the Lord Chancellor, who had returned and who appeared, by his gesticulations, to be describing the occurrence. The effect produced, indicating the utmost anxiety and apprehension, was very striking.)

The house then immediately adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—MONDAY.

THE TRUCK SYSTEM

Dr. BOWRING presented a petition from workmen in the employ of the Cambrian Iron Company in favour of the truck system.

Mr. FERRAND begged to present a petition, signed by 84 persons, from Presteign, in Wales, against the system, and stating that the petitioners had heard with great regret that an hon. member of that house had been in the neighbourhood of Presteign, endeavouring to get up evidence in support of the truck system.

The petitions were ordered to be referred to the Select Committee on the Payment of Wages.

NEW POOR LAW.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE presented a petition from the board of guardians of the Hereford Union, stating that they strongly disapproved of many provisions of the new Poor-law Amendment Bill.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Sir R. PEEL said he had, some time since, given a notice of his intention to proceed with the Property-tax that evening. He believed it was also the impression of the house that it would certainly be proceeded with. There were a number of preliminary arrangements which it was absolutely essential to make, if the measure was brought into operation on the 5th of July; and, taking that circumstance into consideration, he did hope that no objection would be offered to proceed with the bill at once; and that he might be permitted to appeal to hon members to agree, that no question likely to lead to a discussion—not even a question of privilege—should be interposed. (Hear.)

Mr. MACKINNON said, under the circumstances, if permitted by the house, he would postpone his motion for issuing a new writ for the borough of Southampton until Wednesday.

Mr. ADDERLEY said he would postpone his motion for the issue of a new writ for the borough of Newcastle-under-Lime until the same day.

SOUTHAMPTON ELECTION.

Considerable time was occupied in discussion upon the presentation of petitions connected with the Southampton election, which were ultimately ordered to be printed with the votes.

WITNESSES' INDEMNITY BILL.

The house, on the motion of Mr. Roebuck, went into committee on this bill. The several clauses were agreed to, and the house resumed. The report was received forthwith, and, on the motion of Mr. Roebuck, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed.

PROPERTY-TAX BILL.

Sir R. PEEL moved the order of the day for the third reading of the Property-tax Bill, which being read, and on the question "that the bill be now read a third time" being put,

Mr. S. CRAWFORD rose to bring forward, as an amendment, the motion of which he had given notice, and which was as follows:—That as by the existing laws a large proportion of the people of this realm are excluded from voting for members of parliament, and as it also appears by the reports of different election committees that corrupt practises have been used to an extraordinary extent in procuring the return of members to this present House of Commons, and as, from both these causes, this house cannot be considered a fair representation of the people, it is therefore unfit that any system of increased taxation should be imposed by parliament until all just causes of complaint with regard to the mode of electing members of this house shall be first redressed. The hon. member proceeded at some length to argue in support of his amendment, and said he expected, that if it were carried, the consequence would be, that the house would proceed to take into consideration the state of the representation or else to have a new Parliament altogether. This was his object; but he did not call on the house to adopt the principles of the charter; he asked only that they should be ready to redress all just causes of complaint against the present defective representative system. He had only to say that this motion was made with no party views, and so he hoped it would be understood generally; but, concurring in the view that representation and taxation were intimately allied rights, and thinking that when taxes were brought forward that was a fair and just opportunity for bringing on such a motion, he trusted that the house would consent to it.

Mr O CONNELL seconded the motion

Sir R. PEEL trusted that the hon. gentleman would not charge him with intentional disrespect if he declined entering into the discussion which the hon. gentleman's speech would seem to invite. He must offer the most decided opposition to the amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL said that it was necessary to purify the house, for bribery was no longer a matter of declamation, but of positive proof. The right hon. baronet must not be surprised, therefore, if he met with a further opposition to a government which would not consent to a further parliamentary reform.

Mr. HUME had no hesitation in saying, that the house did not at present represent the feelings of the country.

Lord J. MANNERS had no doubt that the motion originated from a new society for parliamentary reform which had sent a circular to the different members of the house. With respect to the Income-tax Bill, he supported it because he looked upon it as a bill which he believed it would be a successful—attempt to diminish the influence of wealth; to which, and not to the influence of aristocracy a great part of the present evils were to be attributed.

Lord J. RUSSELL said, that as the resolution appeared to be one which, if adopted, would incapacitate the house to legislate on any subject whatever, he should vote against the amendment, though, subsequently, he should take the sense of the house against the third reading of this bill.

The house divided, when there appeared:

Against the amendment	166
For the amendment	31
Majority against the amendment	135

ATTEMPT ON THE LIFE OF HER MAJESTY.

About half-past six o'clock Sir James Graham was observed to enter the House of Commons and walk towards the Speaker's end of the House, with a face evidently betraying anxiety. As he got opposite Sir R. Peel, he beckoned to the right hon. gentleman, who immediately retired with Sir J. Graham. It was then the latter right hon. baronet communicated to Sir R. Peel the intelligence of what had transpired.

Mr. BARING having risen to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice,

Sir R. PEEL, having resumed his seat, said, Sir, whatever may be the inconvenience to the public that may arise from the adjournment, I feel it would be inconsistent with my duty if I should remain here. I would not meet satisfactory if I could remain here; but still there are considerations—(The right hon. bart. was here interrupted by cries of "Hear," and "Adjourn.") I would wish to state the circumstances to the house, but, at the same time, my own information is so imperfect that I cannot make any statement without great mistrust of its accuracy. I have this moment received information that an attempt has been made on her Majesty's life, and I have reason to believe —thanks to the usual interference of Providence—that her Majesty has escaped (Loud cheers.) I have reason to believe that the assassin is in custody, and the earliest opportunity will be taken to subject him to examination; and under the circumstances the house will deem my attendance requisite (Hear, hear.)

Mr C. WOOD—Is her Majesty safe?

Sir R. PEEL—Entirely safe; and the assassin has been apprehended, and under these circumstances, I leave it to the house to determine (Loud cries of "Adjourn.") I do not think that while the house is in this state of excitement they could follow up the discussion of this question, and I do, therefore, beg leave to move that the house do now adjourn until to-morrow. The hon. baronet appeared throughout to speak under strong excitement.

Lord J. RUSSELL rose to second the motion. (Cheers). The natural state of excitement into which the house must have been thrown by the intelligence we have just received, coupled as it was by the information that our Sovereign was safe—(cheers)—proved that it was quite impossible the house should attend to the business under its consideration He considered, therefore, that the right hon baronet had taken the best course in moving the adjournment of the debate (Hear, hear.)

The SPEAKER then put the question of the adjournment of the debate, which was carried

Sir R. Peel, accompanied by Mr. Gladstone, left the house at once.

The house immediately afterwards adjourned

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

The Duke of WELLINGTON said, your lordships must have heard with sorrow and indignation the report circulated of an attempt having been made last evening upon the life of her Majesty. The person who committed this atrocious act, I will call it—was immediately taken into custody, and his name is now undergoing the course of judicial inquiry, and in due form he will be brought to justice. I avoid entering into the details of this painful transaction (loud cheers); I confine myself simply to the performance of the duty of calling the fact to your lordships, and of moving your lordships to concur in presenting to her Majesty an address of congratulat on upon her most providential escape from the attack of an assassin I will, therefore, now propose that such an address be agreed to, and I will afterwards move that it be communicated to the House of Commons in a conference, for the management of which members of that house will be appointed. I recommend that the address should be in the following terms:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign—We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to approach your Majesty's throne, to express our abhorrence of the late treasonable attempt against your Majesty's sacred person, and our heartfelt congratulations to your Majesty and the country on your Majesty's happy preservation from the danger to which your Majesty was exposed Attached to your Majesty by every sentiment of loyalty, by a sense of the benefits we derive from your Majesty's just and benign government, we acknowledge with gratitude and humility the manifest interposition of Divine Providence manifest on this occasion; and we make our earnest prayer to Almighty God, that he may confer on your Majesty every blessing, and continue to watch over and guard a life so justly dear to us."

The prayer and address having been handed to the Lord Chancellor,

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said: There can be but one feeling in the house, and we ought not to lose a moment in recording and giving effect to that feeling. I beg leave, therefore, to second the motion of the noble duke

The Duke of WELLINGTON moved that a committee be appointed to draw up an address to her Majesty, and walked up to the woolsack with the motion

Lord PORTMAN.—While the noble duke and the noble and learned lord are settling the course of proceeding I may be allowed to interpose for a single moment to state a fact which, I possible, will increase our respect, admiration and attachment towards her Majesty. The statement of such a fact must be highly gratifying in itself, and will form my excuse for interposing on the present occasion. It is, that her Majesty, relying with full confidence on the protection of the Almighty, which has hitherto shielded her from dangers by which she was surrounded, was not unmindful of the safety of all those engaged in her Majesty's service. Feeling that yesterday some risk might possibly be incurred by those who usually surround her person, she declined to be attended by the ladies who usually accompany her Majesty in her drives. (Cheers). If danger were to be encountered, her Majesty was resolved that others should not unnecessarily partake in it. (Cheers). As I am an individual whose near and dear relative might otherwise have been placed in a situation of peril, I thought it became me to mention a circumstance which must render the person and character of her Majesty still dearer to her subjects. (Cheers from all sides).

Lord BROUGHAM: On the subject of the proposed address there can be but one feeling, in doors and out of doors

The motion was then put, that a committee be appointed to prepare an address to her Majesty; and having been carried, and the committee named, the peers forming it retired for the purpose of drawing up the address, and the house adjourned during pleasure.

In a few minutes the committee, headed by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, returned to the house, and the Lord Chancellor resumed his seat on the woolsack.

The Duke of CAMBRIDGE said that he had been authorised by the committee of their lordships to propose the address to her Majesty, which was precisely in the terms previously read by the Duke of Wellington.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY moved that it be communicated to the House of Commons; and the question having been put and carried,

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY moved that a message be sent to the Commons requiring a present conference in committee-room No. 3.

The motion having been agreed to, messengers were despatched to the Commons for the purpose of requesting a conference. On the return of the messengers,

The Deputy Usher of the Black Rod announced that the Commons were ready for the conference, and the peers named to manage the conference proceeded to the appointed committee-room

The house again adjourned during pleasure; and in about five minutes the peers returned to the house, and the woolsack having been resumed by the Lord Chancellor,

Lord WHARNCLIFFE reported that the peers appointed had met the managers on behalf of the Commons, and had placed in the hands of Sir Robert Peel the address to the Queen, to which their lordships had agreed.

The Portsmouth Prison Bill was read a third time and passed, on the motion of Lord WHARNCLIFFE.

NEWGATE REGULATIONS.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE, in rising to move for a copy of the regulations observed in the gaol of Newgate with regard to criminals after conviction for capital offences, said that he did not pretend to any particular qualification for bringing this case before their lordships, at the same time, he did not think it necessary to make any apology, because he was about to bring under their lordship's notice a case which he considered to have been shameful, disgusting, and profane (hear, hear), and one which, if it were allowed to pass without any notice, would well cast a stain upon the manners and condition of the lower orders of society. (Hear, hear). His lordship then proceeded to quote from the Times newspaper a report of the exhibition in the chapel of Newgate upon the occasion of the condemned sermon of the late reverend Daniel Good, which he stigmatised as highly offensive and improper, and concluded by moving for a copy of the regulations observed in the gaol of Newgate, with regard to criminals after condemnation for capital offences

The Duke of RICHMOND said that, having called the attention of their lordships to a similar subject four years since, he rose to offer his thanks to the noble lord for having brought this subject under the consideration of the house.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE said he entirely concurred in the opinions expressed by the noble lord opposite, and he felt exceedingly glad that the subject had been brought under the consideration of their lordships, because he had to state, as far as Government was concerned, that they had no share in the exhibition alluded to

Lord NORMANBY said that he merely rose to confirm what had fallen from his noble friend who had just sat down, as to the Government having no share in this transaction. It was known to every one who had filled the office of Secretary of State, that the government of the gaol of Newgate was exclusively in the corporation of London, as represented by the sheriff. He hoped that the present motion would not be without its effect on the civic authorities, and that the practice complained of would not be allowed to pass

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE trusted something would be done to prevent the recurrence of so disgraceful a practice, and he was glad the noble lord had brought the question under the consideration of the house, because the present discussion would not, he thought, be without its effect.—Motion agreed to.

THE ADDRESS

Lord DELAWARR here rose, and said that her Majesty had been graciously pleased to fix three o'clock to-morrow for the reception, at St. James's Palace, of the address of both houses.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition from certain attorneys in Lincolnshire, praying for a repeal of the annual certificate duty.

Adjourned till Wednesday at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. Thomas Hussey took the oaths and his seat for Lyme Regis, and Viscount Eastnor took the oaths and his seat for Reigate.

ROYAL COMMISSION.

The Usher of the Black Rod appeared, and required the attendance of the house in the House of Peers, to hear the commission read, giving the royal assent to certain bills. The Speaker, accompanied by several members, left the house accordingly

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

At half past five o'clock messengers from the House of Lords appeared at the table of the house, and having presented several bills which had passed their lordships' house, presented a paper, which was handed to the Speaker. The messengers having retired, the SPEAKER informed the house in the following words:—I have to acquaint the house that the Lords desire a conference with this house in the committee-room of their lordships' house, No. 3, on a subject materially affecting the safety of her Majesty's most sacred person, and the happiness of her people

Sir R. PEEL moved that the conference be agreed to; and a committee was thereupon appointed to manage the conference.

The address was then brought up by Sir R. Peel, and was read by the clerk at the table. (For address see Lords' report).

Sir R. PEEL rose and said: I feel it to be my duty to propose that this house should concur in the address which the other House of Parliament has adopted, and I anticipate but one unanimous feeling respecting the proposal which I have to make. (Loud cheers) Scarcely two years have elapsed since I had the painful duty of seconding the proposal of a similar nature made by the noble lord; and it is with mixed feelings of shame and indignation (loud cheers) that, after a lapse of two years, I rise now to discharge a similar duty (Hear, hear) I should have thought that the natural feelings and sympathies of human nature would have been protection sufficient against so abhorrent a crime. (Loud cheers) That our young Queen, seeking for innocent recreation from the cares and toils of business in the presence of her beloved husband, should be a second time exposed in this country to an attempt like this, fills me with feelings of shame and indignation. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") If the natural feelings of humanity would not have prevented such an attempt, I should have thought that the burst of loyal affection which had been called forth from all classes of her Majesty's subjects by the first attempt, and of indignation and abhorrence against the author of it, would have constituted an additional guarantee to prevent the repetition of such an atrocity (Loud cheers) It has not done so. The right hon. baronet then detailed the circumstances as described in another part of our paper, and concluded by moving the adoption of the address now read in the House of Lords.

The address was then put and carried unanimously, and the Cabinet Ministers and the members forming the committee to manage the conference, took it up to the Lords

NEW POOR-LAW.

Mr. LIPTON gave notice in the committee on the New Poor-law Bill, he should move a clause to the effect that no persons professing the Jewish religion could in a receive, conscientiously, in-door relief in the workhouses, they should be entitled to receive out-door relief, notwithstanding any orders of the Poor-law Commissioners to the contrary.

Captain PECHELL gave notice, on behalf of the hon. member for West Sussex, that the hon. gentleman's intention to move the expulsion of the clause placing the Gibert Unions under the control of the Poor-law Commissioners.

WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN COAL-MINES.

Lord ASHLEY postponed his motion for a bill respecting the employment of women and children in coal-mines until a future day, in order to facilitate the Government in progressing the Income-Tax Bill.

INCOME-TAX BILL.

On the order of the day for the third reading of this measure, Mr. HUME expressed his dissatisfaction at the financial policy of Sir R. Peel, and lamented that his many strenuous warnings had not been attended to. Instead of making reductions in the public expenditure, Sir R. Peel was having recourse to taxes to be spent in mischievous wars. There ought to have been a finance committee; such committees had always done good. The origin of the blame was with the late Government, who had violated all their principles of economy, and non-interference; but the Tories had seconded them in their extravagance. The hon. gentleman then entered into a long speech, touching upon almost every political topic of the last few years—the Syrian war, the corn laws, the tariff, the state of the representation, and the comparative merits of the late and of the present ministry

Sir G. NAPIER objected to the present tax only on account of its inequality. As to reductions on the means of public defence, he prophated the notion.

Mr. BARING condemned the hasty enactment of this bill. It was a measure under which a man might be taxed for income when in fact he was getting none. In the case of tenants, the tax was not upon incomes, but upon rents. It might be true that there was difficulty and oppression in ascertaining their incomes; and that it was comparatively easy to assess them by their rents; but that only showed how bad was the general principle of the bill. Indeed, he believed it just as to be shown grave his official opposition to the third reading.

Mr GOULBURN said he felt the principle of this bill was the same with that of the bill which proceeded from the Administrations of 1803 and of 1806, but modified by several improvements. It was the principle of Mr. Pitt, and it was the principle of Mr. Fox, each of whom was convinced that property and income ought both to bear this burden. The real question now was, whether Parliament should meet the necessities of the national finance, and relieve those classes which were suffering he most severely. This measure had been, especially censured for its inquisition into private concerns; but the present bill had narrowed that hardship to the simple schedule of trades and processions. He believed that the tax, as accompanied by the tariff, was satisfactory to the country in general, and he trusted that the house would concur with their constituents

Mr MANGLES contended that the financer of India, which Sir R. Peel had made an argument for the new impost, were not in such a state as to require this special taxation.

Sir R. INGLIS pleaded for the exemption of the first £150 in every income. That exemption, he was persuaded, would remove the temptation to perjury in a vast number of cases.

Mr. VILLIERS denied that the country was satisfied with this measure. He did not believe it would be successful; it would proportionately reduce the proceeds of the indirect taxes

Mr DISRAELI answered some statements made by Mr. Mangles about Indian revenue.

Mr. HOTHERSTON held this to be a most unjust tax; and, though not laid on the working people in the first instance, it must fall upon them eventually.

The House then divided—

For the third reading..	.. ..	255
Against it ..	.. ..	149
Majority for the third reading	.. ..	106

One or two motions of but little importance were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

Their lordships met at two o'clock, for the purpose of proceeding with the other house to the palace, to present the address to her Majesty, on her return from the late treasonable attempt of the miscreant who damaged a pistol at her Majesty on Monday evening. Shortly before two o'clock several of the peers had already assembled. The body of the house presented an unusually gay and animated appearance. All the peers were in full dress, the majority of them in uniform, and some few in court dresses; the knights of the different orders wearing their dee rations. The Duke of Wellington was dressed in the uniform of the Constable of the Tower, and across his breast he wore the ribband of the Order of the Garter. Lord Hill and the other military peers appeared in full uniform, and the appearance of the house was rather that of a ball-room than of a legislative assembly The scene was picturesque in the extreme, and for splendour and magnificence has seldom been equalled

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY, in the absence of the Chancellor, took his seat upon the woolsack at two o'clock. The bills on the table were forwarded a stage.

The LORD CHANCELLOR entered the house at twenty-five minutes after two o'clock, and their lordships immediately adjourned till to-morrow

The clerk at the table then called over the names of the peers present, commencing with that of John Lord Campbell, as the junior peer present. Each peer, as his name was called, rose and left the house, to take his place in the procession.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

There was a very full attendance of members at two o'clock, the house presenting a very brilliant and animated appearance, from the large number of naval and military uniforms, and from the number of members who appeared in the full dress of deputy lieutenants of counties. The number of gentlemen in full court dress was also considerable, as the throng was broken up into detached groups round the table and on the floor of the house, engaged in animated conversation, with the brilliant light of the fine summer's day streaming down upon the crosses and decorations and floating plumes; a more splendid sight has rarely been all ried on the occasion of going up with an Address. Among the most prominent of the assembly was Mr. O'Connell, in his robes of office as Lord Mayor of Dublin; he occupied the seat in front of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and was for some time engaged in conversation with several hon. members Mr. Macaulay, Sir W Clay, and Sir J. C Hobhouse, were the Windsor uniform None of the Cabinet Ministers were present, as their presence was required at the Palace The Speaker took his high office One of the most soldier-like and remarkable figures in the house was Sir Howard Douglas; Mr. Ferrand appeared in a yeomanry cavalry uniform, of a very brassier-like description; and Dr. Bowring and Mr. Brotherton were court dresses Not above four members out of the large number present appeared in plain clothes

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter past two, and, after an interval of a few minutes

Sir T. FREMANTLE moved the adjournment of the house till five o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker, preceded by the Mace, and followed by all the members, quitted the house, to accompany the House of Lords with the Address.

Shortly after five o'clock the house resumed, and proceeded to business.

SOUTHAMPTON ELECTION

Mr. WARD presented a petition from Southampton, praying for the suspension of the writ for a fresh election for the borough of Southampton, until steps could be taken to prevent the demoralising and unconstitutional practice of bribery.

BOROUGH OF LICHFIELD.

Mr. ROEBUCK presented a petition from Lichfield, stating that at the last election gross bribery prevailed, by which the character of the inhabitants was injured. The petitioners prayed the house to take the question into consideration, and to adopt such measures as would prevent those scandalous practices.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS

The SPEAKER then said, I have to report to the house that her Majesty has been attended this day by both houses, with their Address, to which she has been graciously pleased to return this most gracious answer

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—I receive with great gratification the loyal and dutiful address from the two Houses of Parliament I am thankful to the Almighty, whose merciful care has protected me, and I humbly rely on the good providence of God, who is able to preserve me from every danger, and, from this trust, and sincere in my desire to promote the happiness of my people, I am comforted and supported by the renewed assurance of your attachment and loyalty

A considerable time was then occupied by discussions arising from the presentation of a petition connected with the late Southampton election, and a motion by Mr. Wilding, that a writ should issue for a new election, which was subsequently withdrawn.

THE SUDBURY DISFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

Mr C BULLER moved that the case of the borough of Bridport be referred to Mr. Roebuck's committee for investigation, which, upon a division, was carried as follows:—

For the motion ..	.. ..	44
Against it ..	.. ..	30
Majority ..	.. ..	14

Bridport was then inserted in the Witnesses' Indemnity Bill, the third reading of which was ordered for Friday next

The other orders of the day were disposed of, and the house adjourned at a quarter to two.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships sat at five o'clock.

ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR read her Majesty's most gracious answer to the address of the two houses presented yesterday. The answer was similar to that given to the Commons.

The answer was ordered to be inserted in the records of the house.

INCOME TAX.

The Earl of RIPON fixed to-morrow week for the second reading of the Property tax Bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took his seat shortly before four o'clock, and there being only 15 members present at four, the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the Woolsack at five o'clock.

CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION—MAYNOOTH.

Lord KENYON presented several petitions against the College of Maynooth—for an inquiry into the system of education pursued there—for the exclusion of Roman Catholics from Parliament—and for the repeal of the act of 1845, called the Catholic Relief Act.

FACTORY BILL.

The Bishop of LONDON presented a petition from the clergymen of Leeds, and from seventy other clergymen in various parts of Yorkshire Lancashire, &c, against the employment of children in mines and in favour of a Ten Hours Bill

AFFAIRS IN AFFGHANISTAN.

Lord BEAUMONT presented a petition from the Indian Committee of the Colonial Society praying for the speedy termination of the war in Affghanistan Ordered to lie on the table.

A number of bills upon the table were then advanced a stage, and the house adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY

The Speaker took his seat at the usual hour

DROPPED ORDERS

The dropped Notices of Motion and Orders of the Day were disposed of.

TIMBER DUTIES

Mr. P. M STEWART gave notice that in the committee on the Customs Bill he should move a reduction of the timber duties

SUGAR DUTIES

The house having gone into committee, Mr. GOULBURN rose to move the annual duties upon sugar. He wished it had been in his power to make such a reduction in the duties on the sugar of our colonies as would at once have relieved the British consumer, and assisted the colonial producer; but this could not have been done without an abandonment of revenue, which the present circumstances of our finance would not permit Nor could he, pending the now unsettled questions between this country and other nations, propose to lower the duty upon the slave-grown sugar of foreigners

Mr ROEBUCK moved that the duty on foreign sugar should be reduced to an equality with the duty on the sugar of the colonies.

Mr. GIBSON said, that the effect of Mr Roebuck's measure would be to destroy our plantations in the East and West Indies

Mr. LABOUCHERE then proposed a differential duty of 30s. on foreign, and 20s on colonial sugar, and professed his confidence that, after the declarations made in the present session by Sir Robert Peel, the day was not far distant when the principles of free trade would be applied to the article of sugar

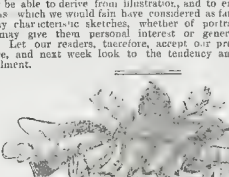
Sir R. PEEL defended the Government measure, and the committee then divided.

For the duties proposed by Ministers ..	.. ..	245
For the duty as proposed by Mr. Labouchere ..	.. ..	161
Majority for Ministers ..	.. ..	84

The other orders of the day having been disposed of, the house adjourned.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Amid the multifarious arrangements and responsibilities which have devolved upon our commencement of a journal addressing itself to so many classes of society as does the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, we have been hardly able, in our first outset, and with the claims made upon our columns by the register and illustration of absorbing topics of foreign and domestic intelligence, to give that efficiency to the general order and organization of separate departments, which we hope for the future to attain with a more regular conduct and consistency than it has yet been in our power to achieve. We apply this remark especially to the departments of Music and Theatricals; and while speaking almost apologetically for the past, we are able to announce that we have made arrangements for giving to these sections of our paper, as well as to those of Literature and the Fine Arts, as much careful attention as it is within the scope of any weekly journal to bestow. We shall also endeavour to invest our notices on these subjects with such additional popularity as they may be able to derive from illustration, and to embellish our critiques which we would fain have considered as fair as full—with as many characteristic sketches, whether of portraiture or design, as may give them personal interest or general piquancy and life. Let our readers, therefore, accept our promises upon this score, and next week look to the tendency and event of their fulfilment.



SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

TATTERSALL'S. MONDAY.

It rarely happens that a good betting follows a Derby won by a great public favourite; we could mention a dozen instances in which the reverse has been the case; but it will be sufficient to instance the Cadland, Bay Middleton, and Coronation years. It is with regret we add, that the Attila year is likely to rival the worst of them. Up to Saturday morning nothing had transpired to induce a suspicion that there would be any serious defalcations. On Sunday however, it was announced that Mr. Beales had been bit for £18,000, and could not pay! The news came like a thunderbolt, for, independent of the amount of the deficit, it must necessarily place many other parties who lost on the race, in a very embarrassing position. It has also affected several who fondly imagined they were winners Of this class, one is let in for £3000, (the same gentleman lost between £3000 and £4000 by an absentee in Bloomsbury's year); another for £1900; a third for £2000; three for £1000 each, and so on: all his personal friends suffer; and from what came out on Monday, we are compelled to look upon it as one of the most hopeless cases that ever came under our notice. The individual in default was of long standing on the turf, and up to the paralysing declaration on Sunday, was considered one of the soundest men in the ring. Of course, this subject, and its probable influence in other quarters, engrossed the attention of all present.

On Tuesday—[I never can send off 300 or 400 persons of different ranks entered the yard, in the vain hope of settling their accounts on the Derby and Oaks; and they were, one and all, miserably disappointed. The heavy defalcation already announced, would alone have been sufficient to produce a sensible effect; but when we add, that from parties who did not show at all, and those who did attend and only paid in part, a further sum, amounting to upwards of £40 000, was "wanting," the nature of this so-called "settling" will be appreciated. With the exception of Colonel Anson, the large amount of whose winnings must have enabled him to realise a portion, we do not believe that a single person left the yard a winner. One gentleman was £7000 short by bad or pinched debts (including £4000 by Mr. Beales, the whole of which was commission money), another nearly £5000, and several of two, three, and four thousand each. Such is the present state of the turf money-market; in another week or two the intentions of those in arrear will have developed themselves, and we shall return to the subject; in the meantime, it is almost superfluous to add, that betting is out of the question.

"Craven," of the Herald, writing pithily on this affair of Tuesday, says "Proverbs, like general rules, are not without their exceptions. Thus it is said, "Those who lose, may laugh, those who win will." This was anything but the case yesterday at the Corner, where the appearance of affairs reminded one of a funeral, "to have a little sociable sorrow together." Never did a company of men assemble at a spot devoted to pleasurable meetings in such melancholy moods; never were seen before a congregation of persons so fitted to constitute a funeral. As I turned into Grosvenor-place, I met as lighthearted a sinner as ever said "done" to achance, and booked it for a certainty. He looked like a mute at the door of a deceased prince. "What's the news?" said I. "The world's against its late," was the answer. "Came here to receive £1400, and haven't got enough to pay the shilling fare for my cab." On entering the old familiar yard, for the new subscription room was not the rendezvous yesterday, on every side might be seen despondency in its various expressions of grief, indignation, contempt, and rage. In the first place, I learnt that one defaulter to the melody of something like £20,000 was absolutely declared, while others were on the point of failures of £4000 and such like sums. One gentleman stated to me that he was a winner by the week to the amount of £400, that he had entered the yard with £1500 of his own money in his pocket, and was about to leave it a loser of £1300. Another, that he lost £400 by the Derby, that he had brought £2400 to meet his engagements, and was at that moment without a guinea in his pocket! But one answer was given to my inquiries as to the nature of the settlement, and that was—"It is the worst that has been known for years." It would be an endless attempt to particularise the many instances of defalcation. This much is all I want to establish by the cases brought forward namely, that the absence of a single speculator who was the medium whereby some £20 000, or probably less, would have found its way into circulation, absolutely acted as a pall upon the whole market. Was then, with a fraction of the £20 000 even here, all the "Public" betting. As the whole matter of bets is settled in private, "Are there such sums on the surface of this globular abode?" The day cannot be far distant when betting, like all other engagements entered into by a gentleman, will imply the necessity that he should be in the possession of funds to meet those issues upon which he has promised to pay.

THURSDAY.

The storm of Tuesday had subsided into a strange portentous calm. There were not twenty subscribers at Tattersall's; and the few present appeared to have met together for the purpose of mutual condolence. The havoc made by the principal defaulters turns out to be far more general and sweeping than was at first imagined. One, who was supposed to be missing for £4000, it has been ascertained owes quite £12,000; and many others have gone upon a similar sliding scale.

The following bets were laid in the course of the afternoon:—

ASCOT CUP.

Even on Mr. Ramsay's Lanercost (laid to about £500).
5 to 2 agst. Mr. O de's Bee's-wing (laid to about £100).
3—1 Mr. Combes' the Noh.
7—1 Sir G. Heathcote's Bokhara (300 to 50 laid once).

ST. LEGER.

2—1 Col. Anson's Attila (taken).
9—1 Mr. Ramsay's Cabrera.
17—1 Mr. Bowes's Meteor (20 to 1 laid once).

SALES OF THE EARLS OF ROSSLYN AND CASSILIS'S HUNTING STUDS.—Tattersall's yard, at Hyde Park corner, was crowded on Monday with noblemen and gentlemen connected with the turf, in consequence of the announced sales of the hunting studs of the above-named noblemen. Lord Rosslyn's horses were his private property, which he had no further occasion for since his appointment as Master of the Buck Hounds. The principal lots of Lord Rosslyn's stud fetched the subjoined prices:—Monarch 80 guineas, Moonlight 125 guineas, Twilight 150 guineas, Grenadier 70 guineas, Tom Bowling 165 guineas, Tom 80 guineas, Playmate 70 guineas, Apprentice 84 guineas. Lord Cassilis's horses, which had been hunted during the winter with the Pytchley hounds, fetched fair prices. Grasshopper was knocked down at 115 guineas, Embassy 58 guineas, Stella 94 guineas, Triumph 70 guineas, Warrior (a charger) 77 guineas, The Lionet 62 guineas. Lord Maidstone, Mr. Brandling, Sir John Gerard, and Sir Robert Brownrigg, were the principal purchasers.

ASCOT RACES.—These races commence on Tuesday next, and will terminate on the following Friday. The course is now in most excellent order, and the arrangements which have been completed promise that the ensuing meeting will equal, in every respect, the brilliance of former doings at far-famed Ascot. Instructions have been issued by the stewards, the Earl of Rosslyn, the noble Master of the Royal Buckhounds, the Duke of Bedford, the Hon. Col. Anson, and the Hon. G. S. Byng, to the active clerk of the course, Mr. Hibburd, to have, not only every accommodation and facility to her Majesty and her royal and illustrious visitors to and from the Heath, in the progress from and return to Windsor Castle, but to every other visitor to one of the most fashionable race-courses in the kingdom. A strong body of the metropolitan police has been engaged, who will be present on each day of the races, stationed at various parts of the Heath. The thimble-riggers, who have been tolerated upon some former occasions, will be prevented from following their rascally calling by the police. The only chance they will have of picking up their victims will be at the outskirts of the Heath, out of the range of the police force. The Court will attend the races on Tuesday and the gold cup on that day. Indeed, it is announced that their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, will be taken for an airing to the Heath, should the weather prove favourable, upon one of the days of her Majesty honouring the course with her presence. Several horses entered for the various stakes arrived at Ascot, Sunninghill, Bracknall, and other places in the immediate neighbourhood of the Heath during the past week. There are only eleven entries for the Gold Cup, and it is not expected that more than from three to five horses will start. The entries for this stake, as well as for the majority of the other stakes, during the four days, comprise some of the most valuable horses and first-rate horses in the kingdom.

AQUATIC SPORTS.—Soon with its Derby and Oaks, Epsom with its long odds and long faces, has passed by, and as a relief to the sports of the turf, the attention of the reader is claimed for the bright prospects of the aquatic field. The first match which invites the sporting interest is amongst the noblemen and gentlemen's yachts, belonging to the Royal Thames Yacht Club, of which her Majesty and distinguished Consort are the patrons. This event has been most judiciously appointed between the Epsom and Ascot meetings, and will be succeeded by an eight-oared cutter match between the gentlemen of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, whose prowess in this sport, so congenial to our sea-girt isle, has been so often and deservedly the theme of admiration This match, with all its honourable emulation, is but the prelude to a greater—we allude to the grand regatta at Henley-upon-Thames, in which gentlemen of all the Universities, and gentlemen duly qualified, composing the great London Aquatic Clubs, will contend on two following days. These, and the prodigious struggle for a sculling championship o the Thames, not sufficiently yet entered into to warrant any further comment, are the prospects which at this season of the year beam upon this healthful, scientific, and highly popular sport.

The first of these events takes place on Saturday (this day), amongst the following yachts:—

FIRST CLASS.

Yachts.	Tons	Owners.	Colours.
Phantom	29	J. F. Seeby, Esq..	White and Blue
Mystery	25	Lord A Paget ..	Blue White Maltese Cross
Mary	25	G. Asmn, Esq. ..	White quartered Red

SECOND CLASS.

Lady Louisa	13	T. Smith, Esq. ..	Blue
Spray	14	G. Taylor, Esq. ..	Red White Maltese Cross

THIRD CLASS.

Brilliant	8	H. Fowler, Esq ..	Blue with White Stripes
Sea Nymph	10	C. Wheeler, jun. Esq.	White before Blue
Rival	10	W. Sawyer, Esq. ..	Red and White quartered

The prize for the first-class is a handsome sea-service; for the second a silver salver; and for the third a silver claret-jug; and the distance to be contested, as usual, from Greenwich to Coal-house Point, a mile below Gravesend; and back

The Oxford and Cambridge race will take place on the 11th, and both parties are engaged in selecting their crews from the different college boats but as yet neither company is formed.

The great regatta at Henley will take place on the 14th and 15th. CATCHING OTTERS.—Within the last three months no fewer than 29 otters were caught in traps in a drain, or burn, on the Scone policies, opposite the mouth of the Almond. It is well known that these otter is the most dreaded enemy the salmon has to encounter in rivers; and, on the bank, at the mouth of the burn mentioned, so numerous had they been, and so successful were they in their predatory excursions in the water, that often the bodies of half-devoured salmon, cels, and various sorts of fishes, were found. In some cases, the river edge was discovered almost strewed with the remains of their victims. It is supposed, however, that the colony, which appears to have been rather a populous one, is now almost extirpated, from the number of its inhabitants caught. Otter-skins are very valuable, and 21 of a fair or average size, in a proper market, would fetch £18 at least.—Glasgow Chronicle.

RACES TO COME.—Ascot, June 7; Hampton, June 15; Cheltenham, June 29; Newmarket, July 5; Southampton, July 19; Goodwood, July 26; Brighton, August 3; Exham, August 23.

It was currently reported in Quebec that the brigade of Guards would return home in the course of the summer. The navigation of the St. Lawrence was open.

SWINDLING IN EDINBURGH. A man named John Harkins, or Hankey, is now in custody upon charges of swindling of a more extensive kind than have occurred in Glasgow of late years. His custom was to take a shop in some part of the city or suburbs, and then, under the pretext of commencing business, and after having got a stock upon the promise of immediate payment, he sold the goods and decamped to some other locality of the city, where he operated in the same odious manner. All such there are upwards of twenty charges against the prisoner. He had got goods from parties in Glasgow and Paisley, and it would appear, from the variety of articles that have been supplied, had with him at one time all that came in the net. From one class of dealers he procured supplies of whiskey, tea, and brown sugar, from another, butter, tea berries, raisins, tea, sugar, starch, and pepper, in the hardware line he handled tea pots, pots of every, brass and steel scales, pokers, fire shovels, pans, shot, sad-irons, and saws. From another class he got tea berries, raisins, tea, sugar, starch, and pepper, in the haberdashery line he handled pieces of cotton

LITERATURE.

PRINCE ALBERT, HIS COUNTRY AND KINDRED. Ward, Pater-noster-row.

This interesting compilation has, we believe, reached a second edition, and consequently still preserves the interest which its subject originally excited. The husband of our Queen has now been domiciliated amongst us sufficiently long to make us acquainted with the many excellent qualities by which he was endeared to the people of his fatherland; and there can be but few of her Majesty's subjects to whom this narrative of his family and home would now be uninteresting. The work, which is handsomely embellished with engravings, possesses also an additional claim to our attention by its details connected with the life and times of that great reformer, Martin Luther, and the following account of his arrival at Worms, in obedience to the orders of the Diet, is exceedingly well told:

"On the 16th day of April, 1521, Martin Luther entered the town of Worms in an open carriage, singing the hymn "Our God is a strong citadel," which afterwards became known as Luther's hymn, and the inspiring song of the Reformation. The multitude that welcomed him was prodigious, and it was with difficulty that he could reach his lodging, which was the house of the Teutonic knights, and near to that of the Elector of Saxony. On alighting from the vehicle, he exclaimed—"God will be on my side!"

The day after his arrival was appointed for his first hearing. When the important morning arrived, the crowd was so great, that it was found impossible for Luther to go from his lodging to the Diet Hall through the streets; hence he was conducted by a private way through a garden, and by back stairs into the hall, preceded by the marshal of the empire. As he was about to enter, George von Freundsberg, a brave knight, and celebrated general of Charles V., tapped him on the shoulder, and said "Monk! monk! thou art now going to encounter more than I and many a colonel have ever done in our severest engagements; if thou art assured that thy opinions are right, and thy cause just, proceed in the name of God, and be of good cheer; God will not forsake thee."

The proceedings were opened by John Eckius, who, producing a bundle of books, said they were written by Luther, of whom he demanded whether those books which went by his name were really written by him? Upon this, John Schnuff called out in a loud voice, "You ought to recite the titles of the books;" which was done; and Luther answered the question without hesitation, "Unless the books have been mutilated, or altered by fanciful aciolists or by the arts of adversaries, they are certainly mine."

The other question proposed to him was—whether he intended to defend or retract what was contained in those books? Before replying to this query, Luther demanded time; "Because," said he, "it would be equally rash and dangerous for me to give a sudden answer to such a question; since, without previous deliberation, I might assert less than the subject demands, and more than the truth would admit; both which would expose me to condemnation from that sentence of Christ—"Whoever denieth me before men, him will I deny before my father which is in heaven." After some deliberation, this request was granted, and the Diet broke up.

On the succeeding morning, Luther entered upon his defence, which was spoken in the German language. It had already lasted two hours, when John Eckius—unable any longer to bear with the bold advocacy of Holy Writ, in opposition to the Pope's authority, to which Luther's arguments were mainly directed—started up, and with much heat interrupted him, by vociferously insisting that he was not called upon to give an account of his doctrines, they having been already condemned by former councils, and demanding whether he would, simply and clearly, retract his opinions? Luther instantly replied that he would not, and concluded in these words: "Hic stehe ich, ich kan nicht anders, Got helff mir. Amen."—"Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise; God help me. Amen."

When Luther had finished, he was ordered to say the same things in the Latin language. At first he was so much out of breath, and overcome by the pressure around him, that he paused; but perceiving that his enemies were making a sort of triumph of his apparent inability to proceed, he quickly recovered himself, and went over the same ground in Latin with prodigious fluency and animation.

The council then took his speech into consideration, and told him, by their speaker, that he had answered with modesty; but that for him, who had revived the errors condemned at Constance, to require to be refuted and convinced from Scripture, was the wild proposal of a madman! "Councils," exclaimed Luther, "have erred frequently!" "You cannot prove that," said Eckius. "I will pledge myself to do it," replied the monk. But night coming on, the council broke up.

The engraving we have selected as a specimen purports to be a view of the Castle of Erenburg, the birth-place of his Royal Highness Prince Albert:—

THE CASTLE OF BRENBURG.

THE EDUCATION OF MOTHERS OF FAMILIES. By M. AIME-MARTIN. Translated from the third Paris edition, by EDWIN LEE, Esq. Whittaker and Co.

A more important subject has rarely been introduced to the world through the medium of a translation from the French than that which is treated of in the work before us. If it be correct, as asserted by Locke, that "of all the men we meet with, nine parts out of ten are what they are, good or evil, useful or not, by their education," how much is dependent upon the means by which education is imparted, and how intimately are the destinies of a people interwoven with the conscientious performance of those educational duties which, in the outset of existence, naturally devolve upon mothers. The instruction given by the Emperor Napoleon to Madame Campan, with reference to this subject, evidences his profound knowledge of the true interests of his people: "It must be your endeavour, Madame, to form mothers who will know how to educate their children"—in that knowledge lies the grand secret of a nation's welfare. The style in which Mr. Lee has performed his task adds increased value to the original work, which we should hope, for the credit of the mothers of England, will be universally read by them. The book is replete with information of the highest order, and our fair readers will be better able to appreciate it by the following extract, which we give as a specimen:—

Whatever be the customs or the laws of a country, it is the women who give the direction to its manners. Whether free or subject, they reign because they derive their power from our passions. But this influence is more or less salutary according to the degree of estimation in which they are held; be they our idols or our companions, courtezans, slaves, or beasts of burden, the reaction will be complete—they will make us what they themselves are. It appears as if nature attached our intelligence to their dignity, just as we attach our happiness to their virtue. Here then is a law of eternal justice; man cannot debase women without becoming himself degraded; he cannot elevate them without becoming better. Let us cast our eyes over the earth, and observe the two great divisions of the human race—the East and the West; one half of the Old World continues without improvement, and without ideas, beneath the weight of a barbarous civilization; there the women are slaves; the other half progresses towards equality and enlightenment, and we there see women free and honoured.

A few months ago was published in the papers the account of an English physician, whom curiosity had led to the East. Being accidentally introduced into the slave-market, he perceived a score of Greek women, half naked, lying on the ground, in expectation of a purchaser. One of them had attracted the attention of an old Turk; the barbarian examined her minutely as one would examine a horse, while during his inspection the merchant praised the beauty of her eyes, the elegance of her figure, and other minor perfections; he protested tat the poor girl was not more than thirteen years of age, that she as a virgin, and neither dreamed nor snored night. In short, after a close examination, and some bargaining about the price, she was sold, body and soul, for about sixty pounds. The soul, it is true, was but little considered in the bargain. The unhappy creature, half fainting in the arms of her mother (for this horrid compact was made beneath the eyes of her mother), implored with piercing cries the assistance of her sorrowing companions. But in this barbarous land all hearts were closed; the laws render one insensible to the evils which they sanction. The affair was concluded, and the young girl was delivered to her master. Thus vanished for her, thus must vanish for all women in this part of the world, that delightful futurity of love and happiness which nature has prepared for them. Who would believe it? this infernal transaction took place in Europe in 1829, at the distance of six hundred leagues from Paris and London, the two capitals of the human race; and at the present moment it is the living history of two-thirds of the inhabitants of the globe! What monsters would be produced by such an union! What kind of progeny will arise from this combination of vileness, hatred, and misfortune! Worshipper of Mahomet, is this one of the companions of thy life, one of the mothers of thy children? Thou requirest from her delights for thyself, and an affectionate disposition for thy son.' An affectionate disposition! Nothing can be expected from this sorrowing creature but thy own degradation and that of thy posterity.

Nature has so willed it, that true love, the most exclusive of all the feelings, should be the only possible foundation of civilization. This sentiment invites all men to a simple life, exempt at the same time from idleness, from effeminacy, and from brutal passions. All is harmony, all is happiness, in the intimate link which unites two young married persons. The man, happy in the society of his wife, finds his faculties increase with his duties: he attends to out-door avocations, takes his part in the burdens of a citizen, cultivates his lands, or is usefully occupied in the town. The woman, more retiring, presides over the domestic arrangements. At home she influences her husband; diffuses joy in the midst of order and abundance; both see themselves reflected in the children seated at their table, who promise by the force of example to perpetuate their virtues."

POPULARITY, AND THE DESTINIES OF WOMAN. By MRS. C. BARON WILSON. Cunningham, St. Martin's-place.

Mrs. Wilson has again charmed us with another of those excellent productions for which the literary world is already so deeply indebted to her. With this lady genius and industry walk hand in hand, and never were companions more elegantly associated. The first tale, entitled Popularity, embraces some graphic delineations of the various means by which that dangerous possession is often sought to be acquired; and incidents are detailed that would run parallel with some of the recent disclosures on election committees, and almost dispute with them the claim to reality. The second story is that of a young and highly-accomplished, but heartless girl, who, in her pride, trifles with affection, and meets her reward by a life of misery, and ultimately a broken heart. The only object she had loved, yet trifled with until she had lost him, returns to England in after years to find a grave in his native land. His corpse is accompanied by the orphan child of his brother, who had been the protegée of her victim. The following scene describes the events immediately succeeding the arrival of the remains:—

On the following morning, when Alicia descended from her chamber, she learned that the mournful cavalcade had arrived at the hotel.

It consisted of (besides Miss Vernon and Alicia's servants) three attached native attendants, a male and two females, whose laments for their "dear massa" were truly heart-rending.

The captain of the vessel, and the chief officers, accompanied the body on shore, and each seemed to vie with the other in testifying their respect for the deceased.

The coffin containing the body was deposited in an upper room, until orders should be given by Miss Mowbray for its interment; and every decency and decorum was observed that respect and esteem could pay.

When Alicia entered the room in which her breakfast was laid, she found Mrs. Jones already there with the young stranger. The heart of Alicia sprung to her eyes on beholding the little girl, and with feelings that admitted of no control, she snatched the child to her bosom, and welcomed her with all a mother's tenderness. Coldly, and almost repulsively, the little girl returned her caresses, and they sat down to the morning meal. A single word—a "Yes, ma'am," or a "No, ma'am," was all that Alicia could extract in answer to the questions she put to her niece; and finding all her efforts at conversation vain, and that her presence was evidently a restraint upon the child, Alicia left her to the care of Mrs. Jones, and retired again to her room.

Ere noon, the Abigail came to inform her mistress that all her attempts to soothe Miss Vernon were in vain; that she had broken from her surveillance, and had insisted on being conducted to the attendants who had accompanied the body, and was now weeping with them in the chamber of death.

Alicia dispatched Mrs. Jones with a message to her niece, and in half an hour descended again to the breakfast room.

On her entering, the child started up from the sofa on which she was sitting, and demanded in an authoritative voice, "Why may I not stay with my other papa?"

The extreme beauty of the child, and her similitude to her deceased brother, melted the heart of Alicia. She had before scarcely ventured to glance at her niece; but now she advanced, and holding out her hand endeavoured by every act of kindness in her power to conciliate the obdurate orphan.

"What is your name?" said Alicia, affectionately; "come here, and let us have some talk together."

The child doggedly approached her; she repeated the question.

"My name is ALICIA," said the little girl; "the prettiest name in the world—so my 'other papa' said—and he gave it me, for I was to have been named MARIA!"

The heart of Alicia throbbed—(she knew not why)—almost to breaking.

"Don't you like the name?" resumed the little girl, more confidently than she had ever yet spoken, and looking up into the face of her relative.

"It is my name also," replied Alicia; "but I shall henceforth like it better for your sake, dear one;" and she kissed the cheek of the little stranger.

"I want to go and see my 'other papa,'" said the little Alicia, in a half whisper; "do let me go: I won't cry, indeed I won't; only I want to look at the great black box they have put him into; it's a narrow berth: don't you think so?" pursued the speaker, glancing timidly up to the face of Alicia.

"Poor child," said her aunt, the warm tears starting to her eyes—"What ought I to do, Jones?" added she, turning to address that worthy matron, who was standing in the bow-window of the room.

Few words of consultation sufficed; and Alicia, turning to the little girl, said, "If it will afford you any consolation, I will myself accompany you to the chamber where your friend's remains are: come!"

"Now I shall like you," said the young stranger, putting her hand, unasked, into that of her aunt,—"since you'll go with me to see my 'other papa.'"

Preceded by Mrs. Jones, Alicia and her niece ascended to the chamber where the body lay. The blinds were drawn down, the shutters partially closed; and the room, though at noon-day, was dimly lighted with wax-candles. On a table in the middle of the chamber stood the coffin, decently covered with a white cloth. The two native female attendants were crouching, half asleep and stupified with grief, at its foot; the man was walking up and down the room, murmuring a sort of dirge.

On seeing strangers with their "young missee," as they termed the little Alicia, the women rose from the crouching posture they had assumed; the negro stood still; for a few seconds the group contemplated the scene before them in unbroken silence; and that awe which is inseparable from the presence of the dead, seemed to be felt by all.

"I want to see the black box, Diana," at length half whispered the young orphan; "take away this ugly cloth,"—and she touched the sheet which covered the body. Ere Alicia could forbid it, the Indian woman had removed the covering; and the sable coffin with its silver mountings and white inscription plate, stood exposed to view.

Instinctively, and with a feeling for which she could not account, Alicia advanced a step towards the table; her eye fell on the inscription plate.

"Papa is gone to heaven! and my 'other papa' that's there, will go to him," said the little girl, as she looked timidly into the statue-like face of Alicia. "And that's his name," continued she, as she glanced on the coffin. "Oh! such a pretty name—Frederick Dudley—but he let me call him "Old Freddy."

"Dudley! thou art avenged," murmured Alicia, as she sank senseless on the floor.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE PRESERVATION OF HEALTH. By JOHN HARRISON CURTIS, Esq. Churchill, Princes-street.

We have before us a fourth edition of Mr. Curtis's truly valuable and interesting work on the preservation of health, which appears to have attracted almost universal attention throughout Europe and America. It will be a sufficient recommendation of Mr. Curtis's treatise to state that since the publication of the first edition, in 1837, upwards of 9000 copies have been sold in this country alone, and the improvements and additions in the present issue must greatly enhance its value and usefulness; the objections that have long existed against the spread of knowledge among the people upon the subject of the principles of the science of health are fast dying away, and this book is eminently calculated to give effect and proper direction to the spirit of inquiry that is now abroad with reference to those principles.

The following passage will suffice to indicate the style in which this popular subject is treated:—

In the construction of houses and public buildings, there is, for the most part, but little care taken to provide for due ventilation, incapable of being regulated at the strictest scientific principles. Who has not experienced the ill effects of this neglect, in headaches, flushings, languor, and debility, incurred by attending meetings of large numbers of persons? These evils are caused by the inhalation of air from which much of the oxygen has been abstracted, and which has thus become unfit for the purposes of respiration. Dr Combe, in his valuable work on Physiology, informs us that—"During the winter of 1834, an unusual number of courses of popular lectures on the utter impossibility of safe ventilation, were given in Edinburgh, many of which were very fully attended, and were accessible only at such an expense of health and suffering, on the part of never less than the most auditors, as served to neutralise, in a great measure, the advantages which might otherwise have been derived from them. Several of my own friends were compelled to discontinue their attendance; while others persevered, although at the certain cost of a severe headache. This nuisance is the more to be regretted, as it has arisen solely from the architects, and the public not having been sufficiently alive to the importance of procuring that prime necessary of life—pure air, and not at all from any difficulty of obtaining it, which can do not, at the first, have been easily overcome."

Many persons exhibit a great deal of anxiety to make their houses and rooms air-tight; stopping every crevice with sand-bags, chimney-boards, and other devices of the same kind, with as much care as if they were endeavouring to exclude some fatal malaria. It is true that drafts are to be avoided; and I would not recommend any one to occupy a house constructed on the plan lauded in the old Irish maxim—that a house cannot be healthy unless there is room for a bird to fly in at the windows, and for a dog to creep under the doors; yet it is scarcely less improper to prevent altogether the gradual but constant renewal of the air of our apartments.

It is sincerely to be hoped that more attention will be paid to this subject, and that provision for perfect ventilation will not, in future, be overlooked by the architects either of private or public buildings. Meantime, persons of delicate health, especially those whose lungs are weak, ought to beware of frequenting numerous and crowded assemblies: the theatre, the ball-room, and other fashionable places of resort, have destroyed many a victim.

It is still a common practice to surround the bed with heavy close-drawn curtains, as if for the express purpose of confining the impure air around the sleepers; and as in many bed-rooms (frequently the smallest in the house) the usual channels of ventilation, such as chimneys, &c., are wanting, and the doors continue closed for several hours together, it is not surprising that the atmosphere of these rooms should become much vitiated, which is probably the chief cause of the languor and drowsiness experienced by many persons on first rising, instead of that buoyant cheerfulness which should be the result of rest and sleep.

Care should be taken to provide for the constant admission of fresh air into sleeping apartments, which, instead of being the smallest, ought, in reason, to be the largest rooms of the house. At all events, during the day-time they ought to be perfectly ventilated. Perhaps nothing tends more to produce disease among the poorer classes of society, than the practice of occupying the sleeping apartments throughout the day—a practice which must effectually prevent the complete renovation of the air, with them the more necessary, on account of the confined situations of their dwellings. The custom of keeping dogs and large birds, such as parrots, in dwelling houses, frequently causes the vitiation of the air to be of such an extent as to render it exceedingly unwholesome and unpleasant.

Oxygen is indispensable to combustion; so that the effect of fires (especially if coke or charcoal is used), candles, or gas lights, upon the air, is precisely the same as that of respiration, but in a greater degree. Where they are used, therefore, attention to ventilation is still more important; express provision ought to be made to carry off directly the impure air which they so plentifully generate.

These remarks are universally applicable; no circumstances whatever can remove the necessity for pure air, although the mode of procuring it is frequently a matter requiring great care.

A LECTURE ON THE PROGRESS OF PHYSICAL SCIENCE SINCE THE OPENING OF THE LONDON INSTITUTION. Delivered in the Theatre of the Institution, by W. R Grove, Esq., M.A., F.R.S, Professor of Experimental Philosophy.

Of the many excellent establishments of which England may be justly proud, there are none more noble—none which possess higher claims to admiration and support than literary and scientific institutions. Their object is indeed a high one—it is to extend the range of human knowledge—it is to place within the range of the many means of its acquisition, originally confined to the few—it is to diffuse a taste for the exercise of the higher faculties with which man is endowed—it is to transmit, orally and experimentally, the rewarches of minds, mortal as to their material conjunction, but immortal in their effect upon their fellowman—it is to stand the noblest cenotaphs of genius, the perdurable links which bind it to surviving kindred.

It is not our intention, because it would be utterly beyond our limits, to review in detail the various improvements and discoveries which have shed a radiance over the age in which we have lived; but we cannot refrain from taking this opportunity of briefly adverting to them, leaving to a future time the more particular explanation of the principles on which they depend.

The London Institution was established originally in the year 1805, but the proprietors, finding that their numbers, as well as their means, increased most rapidly, removed the establishment to its present situation. The first stone of the present structure was laid in 1815, the last in 1819, in which year Mr. Brande delivered a lecture in its theatre on the then state of physical science. Twenty-two years have since rolled over. The establishment of a professorship of experimental philosophy to the institution, was followed by the election of Mr. W. R. Grove, the discoverer of the voltaic battery which bears his name; and in the commencement of the past season, the first in which he occupied the professor's chair, the lecture now under notice was delivered, in which a retrospect was taken of the progress of science since the building of the present Institution. We were fortunate enough to be present on the occasion; and we are glad to perceive that the impression made upon our mind was so universal as to have induced the proprietors of the Institution to print the lecture.

As we have before remarked, it would be out of our power and limits critically to analyse the lecture, but it may not be uninteresting to our readers to know how science has progressed of late years, for which purpose we subjoin the chief and most important additions to our knowledge in but a few out of the many of the physical sciences.

In Mechanics, we have Babbage's Calculating Machine, Moseley's Rules for the determination of the Modulers of a Machine.—Acoustics. The invention of the Syren, by Professor Wheatstone.—In Chemistry, the Condensation of Gases; the discovery of six new metals, viz.: Silicium, Zirconium, Thorium, Glucinum, Vanadium, and Lantanum; of a new element, Bromine?—Organic Chemistry has been enriched by the agricultural discoveries of Liebig.—Voltaic Electricity has acquired gigantic dimensions.—Electro-Magnetism, with its application as a motive power, its use as a safe means of blasting rocks, and even making the sea yield up its long-buried treasures.—Electrotype, with its derivatives, Electro-tints, Electro-gilding, &c.

Light has given us the two wonderful discoveries of Photography and Daguerreoty e, while in Astronomy, the improvements of telescopes, by Lord Oxmantown, has yielded us the parallax of fixed stars.

Such are the discoveries of these few years. Carlyle has remarked that, "It is thus everywhere that foolish rumour babbles not of what was done, but of what was mis-done or undone, and foolish history (ever more or less the written epitomised synopsis of rumour) knows so little, that it were as well unknown." How true, indeed, is this! it is not the Cæsars, the Alexanders, the Napoleons, that save made men what they are, but the Galileos, the Bacons, the Newtons, the Voltas.

M. JACQUARD.

The following memoir of M. Jacquard, and his silk-loom, we cannot refrain from giving, presuming his name may be more familiar to many of his readers than our history:—

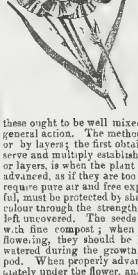
"He was originally a manufacturer of straw-hats at Lyons, and it was not till the peace of Amiens that his attent on was first attracted to the silk mechanism. The conversation between England and France being then open an English newspaper fell into his hands. In this he met a paragraph, stating that a premium would be awarded, by a society in this country, to any person who should weave a net by machinery. The perusal of this extract awakened his latent mechanical powers, and induced him to turn his thoughts to the discovery of the required contrivance. He succeeded, and produced a net woven by machinery of his own invention. It seems, however, that the pleasure of success was the only reward which he coveted, for, as soon as accomplished, he became indifferent to the work of his ingenuity—threw it aside for some time, and subsequently gave it to a friend as a matter in which he no longer took any interest. The net was by some means at length exhibited to some persons in authority, and by them sent to Paris. After a period had elapsed, in which M. Jacquard declares that he had entirely forgotten his production, he was sent for by the Prefect of Lyons, who asked him if he had not directed his attention to the making of nets by machinery. He did not immediately recollect the circumstance to which the Prefect alluded; the net was, however, produced, and this recalled the fact to his mind. The Prefect then rather peremptorily desired him to produce the machine by which this result had been effected. M. Jacquard asked three weeks for its completion; at the end of which time he brought his invention to the Prefect, and directing him to strike some part of the machine with his foot, a knot was tied in the net. The ingenious contrivance was sent to Paris, and an order was thence despatched for the arrest of the inventor.

"Under Napoleon's arbitrary government, even the desire for the diffusion of improvements was evinced in a most unconciliatory manner; and while inventions in the useful arts were sufficiently prized, no respect was paid to those persons by whom they were originated. Accordingly, M. Jacquard found himself under the keeping of a gens d'arme, by whom he was to be conducted to Paris in all haste, so that he was not permitted even to go home. He provided himself with the requisites for his sudden journey. When arrived in Paris, he was required to produce his machine at the Conservatory of Arts, and submit it to the examination of inspectors. After this ordeal he was introduced to Bonaparte and to Carnot, the latter of whom said to him, with a look of incredulity—'Are you the man who pretends to this impossibility—who professes to tie a knot in a stretched string?' In answer to this inquiry the machine was produced, and its operation exhibited and explained. This was strangely was M. Jacquard's first mechanical experiment brought into notice and patronised. He was afterwards required to examine a loom on which from twenty to thirty thousand francs had been expended, and which was employed in the production of articles for the use of Bonaparte. M. Jacquard offered to effect the same object by a simple machine, instead of the complicated one by which the work was sought to be performed—and, improving on a model of Vaucanson, produced the mechanism which bears his name. A pension of a thousand crowns was granted to him by the Government as a reward for his discovery, and he returned to Lyons, his native town. So violent, however, was the opposition made to the introduction of his loom, and so great was the enmity he excited in consequence of his invention, that three times he with the greatest difficulty escaped with a life. The Conseil des Prudhommes, who are appointed to watch over the interests of the Lyonese trade, broke up his machine in the public place; the iron (to use his own expression) was sold for iron—the wood for wood, and he, its inventor, was delivered over to universal enmity! The ignorance and prejudice which caused the silk-weavers of Lyons to destroy a means of assistance to their labours, capable of being made a source of great benefit to themselves, was not dispelled till the French began to feel the effects of foreign competition in silk manufactures. They were then forced to adopt the Jacquard loom, which led to such great improvement in their silk-weaving, and this machine is now extensively employed throughout the whole of the silk manufacturing districts of France as well as of England."

The good citizens of Lyons have at length become fully sensible of the benefit they derive from the invention of M. Jacquard, and have been pleased to show their gratitude to this ingenious mechanic, by erecting, very recently, in one of their public squares, a splendid statue to his memory.

HORTICULTURE.

THE CARNATION.



This flower is supposed by some to have been introduced into England from Italy by the monks who, in the early ages, were the only cultivators of the arts and sciences, as they were also the great opponents of that civilisation, which has now in its energy almost perfected the works of nature, and daily exhibits to us, in a higher state, the genius and capabilities of man. The carnation is occasionally found in a wild state among the ruins of our old castles and abbeys, and, perhaps, this rather bears out the supposition of its introduction into this country. In rearing them, it is very necessary to be particularly attentive to the soil in which they are grown—which should consist of one part of yellow virgin loam, half a part of black mould, two parts of thoroughly-rotted horse dung, with clear gritty sand, as an internal drainage; these ought to be well mixed to ensure for the whole compost one general action. The method of propagation is by seed, by pipings, or by layers; the first obtain new varieties; and the others, to preserve and multiply establishments. The time for taking the pipings, or layers, is when the plant is in bloom, but before it becomes far advanced, as if they are too firm they will not strike so easily. They require pure air and free exposure to it, but the blooms when needful, must be protected by shades of glass or paper, lest they lose their colour through the strength of the sun; still the glass ought to be left uncovered. The seeds should be sown in April, and covered with fine compost; when planted, where they are to remain for flowering, they should be kept distant from each other, and well watered during the growth of the stem and swelling of the flower pod. When properly advanced, circular cards should be put immediately under the flower, and the lowest series of petals spread neatly upon them. Towards the end of October they should be removed to the station where it is intended for them to winter; if in frames, the bottoms should be covered with a layer of coal ashes, and the frames raised on bricks to give air below; the surface of the mould should be kept loose by stirring, and care should be taken to admit plenty of air; it may be done at all times with safety, except in the very cold weather.

OBSERVATIONS.—Water free-growing plants twice a day; others should have a good supply every evening. Uncover tulips, if seed is intended to be saved, fix a piece of glass horizontally over each pod. The up carnations, pinks, dahlias, &c. The choice kinds of carnations and protees should be shaded from the strong sun. Cover up ranunculas as soon as the bloom opens. Planting out should be finished immediately, for the heat of the sun is very prejudicial to plants recently removed. Green-house plants may now be placed out of doors.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE IN HYDE PARK. Wednesday afternoon the following determined attempt at suicide and providential restoration to life took place in Hyde-park. About two o'clock, a respectably dressed middle-aged female was observed by some person passing over the bridge across the Serpentine to mount the coping over the middle arch, and throw herself into the water, when she immediately sunk. A loud outcry of "boat" was instantly raised, but, before that could arrive, two men and a boy swam off from the shore, but were unable to render any assistance. Mr. Williams, the Superintendent of the Royal Humane Society's receiving house, however, hearing the cries, proceeded to the spot in one of the society's boats, and although the body was not visible at the second throw of the drag, succeeded in bringing it to the surface and lifting it into the boat. The spectators (amongst whom was Mr. Eaton, M.P. for Cambridgeshire), were highly gratified by the promptness, energy, and skill, evinced by the superintendent. The body had then been four minutes and a half in the water (the exact time having been noticed by Mr. Eaton), and when taken out showed no signs of animation. It was instantly conveyed to the receiving house, where Messrs. Woolley, the surgeons of the institution, were quickly in attendance, and we are happy to learn that in four hours the poor woman was sufficiently recovered to be sent to the workhouse of St. Margaret's, Westminster. She appeared to be about forty years of age, and stated her name to be Margaret Evans, that she had lived in the service of Admiral Sir H. Digby, who, having received an appointment at Sheerness, had broken up his town establishment; and being unable to obtain another situation, she had become distressed. A letter was found on her, signed by Lady Andover, speaking of her in high terms.

THE ATTEMPT ON HER MAJESTY'S LIFE.

"The Queen! the Queen!" Why bursts the cry,
As if in sudden fear,
Uttered by quick and quivering lips,
To tremble on the ear?
As tho' Old England's loyal heart
Were stirred within its deep,
By rushing terrors such as start
The dreamer out of sleep!

"The Queen! the Queen!" Distracted shouts
Wing high the honoured name,
But these are not the echoes loud
Of homage or of fame.
Alarm, and love, and wild dismay,
Up to all hearts have sprung,
And deep emotion's stifled voice
Comes broken from the tongue!

The Queen! Hope trembled on her doom,
While Fear held still the breath!
One sunless spirit in its gloom
Had visioned forth her death!
A mad assassin's soul had vowed,
By murder's fierce decree,
To work a deed as murky black
As storm-shrouds on the sea.

The devil-hand of crime was raised
To compass such a woe
As should make millions weep, and lay
Love's grieving spirit low!
Ere long our royal blood had steeped
Its crimson in the sod,
Where the young angel of her Throne
Had perished—but for God!

He raised murder's hand:—Heaven's will Still shielded virtue there;
And now the nation's heart is full
Of blessing and of prayer;
For though hot impulses of rage
The anger'd people curse,
Love drowns them in one cry of joy,
"Thank God, the Queen is safe!"

"Thank God, the Queen is safe!" What scope
This gratitude hath got!
It rings around the palace roof,
Finds echoes in the cot!
Breathes in the sunny air—outspeaks
In every fervent cheer,
And with its love-lit gladness fills
The peasant and the peer!

Up to her gallant court in joy
Her brilliant nobles throng;
Her faithful Commons swell the stream
That homage rolls along!
The golden city of the world
Sends forth its magnates proud;
And all the gory of the land
With loyalty rings loud!

Since she, whom all regard, is saved,
To sit at Britain's helm,
There seems not one ungladden'd heart
In all her lovely realm.
As sovereign, woman, mother, wife,
Still wearing virtue's mien,
Love crowns her life—and all men cry,
"God save, God bless the Queen!"

BANQUET AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

On Tuesday the Lord Mayor entertained the members of his ward, and several mercantile men, in a very splendid manner, at the Mansion-house.

His lordship, on proposing "The health of our Most Gracious Queen Victoria," expressed the great joy felt by the whole body of her faithful, loyal, and affectionate citizens of London, upon the occasion of her Majesty's providential escape from the hands of an assassin. He stated that, enthusiastically as the citizens of London felt and expressed themselves in estimating the virtues and dignified qualities of the Queen, but a slight notion could be entertained of the measure of their attachment by those who had not witnessed the assembling of the Courts of Aldermen and Common-Council on that morning, and the whole of the proceedings transacted in the Guildhall on the occasion of the official communication made by Sir James Graham, announcing the alarming intelligence. (Loud cheers.) It was with a degree of gratification wholly beyond his power to express, that he proposed "The Health of her Most Gracious Majesty, add long and happily may she reign over her truly affectionate people." (Immense cheering.) The toast was one to which the whole nation in all its ranks agreed, but in no part of her Majesty's dominions would the toast be drunk or the sympathy be more warmly and sincerely communicated than in the Mansion-house of the city of London. (Long-continued cheering.)

Deputy Angell (of the ward of Cornhill) proposed "The Health of the Lord Mayor." His lordship's mayoralty had been marked by some very peculiar transactions. It had commenced most auspiciously on the day of the birth of the Prince of Wales, and an additional celebrity had been given to it by the providential escape of her Majesty from the attack of an assassin. (Loud cheers.) He rejoiced that it had fallen to the lot of a man so distinguished by Christian charity and benevolence, to receive an eminent mark of the royal favour. Upon no man could the dignity sit with more unaffected grace, and to no man did his fellow citizens more sincerely wish long life and health to enjoy also the well-earned approbation of the public. (Cheers.)

The Lord Mayor thanked his friends for the tone and manner and language in which they had expressed themselves towards him. Some of them had been known to him upwards of thirty years, and he trusted that he should never in his future life give any of them reason to alter the opinion they had so kindly given utterance to. (Cheers.)

Deputy Stevens said he felt great satisfaction in being allowed to propose "The health of Lady Pirie, the Lady Mayoress." (Great cheering.) He perceived, from the acclamations with which the magnificent hall in which they were assembled resounded upon the mention of her ladyship's name, that all the company appreciated the toast. That name was associated with the most benign qualities. It was known and blessed wherever the hand of calamity was about its work—wherever the widow's agonies and the orphan's cries put in their claims for commiseration. (Immense cheering)

The entertainment, which was of the most costly description, concluded between eleven and twelve o'clock, and all departed gratified in the highest degree at the manner in which his lordship and Lady Pirie received them. Several times in the course of the evening allusion was made to the providential escape of her Majesty, and the whole company as often joined unanimously in the expression of their approbation.

The health of her Majesty's Ministers was drunk with great applause.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

CONSISTORY COURT.—Tuesday, May 31.

DILLON v. DILLON.

This is a suit for restitution of conjugal rights by Mrs. Dillon against Dr. Dillon, her husband. It will be recollected that a suit for divorce was instituted by the husband some time ago, and the sentence pronounced in favour of the wife. Since then Dr. Dillon has not returned to cohabitation, and the present suit has accordingly been brought. The wife's libel was now offered for admission.

Dr Dillon appeared in person, and said that he was completely lapsus tefacultatibus He had no means of supporting a wife who had grossly misbehaved herself. Dr. Dillon was proceeding to bring very serious accusations against his wife, and to enter into a detailed statement of his affairs, when he was interrupted by

The Court, who observed that if he had any accusation to bring against his wife as a bar to her suit, he must put it on paper, and give it in a formal manner.

Dr. Dillon said that he had nothing as a bar to his wife's suit to offer, and ultimately gave up the affirmative issue to her plea. He was accordingly directed to take back his wife to cohabitation, and to produce a certificate of his having done so on the next Court day but one.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—Tuesday, May 31.

(Sittings in Banco.)

BUSINESS OF THE COURT.

Lord Denman, at the sitting of the Court, said that the Court would devote the whole of the second week after term, beginning with the 20th of June, to the new trial paper, excepting a few selected cases from the special paper.

MITTELHOLZER v. FULLERTON

This was an action to recover two sums of £1300 each under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff was a person who held a large number of slaves in Jamaica; under the Slavery Abolition Act the slaves became apprenticed labourers, and he leased out their services for several years to the defendant, for the sum of £7 800, payable at the rate of £1300 a-year. When the Legislature of Jamaica passed the Act accelerating the freedom of the negroes, these apprentice-labourers left the service of the defendant. He complained that they did this at the instigation of the plaintiff, and he refused to pay any further instalments. The pleadings did not, however, directly raise that point as an answer to the defendant's liability, but the plea set forth the fact that the defendant had paid the instalments up to the time when the negroes, whose services were thus leased out, quitted the service of the plaintiff; and this plea was demurred to, as it assumed that the regular continuance of the negroes in the service of the defendant was a condition precedent to his liability to pay, and to the plaintiff's right to recover.

The question on the sufficiency of the pleadings was argued by Mr. Kelly for the plaintiff, and by Mr. Greenwood for the defendant.

The Court took time to consider the question.

THURSDAY.

THE QUEEN v. LONG.—BRIBERY AT CAMBRIDGE.

The defendant in this case, Samuel Long, had been convicted at the last Cambridge Assizes, of giving a bribe of £10 to a voter of that borough, to induce him to vote for Mr. Manners Sutton at the election for a member to serve in Parliament for that borough in the year 1838, when Mr Manners Sutton and Mr. Milner Gibson were the candidates.

The defendant was brought up for judgment this morning.

The defendant's affidavit in mitigation of punishment was put in and read, in which the defendant stated, for the first three years he had had a prosecution hanging over his head on account of this offence, which prosecution had been abandoned, and that subsequently a prosecution for the same offence had been instituted by the Attorney-General, so that he had been prosecuted twice for the same offence. The affidavit likewise stated that the defendant was suffering from illness, and that his health would be seriously injured by a long imprisonment.

Mr. B. Andrews having addressed the Court in mitigation, and the Attorney-General having been heard in aggravation of the prisoner's offence,

Mr. Justice Patteson proceeded to pass the judgment of the Court on the defendant, which was that he should be imprisoned in her Majesty's gaol of Cambridge for nine calendar months, and that in the meantime he should be committed to the custody of the marshal.

The defendant was then removed in custody.

BAIL COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice Wightman.)

Several motions of no public interest having been disposed of, the Court sat at Nisi Prius.

DEVEREUX v. BANFIELD.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd and Mr Martin conducted the case for the plaintiff, and Mr. J. Jervis appeared for the defendant.

This was an action to recover damages for the alleged breach of an agreement.

It appeared that the defendant had agreed to let certain furnished apartments to the plaintiff for the period of three months, at the weekly rent of 14s. It was also stipulated that if either party should become anxious for a termination of the agreement at an earlier day, it was competent in either of them to shorten the term by giving one month's notice of such desire. In pursuance of this description, it was contended on the part of the plaintiff, necessarily implied an undertaking that the plaintiff should have free access and ingress to and from the apartments at all reasonable hours. It was, however, alleged that, in defiance of that understanding and contract, the defendant had, upon a particular occasion, refused admission to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, with her servant, having taken possession of the apartments, the defendant handed to her a latch-key, accompanied with the remark that it was impossible for him to keep a servant to let her in and out. Subsequently to this, it seemed, a dispute took place between the parties on religion, whereupon the plaintiff gave notice of her intention to quit the premises in a month. On the evening of the 9th of March, however, she came home, and, as usual, knocked at the private door. Of that knocking no notice was taken. Whilst she was waiting, but, as it appeared, waiting in vain, for the door to be opened, she observed the defendant come to the shop door, when she requested that he would go round and let her in. That he declined, adding, that she might let herself in by the use of her latch-key. She rejoined that it was out of her power to do so, as she had lost the key. After waiting at the door until she was completely wet through, she eventually went away, and slept at the house of her brother. In the cross-examination it was proved that the plaintiff, after her return in three days from the act complained of, had found the latch-key, which she had supposed she had lost, in one of her drawers.

Mr. Jervis, for the defendant, contended that a person letting lodgings was not compelled to keep servants for the purpose of opening the door to the lodgers.

Mr. Justice Wightman having summed up,

The jury consulted for a quarter of an hour, and then returned a verdict for the defendant, thereby establishing Mr. Jervis's view of the law as respects landlords and lodgers.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.—Tuesday, May 31.

(Sittings in Banco.)

RUSSELL v. LOWE.

Mr. Pitt Taylor, applied for leave to enter an appearance for the defendant under especial circumstances. Several attempts were made to serve the defendant personally, but he could not be seen, and a copy of the writ was left at his dwelling-place. From a subsequent correspondence between the attorneys of the plaintiff and defendant, it clearly appeared that the writ had come to the defendant's knowledge.

Baron Alderson—The power to enter an appearance for the defendant is given by the statute, and the statute only allows it to be done when the defendant has been personally served.

Mr Pitt Taylor submitted, that, as the writ had come to the defendant's knowledge, it was equivalent to personal service He had a note of a case decided in the Bail Court, in which it was so held.

Baron Alderson They think nothing of Acts of Parliament in the Bail Court. (A laugh.) The statute only authorises an appearance to be entered after personal service. Can you make an affidavit of personal service?

Mr. Pitt Taylor admitted that this was not possible; but he thought there were cases in which the Court allowed an appearance to be entered without actual service.

Baron Alderson—We refused it in this Court in two cases last term, and I adhere to the opinion we then expressed, notwithstanding the authority of a case in the Bail Court. We cannot alter an Act of Parliament.

Rule refused.

COURT OF STANNARIES OF CORNWALL.—May 30.

(Before His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Lord Warden, Lord Langdale, Lord Brougham, Sir J. Wigram, and Baron Parke.)

THOMAS v. VICE AND BONNETTS. JUDGMENT.

On Monday, at three o'clock, his Royal Highness attended at the above Court, which was held in the Council Room at the Duchy of Cornwall office Somerset House, and proceeded to deliver judgment in the above cause, which had been deferred from the 24th ult. His Royal Highness, as on the former occasion, was attired in his splendid emerald green Genoa velvet robes, lined with crimson satin, trimmed with ermine, and a dress cloth of the same material His hat was of crimson velvet turned up with ermine His Royal Highness was accompanied by Lord Portman, Lord Eliot, the Hon. Col. Anson, and Sir H. Westley. The Court was excessively crowded with well dressed persons, among whom were many elegantly attired females.

It will be recollected that this was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court in Cornwall On this occasion Mr. Sharpe and Mr. Rutt appeared for the appellants, and Mr. Barlow for the respondent (the plaintiff).

His Royal Highness read in a clear and distinct tone he judgment, which was to the effect:—That the plaintiff's original petition was in the nature of a bill to equity, in which the judges had given an opinion, in accordance with his (Prince Albert's) judgment. His Royal Highness having read the petition and demurrer argued in 1838, proceeded to say that the plaintiff had no ground for an application to a court of equity; for whether it regarded the restoration of possession, or of the ore unsaid, or an account of the ore disposed of were required, the remedy must be sought in a court of law. No distinction could be drawn because the claim was for the produce of mines. The Vice-Warden had decided that a court of equity had concurrent jurisdiction in such cases at law, which was contrary to the principles of equity; he had, however, relied upon precedents in his (the Vice-Warden's) court, but which were not so numerous as to decide the question. "And," added his Royal Highness, "I think no such jurisdiction exists, and my opinion is—that the Vice-Warden's decree be reversed, and the demurrer in the court below allowed."

His Royal Highness then rose, and, bowing to the Court, retired.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT—SUMMER ASSIZES, 1842

The days appointed for holding the assizes for the Northern Circuit, before the Right Hon. Thomas Lord Denman, Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, and the Hon. POLICE.

WORSHIP-STREET.

A SAVAGE.

John Lovett, a wretched-looking old man, who occupies a cellar at Hoxton, was placed finally before Mr. Broughton, upon a charge of feloniously wounding a married woman named Mary Harris, who had been so seriously injured that the magistrate could not take her evidence at the first examination.

The facts appeared to be, that the prisoner, an irritable old man, was the object for annoyance to the children of the neighbourhood, who sometimes threw things at him in his cellar as they passed, and on Sunday se'nnight he ran out after some of them with a knife in his hand and a piece of wood which he threw at them. Mrs. Harris, who was in a beer-shop, being informed of it, ran out, and seizing him by the collar, exclaimed, "You old villain, what do you mean by ill-using my child?" to which he replied that he would let her see what he meant, and in the struggle between them he struck her in the face with the knife, inflicting a wound four inches in length, from the corner of the eye across the cheek, and she fell covered with blood. When taken into custody by Mansfield, a police-constable, who told him that it was for stabbing Mrs. Harris, who was severely injured, he said it served her right, for her children were always annoying him.

Several witnesses gave evidence of the facts, and one of them saw the blow struck with the knife.

The prisoner, who, when first examined, said the wound was accidentally occasioned in the scuffle, alleged that he was altogether innocent of it, but...dded that the children annoyed him a good deal, or this would not have happened.

Mr. Broughton committed him to Newgate for trial.

THAMES-OFFICE.

A man named Brown was charged on Wednesday with having first attempted to hang himself, and next to drown himself, off the Ship Tavern, Execution-dock.

From the evidence, it appeared that the prisoner had gone into Mr. Johnson's tea-shop, and having sufficient money to pay for what he had drunk, he attempted to get away, and in doing so, ran into the water, and would have been drowned had it not been for the interference of the police.

The prisoner, on being called on for his defence, stated in a very incoherent manner, that he had seventeen wounds upon his head, that he had five children and a wife to support, and that when under the influence of liquor he knew not what he was about.

In answer to further questions, the prisoner stated to Mr. Broderip, that as he had not at the time a single penny in his pocket, he had gone into the river with the intention of swimming across.

The worthy magistrate remarked, that however ingenious the defence might be, he (the prisoner) had evidently brought all the trouble upon himself—a sort of insanity super-induced by his own reckless conduct.

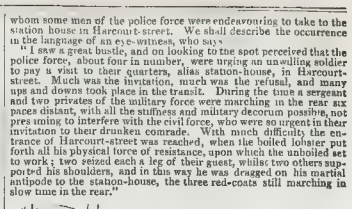
The prisoner was fined 5s., or in default of payment, to five days' imprisonment.

The mate, and also the captain of the Charles Brook, from St. Vincent's, were charged by a sailor, named Watson, with having cruelly beaten and ill-treated him. Mr. Pelham appeared on behalf of the complainant. After a long examination had been entered into, both cases were nominally dismissed by the payment of a fine of 1s. each and the costs.

THE NEW UNITED SERVICE.

On Sunday afternoon about four o'clock the aristocratic vicinity of York-street, Portman-square, was worried into a state of unbecoming excitement through the disgraceful conduct of a drunken soldier, whom some men of the police force were endeavouring to take to the station house in Harcourt-street. We shall describe the occurrence in the language of an eye-witness, who says

"I saw a great bustle, and on looking to the spot perceived that the police force, about four in number, were urging an unwilling soldier to pay a visit to their quarters, alias station-house, in Harcourt-street. Much was the invitation, much was the refusal, and many ups and downs took place in the transit. During the time a sergeant and two privates of the military force were marching in the rear six paces distant, with all the stiffness and military decorum possible, not presuming to interfere with the civil force, who were so urgent in their invitation to their drunken comrade. With much difficulty the entrance of Harcourt-street was reached, when the boiled lobster put forth all his physical force of resistance, upon which the unboiled set to work; two seized each a leg of their guest, whilst two others supported his shoulders, and in this way he was dragged on his martial antipode to the station-house, the three red-coats still marching in slow time in the rear."



LOBSTER CATCHING.

CLERKENWELL.

On Saturday, Francis Day, clerk to Mr. Tyrrell, a barrister, of Stone-buildings, Lincoln's-inn, was charged by an attorney with ringing his bell and otherwise annoying him. The complainant stated, that the defendant came to his house and rang his bell, which was answered by his servant, who, according to his directions, told the defendant that he was not at home The defendant insisted upon seeing him, and witness eventually sent for a policeman, and gave him in charge. The defendant in answer to this, said he was sent by his master to demand payment of nine guineas, which had been owing for fees to his master for upwards of six years.

Mr. Combe (to complainant)—Do you owe this money?

Complainant—Not legally.

Mr. Combe—Ah, not legally; I know what you mean; you know that a barrister is in the same predicament as a physician—that is, that he cannot sue for his fees.

Do you deny ever having employed Mr. Tyrrell?

Complainant (hesitating)—I did not employ him, but he did some business in an affair in which I was engaged.

Mr. Combe—And didn't you have the papers?

Complainant (looking very foolish) -Yes.

Mr. Combe—I thought so. Now to my knowledge there are a set of scamps who have not the ability to transact any business that may come into their hands, and when that is the case, they employ some barrister to do it, and afterwards shield themselves from payment on the ground that, according to your own words, he cannot legally enforce payment. Now, if I were the clerk of Mr. Tyrrell, I think I should dun you a little more.

Defendant—Whenever I go to his house, he is denied. I should not have rung the bell a second time, if he had not been denied. I knew he was at home, having seen his face at the window when I first went to the house.

A policeman, in answer to the magistrate, said no disturbance was created by defendant.

Mr Combe, I am a barrister, and will give an opinion and advice gratis. In the first place you had no more right to give the accused in charge than you have to order an officer this moment to lock me up, and if Day can ascertain that you wrongfully pounder and shot, I recommend him to bring an action against you. You may now go.

The complainant, without saying a word, left the court.

DUBLIN POLICE.

Thursday, two young men, named M'Garry and Healy, came before their worships to have their adjudication upon a question which they could not compose their disagreement about (the complainant) being sworn, stated that he was a shoemaker (as was also the defendant Healy); he (M'Garry) met the defendant upon Saturday evening at the corner of Nicholas-street, when, without any provocation whatever, he "up with his fist" and struck complainant in the mouth. (Laughter).

The defendant having been called upon for his defence, said: Your worship, it's all jealousy: there is a little girl in—— (Laughter).

Mr. Porter: Oh! I see there is a lady in the case.

A female, who stood behind the defendant, here rushed forward and shouted out, "Indeed there is, Sir." (Laughter).

Mr. Porter: Are you the "happy four one?"

Female: Not at all, your worship: I am the mother of Johnny Healy, and he is as decent a "gossoon" as any in the Liberty, but if your worships would like to see herself she's just at the door—come in here, Bess, darling. (Laughter). Miss Bess Vaughan rushed into the board-room, crying out, "Here I am—here I am," amid loud laughter.

Magistrate: Pray are you the lady in dispute between these boys?

Miss Vaughan (looking very modest)· I am indeed, Sir. (Laughter).

Sir Nicholas Fitzsimon: And which do you prefer—Jammy M'Garry or Johnny Healy?

Miss Vaughan: Johnny Healy for my money. (Laughter). He's the darling of my heart, and lives in Mitre-alley. (Laughter). As for that fellow there (pointing to M'Garry), he is not fit to wipe the gutter off Mr. Healy's pumps. (Great laughter). I know the difference, and can judge between them. One is the most "loveliest" creature that ever broke bread; while the other is the biggest blackguard in all the Liberty. (Great laughter).

Mr. Porter (to complainant): Did you ever make love to Miss Vaughan? Remember, you are sworn, Sir.

Complainant: I did, your worship, about three years ago, and right well she liked me. (Loud laughter).

Miss Vaughan: You lie, you blackguard; I never loved you half so well as I do my own Johnny Healy (turning to Johnny and smiling most graciously). Mr. Healy here jumped out of the dock, and nearly smothered his darling Bessy with caresses, crying out all the time, "I'll work for you; I'll live for you; and die for you; I'll rob for you; and, d—n me, if I won't cut any man's throat that dares to say black is the white of your eye, my darling." (Loud laughter).

"MY OWN JOHNNY HEALY."

Mr. Porter: Well, we dismiss the case; and ... Garry, must content yourself without Miss Vaughan, ... not like you.

Mr. Healy's mother here came forward, and conjured Miss Bessy Vaughan to tell the whole truth. She (Mrs. Healy) then said, that about three years ago Miss Vaughan became the "maternal parent" of a "little responsibility," of which M'Garry was said to be the father. (Laughter).

Miss Vaughan (looking very modest) admitted the fact, but said the "dear little charge" was dead; she also stated that the complainant deserted her, and it was then her "darling Healy" took care of her, and was to make her an "honest woman" next Monday.

Magistrate: Very well, I wish you joy. Go off now, and get the clergyman's blessing; but you must conduct yourselves properly for the future. Miss Bessy thanked their worships, and left the board-room in the arms of her darling Johnny, amid roars of laughter.

CHRISTMAS.

(From the ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE.)

Hearty and heartfelt is the welcome of Christmas in thousands of homes; with gladness is its coming greeted at countless hearths. There is light and music, and the song, the dance, and the merry game. The old are cheerful, and the young are gay. There is a smile on the furrowed cheek that tells of many sorrows long outlived, and there is the ringing laugh that rises only from the heart to which sorrow is yet unknown. Other scenes there are in which the feast deepens into revel and carouse, the wine-cup circling the board, and flashing with a brighter gleam at each revolution, and the hours that see the old year expire, are the gayest of all it has numbered during its course. Yes! Christmas is a merry time!

* * * * *

But it was not always thus. Grave and solemn with the consciousness of their mighty task, were the spirits of those who celebrated the earliest festival of CHRISTMAS. Around them was a world from amid which they had been called as the instruments of a divine mission; only within their own hearts the deep conviction that he was with them always, which could alone support them in their warfare. The Jew listened to them in hatred not unmingled with fear; the Roman heard with a wonder, blended with contempt, and, believing only in the material power that springs from numbers and wealth, he saw them to be poor and despised thrus; few, and laughed them to scorn. But, hated or despised, the successors of the Apostles toiled on; there was much difficulty, but much to encourage also, and they met on that day which saw the birth of their Divine Master, with far other thoughts than those of festivity. An obscure chamber, filled with the mean and poorly clad, the simple prayer and the exhortation to increased energy in the work. Amid such a scene it may be believed the first founders of our faith passed the earliest CHRISTMAS.

* * * *

Ages have passed away, and the believers in the word preached by the fishermen of Galilee have become too numerous to be despised, too strong to be scorned: they are feared by Prefect and Emperor, and the spirit of PERSECUTION is awakened: the capital of the old world, and the world itself, is ruled by a Diocletian. All the power of the State is directed against them: they are imprisoned, tortured, beheaded. They supply the place of the criminals who were thrown to the wild beasts in the circus. A few grains of incense thrown on a Pagan altar, the slightest acknowledgment of the Pagan creed, would save the life—but all evasion is scorned, and thousands on thousands crowd all the field by the death of martyrdom. No time is this for joy or festival. Though they now number among them men of birth and wealth, there is a cloud gathering over the Church. The persecution has been unsparing, dread, almost exterminating. What could have been the festival of CHRISTMAS at such a time? The gathering thinned in numbers, many a seat vacant, a sadness, though of grief rather than of despondency, visible in all. The meeting collected in secret separates by stealth and in darkness. Their hour is not yet come.

* * * *

Centuries have rolled away, with all their changes—many and mighty ones. The temporal power of Rome has long since fallen to decay. Its empire is now divided into states and kingdoms; but in the seat of that once universal sway sits the possessor of a spiritual dominion as wide, stronger, and more complete. The Rome of Paganism has become the Rome of Christianity; and the churches of that faith rise proudly where the first worshippers were driven to caves and cellars. Nay, the temples of the Heathen persecutor are consecrated by a purer ritual, which has adapted to its purpose things which artists who wrought in the spirit of the old mythology fashioned with a keen perception of the beautiful. Thus the Temple of Jupiter is a Christian Church; an altar of Isis receives the oblations of the charitable; the Bacchanalian vase has become a baptismal font; a tripod supports the vessel of holy water; tablets inscribed to the Dii Manibus are set in pavements hallowed by the knees of the devout; the brass columns of Jupiter Capitolinus are consecrated to the altar of the blessed Sacrament. All is changed. Where the faith was most persecuted, there most it rules; the throne of the Cæsars is the chair of St. Peter, and from thence the Church sways the world, dictating to the kings of the earth—deposing one and setting up another; taking from this a realm, and bestowing it on that. The fabric of the kingdoms rises and shuts, and binds and loosens, and wields a power that cannot be defied by the boldest. The early heresies have died out, or been crushed; and those destined to rise in the Church it is not yet in the womb of time. As the temples of the faith are splendid with all that wealth can purchase, so its ceremonial is one of pomp and magnificence, with robe and vestment, mitre and crosier; with the swell of music and the wafting of incense. What is the celebration of CHRISTMAS now? A high festival observed by all classes, openly, with a joyful exultation. There is fast, and sport, and good cheer, in which the poor are not excluded being, by the charity of the rich, partakers therein. CHRISTMAS has become a holiday—a grateful period—a cheering and a cheerful time—and such is long to continue!

* * * *

Onward again into the depths of time! There is change once again; but not so vast as before. No destruction of ancient system, but a later development of an existing one. There is a different spirit abroad on the face of society, and it is not a better one. Magnificence is with the Church even greater than of yore—and splendour that is, if possible, more dazzling. Another influence over the heart of man has since decayed. Worldly men have penetrated her sanctuary; her high places have become the "prizes" for which the ambitious play the game of life unmoved, crafty, and desecrating. There is learning to profundity, and talent most active and sagacious, among those who adorn her; but faith is weak, or even dead. A Pope can congratulate himself on the vast riches gathered to the Church by the "Age of Christianity; and another, while giving to a whole people, kneeling prostrate before him, the pontifical blessing, can exclaim "Dio mio; quanto e facile de coglionare la gente." Appearances are preserved, but the essence is departing. Above the head, so with the members. Bishops are straitened in their temporal dues; and the mitred Abbot tithes and tolls, and takes care ful note that the tribute of fowl and fish be punctually rendered by the tenants. There are strange murmurs abroad, complaints, doubts concerning the right of the Church to do many things. There have been teachers of strange doctrines arrested and silenced by the death of fire, but it has not much availed. One Luther has arisen, and denounces—many are beginning to think with good reason—various practices which make merchandise of the faith. Kings and Princes are beginning to listen to him; the Church had better look to it, for it begins to be serious. But it thinks itself strong enough to defy all attack; and many redeeming qualities it has to make it valued. There is abundance of almsgiving at its gates, and the poor of many nations have reason to bless it. Still does the festival of Christmas awake the same feelings as of yore. The good and hearty customs of social life are, thanked be heaven! the last to change.

* * * * * * *

But even they suffer mutation! Pass onward yet once more, not for ages, but a few generations only. The storm broke sooner and more fiercely than the Church expected it, and one of the fairest kingdoms of the west is severed from it. There the broad lands of Abbey and Priory are given to nobles, who like the Church take all they can, but unlike it render nothing in return. They toll and tithe, but do not teach. The spirit of the people, too, is changed; a dark and gloomy fanaticism is settling down upon them, that breaks out in hatred of all priestly forms. And their hate is endowed with strength; they destroy that which they despise, even to its material symbols. Altar, cross, and window, every "carved image," whether of saint or warrior, niched or on the tomb, all perish beneath the axe and hammer of "iconoclast profanation." It is a gloomy time, severe, rigid, bitter against all the graces of life, as if cheerfulness of heart or visage was a crime. Festivals and holidays are no more, almost the memory of them has departed from the land, a cold, ungenial, mirth-destroying rare! Against CHRISTMAS are they especially envenomed; the very name, as savouring of Papistry, is expunged from the calendar; but, as the day must come, and rents are to be received (they are punctual on their dealings, in the receipt of dues particularly), it may be called for convenience. CHRISTMAS. No celebration must it have, it is shorn of all its cheer, and in gloom and darkness of soul, heaven, for all its good, is "thanked amiss," by those who have imbibed their theology from a fountain whose waters are bitter.

That has now passed; the gulf of two centuries is placed between us and the reign of fanaticism. But every age has its peculiar spirit, its dominant influence. The charities of life are not now overshadowed by the cloud of religious bigotry; we are tolerant of other faiths, oftentimes indifferent to our own; but the souls and hearts of far too many are absorbed by a worship as deadening and more sordid than that which blinded the Puritans to so much that was kindly and cheering. The pursuit of wealth engrosses and distracts; bigotry trampled down the flowers that strew the path of life, but the spirit of mammon does not suffer them to grow. In such an age the recurrence of a festival that brings with it associations of a better and higher nature than are linked with the daily life of the world, that is solemn in its memories, yet cheering in its influence, that unites friends and gathers together many a scattered circle, is surely to be hailed with thankfulness and joy. It has come down to us, through the lapse of many centuries, through every change, remembered by those who bear the name of Him to whom the star-led kings of the East paid adoration in the cradle. It was an old belief—too beautiful to be called a superstition—that no evil spirit had power on mankind at this season. May its spell be equally potent over the many evil things that haunt the heart, and may they yield, even if it be but for the briefest space, to the brighter hope, the kindlier thoughts, and the wider purity that CHRISTMAS wakens in the generation in which our lot is cast.

DINING WITH A BISHOP.—Monsieur Casimir Bonjour relates the following anecdote of Savary, Duke de Rovigo:—"One day, the petit maitre of a small commune in one of the provinces, who was the uncle of the Duchess de Rovigo, called on the duke, at that time one of the ministers of Napoleon, and said to him, trembling with fear, 'The living of my canton is become vacant; a sudden ambition has seized me; and I am come to Paris to ask for it.' 'A living!' said the duke. 'If you think the thing impossible,' replied the modest ecclesiastic, 'I abandon my request.'—'Uncle,' said the duke, 'I do not say that it is impossible, but it requires some reflection. What diocese do you belong to?' 'Meaux,' said the uncle. 'Good, come and dine with me this evening; I expect the bishop.' 'Dine with the bishop!' exclaimed the uncle; 'I, a poor parish priest! I fear I should not have courage.' 'It strikes me,' said the duke, 'that an uncle may venture to dine with his nephew. I shall expect you at five o'clock.' At the hour appointed, the timid ecclesiastic arrived in the drawing-room of the Minister, where he looked in vain for his superior. In a few moments the duke said, 'Monseigneur does not come, and we will sit down to table. Will you lead the way, uncle?' During the whole of the dinner the poor priest had his eyes on the door, could eat nothing, and said not a word. At last, at the dessert, he ventured to ask whether the duke had any hope that the bishop would come. 'Monseigneur is come,' replied the duke. 'Where is he?' 'In the room.' 'How, in the room?' 'Yes, it is yourself. The bishopric is become vacant, of which you were not aware, and I solicited the Emperor this morning to bestow it upon you—a request which was immediately granted.'"

(To-morrow morning, the first stone of a new chapel, situate in the Broadway, Westminster, was laid with the usual formalities, by his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch. There was a considerable number of the clergy and other gentlemen present. The chapel, when complete, will be capable of affording accommodation for 1500 persons, and will be built in the Old English style of architecture. Owing to the fineness of the day there was a considerable number of persons congregated to witness the ceremony, after which a liberal collection was made.

The Marquis of Clanricarde has taken a very proper course in bringing under the notice of Parliament the practice which prevails in the present day of making a public exhibition of criminals. It is a disgraceful fact that tickets, orders, tickets, for this precious amusement, are issued on those solemn occasions, when a culprit should have his attention wholly withdrawn from external objects; and what is called the "condemned sermon," has been, in a recent instance, turned into a spectacle for the gratification of the morbid curiosity of persons who were so far favoured as to obtain the privilege of hearing it. The cruelty of torturing the feelings of a guilty wretch would certainly be a sufficient reason for abandoning the practice which now prevails; but his mental suffering here is nothing compared with the eternal misery of which he runs the risk, by having his mind forced to the last in the direction of earthly matters, instead of being allowed to turn his undivided thoughts towards a reconciliation with his offended Maker. In the case of Good, we have a painful illustration of the consequences that ensue from making a convicted murderer a spectacle up to the latest moment of his life; for the anxiety of the culprit, in this instance, within a few hours of his execution, was, what sort of appearance he should make in the eyes of the crowd who were to be admitted on the occasion of divine service being publicly performed for the last time in the prison. This fact speaks volumes as to the terrible consequences that may ensue to criminals themselves from a continuation of the practice we have been alluding to; for the welfare of the soul may be sacrificed, in addition to the life which the law has doomed to forfeiture. The purpose of the legislature, in extending the period between condemnation and punishment, was to give time for religious preparation; but the interval appears to be filled up with a series of exhibitions, more or less public, of which the unhappy wretch that is about to be prematurely cut off, is made the hero. It is to be hoped, for the sake of decency and morality, as well as for the eternal welfare of criminals themselves, that measures will be taken to prevent a repetition of such exhibitions as those that Lord Clanricarde has drawn attention to.—Globe.

ABROAD AND AT HOME.

By CALDER CAMPBELL.

When I think upon the Palm trees
In that Eastern land of sun,
Where, in idleness of heart and mind,
I did not care to shun
Youth's wildest walks of folly,—
I sigh as if I yet
Could mend the past by wishing
That the past I could forget.

And a frequent pang comes o'er me,
When I sift my inward thoughts,
To find that all my labours, now,
Are but as dazzling motes
Seen 'twixt us and the sunshine—
Scarce giving depth or tone
To the clear and vacant atmosphere,
Where they spring up and are gone!

Oh! I feel that youth's free idleness,
Without a thought of sin
To steal—like vapours dank and dark—
The careless heart within,
Was holier than the toils by which.
In after years, we think
It is a wise and clever thing
To live—and eat—and drink!

When I dwelt amid the palm trees,
And sipped their morning wine,
I did not tell a rosary,
Nor kneel at monkish shrine;
But neither did I look upon,
With thankless heart and cold,
The living emeralds of the woods,
And skies besprent with gold.

I had a feeling in my breast
That everything was good,
From casual sorrow's stroke my hopes
Rose ever unsubdued:
I leant against the palm trees,
And watched the parrots there,
And knew that birds and boughs were both
Beneath a Father's care!

But now I hurry through vast streets,
And pace the peopled town,
Where human life seems one vast scheme
Of traffic up and down;
No palm trees loud with parroquets,
No golden sunshine there;
But Barter—Bargain—Avarice,
Dishonesty, Despair!

'Tis labour all!—the labourers
Toil on for bread and gain;
Enough for self, but not to spare
For other's want or pain;
The rich look on the poor with dread—
The poor, in turn, on them
With doubt and covetous despite
They do not try to stem.

And do I miss the palm trees,
When I had nought to do
But look up to an azure sky,
And think all good and true?
'Twas youth which lent the colouring
Of peace and joy; for though
I saw them not, be sure that there,
As here, were want and woe!

We have our tasks before us,
Wherever we may go;
And if we loiter over them
Time soon will let us know:
'Tis weal to labour though the task
And with an honest mind—
But woe to him that heaps up wealth
Not for his human-kind!

The Black Eagle has been ordered to Ostend, to take on board the King and Queen of the Belgians, and convey them to this country, on their annual visit to her Majesty.

A male and female nylgau, lately presented to her Majesty by the Earl of Derby, have arrived at Cranbourne Lodge, in the Great Park. They have been exhibited for a few days in the royal paddock; but from the extreme tameness they have since manifested, it has been determined that in the course of the ensuing week they shall have full liberty given to them to roam at pleasure in the royal domains at Windsor.

KENDAL.—On Thursday se'nnight, one of the most melancholy accidents that ever took place in this part of the country happened on Milnthorpe Sands. Mrs. Crewdson (the lady of G. B. Crewdson, Esq., banker, Kendal), with her children and servants, were staying at Mr. Saul's, Ivy Cottage, to enjoy the sea-breeze during the summer months. On the day in question, the lady, along with her children and servants, wandered about a mile down the sands to allow the two children (the eldest daughters) to bathe, along with one of the servants. By some unforeseen occurrence the oldest child and one of the servants fell over some rocks into a place with 12 feet depth of water. Mrs. Crewdson, seeing their perilous situation, told the nurse to go to their assistance, and she followed over the same rock. Last of all, Mrs. Crewdson herself followed, the second child rushing into the sea. We are sorry to say that the two children, along with their nurse, met a watery grave. A small boat just came up in time to save the lady and the other servant from sharing the same fate.—Kendal Gazette.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—An inquest was held on Saturday night before Mr. Wakley, M.P., coroner, and a respectable jury, at the Pembroke Arms Tavern, Pembroke-square, Kensington, on view of the body of George Chalk, a boy only seven years of age, who hung himself on the Wednesday previous, under the following circumstances:—It appeared from the evidence adduced that the father of the deceased, who is a carter in the employ of Messrs. Bird, builders, of Kensington, lived in Earl-street. On the afternoon of Wednesday, the deceased, who was a boy of a morose and sullen temper, and who had been suspended from the national school in consequence of his mischievous and obstinate disposition, was sent, accompanied by his sister, on an errand for his mother, and on the way, his sister remonstrating at his staying to play, he beat her violently. When he returned home his mother punished him for his improper conduct, by ordering him to pull off his shoes and go into the bed-room, which he did. He was, however, soon called out by his mother, to assist her in some little matters, at which time he appeared in his usual good spirits. When tea was ready his mother went to the bed-room door to call the deceased, but receiving no answer, she opened the door and went in, when she was horror-struck at finding her unfortunate son suspended from the bedstead by a cord scarcely thicker than strong packthread; and although his knees were on the bed, life was found to be quite extinct. In the course of the inquiry it appeared that the above was the third suicide in the parish of Kensington within six days, that it was the fourth inquest held on persons residing at the same house, three of which had occurred since Christmas, and that in consequence, the residents of the house had determined on leaving it. Mr. Wakley, on viewing the body of the deceased, expressed his astonishment at the extraordinary formation of the head, and said he had, in two other cases only, seen such an enormous development of the organ of destructiveness. One was the case of a child not seven years of age, who, being corrected, said—"I'll go and make a hole in the water, and not enter the house again;" and her body was soon after picked out of the canal, near Wormwood Scrubbs; and the other of a pot-boy at the Eight Bells public-house, Chelsea, not thirteen years old, whose greatest delight was in torturing animals, and would purchase from other boys birds, rats, and mice, in order to gloat over their dying throes and kicks; and who finished his career by hanging himself. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

ANGLING.

We have often thought that angling alone offers to man the degree of half-business, half-idleness, whilh the fair sex find in their needlework or knitting, which, employing the hands, leaves the mind at liberty, and occupying the attention so far as is necessary to remove the painful sense of a vacuity, yet yields room for contemplatioh, whether upon things heavenly or earthly, cheerful or melancholy.—Quarterly Review.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

SIR,—As I am very fond of the amusement of angling, and have no doubt but that some of your readers may feel interested in a few occasional remarks on that delightful sport, I have ventured to write a short letter on the subject for your next number, and if you think it worthy a place in your widely-circulated paper, I shall be very happy to forward you, from time to time, a sketch of the manner of angling for the various kinds of fish, also drawings illustrative of the fish, tackle, &c., which will perhaps give your readers a more accurate description than a mere verbal account can convey.

I do not deny that there have been many sarcasms thrown out by a great variety of authors (Byron, Johnson, &c., included) against the practice of angling. Yet there are a number of circumstances (independent of the natural predilection which many evince for the sport) to render it a most delightful, and I may say instructive amusement; for who can be out with his rod, on the banks of a beautiful river, with the flowers in all their varied hues around him without admiring the beauties of nature, and feeling thankful to the hand which dispenses these and other blessings upon us. It has been called the contemplative man's recreation, and without a doub it is so.

The first step that is to be taken by the angler is to procure the proper apparatus, consisting of rods, lines, reels on winches, hooks, floats, plummets, landing-net, split shot, baiting needles (for pike fishing), clearing ring, boxes for baits, bags for worms, a small piece of wax, a small piece of whetstone for sharpening blunt hooks, a pocket-book for fishing tackle, and not forgetting a skein or two of silk of various thickness, to be ready in case of an accidental breakage of the rod when fishing. These remarks apply to ground-bait fishing more especially.

It has been noticed by some writers that the Londoners are more skilful in every department of fishing than the provincials, with the exception of fly-fishing, and that here they fail through want of practice, there being few trout in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, whilst in the north almost every brook swarms with these fish. For my own part, I have not had an opportunity of proving the truth of these assertions; but I feel convinced we have some few fishermen in the midland counties who would not be disgraced in a trial of skill with the celebrated ground-fishers of the metropolis, and I flatter myself we have also a few really good fly fishers.

In noticing the various fish, I shall include remarks upon fly as well as ground-bait fishing, and purpose, in due time, to give an account of the proper baits and flies for every month, also the haunts of the fish.

With this introduction I shall this week conclude, intending in my next paper to give a more particular description of the necessary tackle, and shall then proceed with angling for trout.

May 30, 1842. A DISCIPLE OF IZAAK WALTON.

A BOA-CONSTRICTOR.

A few days since a boy in the service of Mr. Robert Grange, of Wilgrove, in Kent, who was employed in tending sheep on the waste lands bordering on the rather extensive tract of wood-lands, known as the "Fells," came running in a state of breathless haste and alarm to the residence of his master, and gave the following extraordinary account:—He was lying on the ground, he said, watching the sheep near to the hedge which separates the wood from the waste, when his attention was attracted by hearing a crackling noise in the hedge, and immediately afterwards a large snake darted out, and made a spring at one of the lambs. The lamb, however, according to the boy's statement, gave a jump and run away, and the snake then coiled itself up, and lay at the foot of the hedge. The lad described the reptile as being as long as a hop-pole, usually from 10 to 15 feet, and he further stated that he threw a stick at the snake, upon which it retreated to the wood, and twined itself round the stem of a sapling on the borders of the copse. On hearing the boy's statements, Mr. Robert Grange, jun., although rather sceptical of the accuracy of the statement, accompanied him to the spot, and to his great surprise he beheld twined round the tree at the place pointed out by the lad, a large brown-looking snake. Mr. Grange threw a hedge-stake at the reptile, which evidently struck the snake, for it instantly uncoiled itself and made for the recesses of the wood. Mr. Grange then sent the boy to the house for a gun, and on the lad's return, accompanied by two of the workmen, the party entered the wood, when the snake was again discovered endeavouring to make its way through the underwood, upon which Mr. Grange fired, when the reptile twined itself round the trunk of a tree, writhing as though in agony. A discharge from the second barrel of the gun, directed at the creature's head, brought it down to the ground, where it commenced a series of violent struggles, writhing and twisting itself into a variety of positions, and crushing the decayed underwood, and even green branches of a considerable thickness, with fearful violence. At length the struggles of the reptile being somewhat abated, the party ventured to approach the spot, when they discovered the snake lying with its jaws distended and quite dead. It was immediately drawn from the close cover to an open place, and on being exposed fully to view, its size excited the astonishment of the captors, the creature measuring six feet four inches in length, and being nearly a foot in circumference at the thickest part. The snake has since been pronounced by a gentleman who has had frequent opportunities of examining the species, to be a young boa-constrictor, but by what chance the reptile became a denizen of the "Fells," remains a mystery. The most probable conjecture is, that the creature made its escape from some travelling exhibition. No visible remains of food were found in the snake's viscera on being examined after the skin had been stripped off, preparatory to the process of stuffing.

The following rather laughable incident connected wi h the appearance of the snake will show that the rambles of the reptile had not been altogether unobserved by another individual residing in the neighbourhood, somewhat notorious for his devotion to the "jolly god," who having been spending the best part of the night with some kindred devotees, happened to be wending his way homeward snortly after day-break on the Monday, when in passing along a lane skirting the "Fells," he was startled by observing a dark-looking object waving to and fro, open-mouthed, among the bushes of a hedge by the roadside. The sight of this singular object, it appears, partly brought the individual to his senses, for he rushed apparently in great alarm into his dwelling, exclaiming, much to the gratification of his cara sposa, Sally, "Oh! woman," "that he'd be dommid if he did nage up the cursed liker ab-getter, for that he had seen the devil in the shape of a fiery serpent, wiggling and waggling his head at him most awful"

THE FASHIONS.

Rue de la Caussée d'Antin, Paris June.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—The ladies are delighted with the bonnets which have just been introduced, yet I fear the most eloquent description will fail to inspire those feelings of enthusiastic admiration on the female heart, which the possession only of these seductive objects are capable of doing; but, however, I will endeavour to give you an ensemble of these charming novelties, and of one, in particular, which is worn for dress, and actually forms a portrait charmant—the chapeau de paille de riz; the interior trimming being of a double ruche, and on the exterior, long, pendant, white plumes, descending transversely forwards, drop lightly and gracefully over the shoulders. The style of bonnets most à la mode for the promenade are tisse formed in tulle. They are of various tints, pale yellows and blues are preferred; the voillette en tulle, of a pale rose colour, forms a lovely appendix, fastened on the side by a clasp of artifical flowers.

The pélerines cardinales become multiplied to such an extent that (on dit) the extravagantes possess eight or ten. The first ones which appeared were formed of one large single piece of lace, and in the magazin de modes they are now to be found of all dimensions; those in English lace are greatly admired, but the dentelles Louis Quatorze are really most splendid; these also in Brussels lace are much worn in-doors.

Such are, dear Mr. Editor, a few of the latest revolutions in our modes, not omitting to mention that the pretty scarfs, echarpes à la Montespan, cachmire de l'Inde, and crêpon de la Cnine, are now considered almost indispensable to the finish of the most élégantes toilettes.—Au plaisir, Monsieur, JULIE.

NEWSPAPER REPORTERS.—What most extraordinary men are these reporters of the English newspapers! Surely if there be any class of individuals who are entitled to the appellation of cosmopolites, it is these, who pursue their avocation in all countries indifferently, and accommodate themselves at will to the manners of all classes of society; their fluency of style as writers is only surpassed by their facility of language in conversation, and their attainments in classical and polite literature only by their profound knowledge of the world, acquired by an early introduction into its bustling scenes. The activity, energy, and courage, which they occasionally display in the pursuit of information are truly remarkable. I saw them, during the three days at Paris, mingled with a canaille and gamins behind the barriers, whilst the mitraille was flying in all directions, and the desperate cuirassiers were dashing their fierce horses against those seemingly feeble bulwarks. There stood they dotting down their observations in their pocket-books as unconcernedly as if reporting the proceedings of a reform meeting in Finsbury-square; whilst in Spain, several of them accompanied the Carlist and Christino guerillas in some of their most desperate raids, exposing themselves to the danger of hostile bullets, the inclemency of winter, and the fierce heat of the summer sun.—Borrow's Bible in Spain.

OLDHAM.—AWFUL ACCIDENT.—About noon on Wednesday last, as a young woman named Mary Taylor, the wife of Thomas Taylor, a cotton-spinner, of Hope-street, was at her work in the card-room of Shore-mill, Greenacres-moor, Oldham, and, whilst in a stooping posture, her clothes were caught by an upright shaft, which was moving at the rate of 90 revolutions per minute. The poor woman was instantly snatched by the fearful machine, and her head coming in contact with the iron, she was immediately killed. Her head was dreadfully injured, the brain being shattered to fragments; one of the arms was nearly cut off, and the body much mangled. The greater part of the shaft is cased, and it is not precisely known in what way she came caught by the lower part. The deceased was 27 years of age, but had no children.—Manchester Courier.

At the Mansion-house on Monday five passengers by the Lightning steamer, which runs to Putney from London-bridge, attended to complain of the misconduct of those in charge of the vessel on Sunday evening. They stated that from the overloading of the vessel, it began to fill with water, and was unable to come nearer than Chelsea, where about 400 persons were turned ashore, and put to the expense of getting to town by other conveyances. Every time the vessel lurched the water ran in at the cabin windows, and at last the engine ceased to work. The passage-money was collected a few minutes before the stoppage, and when the steward or captain must have known what was about to happen. The misconduct complained of was the keeping the fares and the overloading the vessel. Mr. Alderman Kelly granted a summons.

About two o'clock on Monday morning a fire broke out in the flax manufactory belonging to Mr. Butler, in Montague-street, Whitechapel. The fire originated in an upper floor, but it was subdued in the course of an hour, though not before property to a serious amount was destroyed.

THE AFFGHAN WAR.

THE events which have transpired in India, and the intelligence which has been everywhere recorded of them in the British press, must surely fill the public mind with some salutary reflection upon the condition of our army, the conduct of our generals, the prowess or disaster of our arms, the energy of our most vast and far-spread colonial government, and lastly, what is of chiefest importance in the eye of the moralist and philosopher, the justice of our quarrel, and the end and purpose of our war.

We would wish to place the whole question broadly before our readers; and, in so doing, we fear that it will be impossible to open its discussion without fixing upon our country in the first instance an ignominy which her greatness should have been too lofty to have stooped to, and her nobility too generous to have tried. As it is, she seems to have practised an ambition that had its only impulse in tyranny, and a cruelty that has found its retribution in a vengeance the most slaughtering and ghastly of any of the mad and barbarous revenges of national hate. In the first outset, the foot of England was only planted upon the Affghan soil as the foot of the aggressor, who had then no claim or right to work the arts of conquest there. She walked in with the arm and insolent strength of giantude to dethrone the favourite sovereign of the native people—to set up usurpation and to weaken right. In Dost Mahomed she crushed for the moment a monarch, who—even from the embraces of her own captivity—has sent his name among his tribe as the tocsin of blood-fraught war, and urged his wild and fanatic soldiers into battle by the murderous spirit and reckless energy of an avenging son. In Shah Soojah she enthroned a traitor to her policy, and suffered hypocrisy to wear the hood of friendship, while enmity and ingratitude were working with insidious but despoiling strength. Her great power—her vast resources—the contemplation of her grandeur and the dread of her victorious name, made the Affghans tolerate the injustice she had committed, so long as she veiled it under the guise of their good, and confirmed her diplomacy with the terrors of her sword; but the moment that cruelty stepped in to wake the passion of revenge—the moment that an indiscreet and thoughtless British officer sacrificed some people of a kindred tribe and outraged their brotherhood, their religion, and their pride—then did all these impulses spring up against us—then were the rage of the fanatic—the brooding vengeance of the swarthy Indian—the binding truth and fidelity over a bloody compact, which was begot of injury and cemented by rage—the hardy constitution and ferocious courage of the daring mountaineer—the wild spirit and cruel temper of barbarian ambition—the intense clanship of tribes—the unsparing malignity of savages—all at once were aroused and in action; they were a confluence of passions rushing into one turbulent river, which came upon our injustice with all the force of a Niagaraen torrent, and with something also of its terrible sublimity and effect. But anon, the scene darkened, and these excited wretches, in the flush of bloodshed, lost all the glory that might have crowned a fair battle for independence, and made success the symbol and herald of treachery and massacre, so black—so hopeless—so utterly beyond the pale of all ordinary crime or the compass of any fair revenge—so wholesale and cold-blooded in its murder—so cool and insidious in its surprise—that all patience vanished, that very humanity became congealed and powerless to argue for its own gentleness—that the cry of freedom was hushed in its mid utterance, while philosophy threw away its mantle of wisdom, and donned the armour of vengeance and of war.

Akbar Khan assassinated the representative of our sovereign under the protection of his functions, and also at the very altar of confidence; and his infatuated and remorseless Ghilzees and Affghans, subsequently visited cold-blooded destruction upon the heads of thirteen thousand powerless, devoted, and, for the most part, unresisting troops. We could, indeed, when we say unresisting, have wished the struggle nobler on the one part; but, on the other, we cannot make its brutal enormity the less.

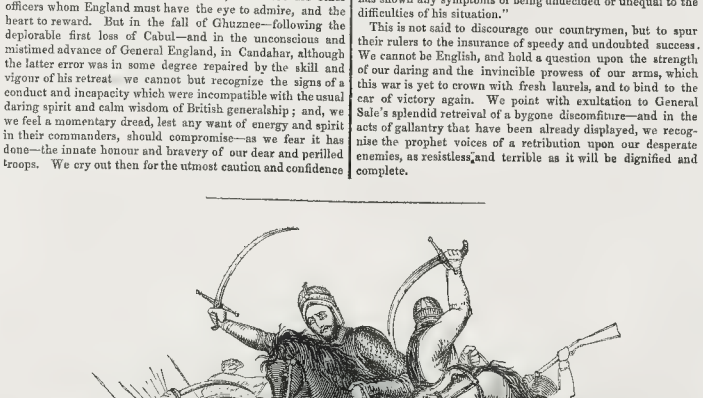
Now, then, although we repudiate in the outset the original impolicy and injustice of the measures which begot the war, we begin to regard it in the spirit which nationality and patriotism will not, and should not, resist. We feel that we are plunged into the current, and must vigorously swim the stream. The moral of the dreadful consequences which have already accrued, is pointed in the horrors that one act of injustice may bring down; but, while condemning that act, we can neither defend nor mitigate the horrors themselves works instigated by the meanest depravities of treachery, and followed out by the most remorseless bloodshedding of a cruel and inhuman revenge. These are atrocities which we can no longer contemplate or remember as philosophers—but as Englishmen roused to speed the retribution of most murderous wrong. The cause of the quarrel is lost in the hideous sight of the terrors with which our savage enemies have invested it, and the war has become more just now, on our side, than it seemed unfair and aggressive before.

There is no doubt that England will soon rear her crest with honour, and amid victory in every fort and upon every mountain of the wild regions into which she has sped her armies—that Affghanistan will be annihilated as a nation—its name dishonoured and inglorious—its tribes broken and dispersed. And though this result will be the work of blood and treasure, we must now long for its achieval, and look only through our conquests for the symbols of peace.

At present, however, the operation is slow, although, as in the instance of the skilful and gallant Sale, the success is most imposing. Generals Nott and Pollock, too, must partake of the renown of their noble fellow-soldier, and there are other officers whom England must have the eye to admire, and the heart to reward. But in the fall of Ghuznee—following the deplorable first loss of Cabul—and in the unconscious and mistimed advance of General England, in Candahar, although the latter error was in some degree repaired by the skill and vigour of his retreat we cannot but recognize the signs of a conduct and incapacity which were incompatible with the usual daring spirit and calm wisdom of British generalship; and, we we feel a momentary dread, lest any want of energy and spirit in their commanders, should compromise—as we fear it has done—the innate honour and bravery of our dear and perilled troops. We cry out then for the utmost caution and confidence in the selection of officers to conduct the war, and we point with exulting pride to the brilliant example of General Sale, to stimulate the discretion of our Government, and vindicate the trust of the nation and the honour of all her sons.

This is a point most vigorously urged by a morning contemporary, in alluding to the victory of Jellalabad:—"We are very far, indeed," says the Times, "from disparaging the gallantry of those brave officers who have shared in, and contributed to, General Sale's success. The names of Captain Oldfield and Lieutenant Mayne, of Captains Hancock, Abbott and others mentioned in the despatch of the 7th of April (would we could still say of the lamented Colonel Dennie), are already beginning to inspire into our minds the same confidence as that which is suggested by the name of their commander, that what they do will be well done. Yet still the difference of events at Cabul and Jellalabad does suggest the thought that all that difference is one man's doing: that it is but one man's presence—if that one man is the commander—which makes this appalling difference in the safety and prospects of our armies; that enables us at home to feel that whatever happens we need scarce disquiet ourselves about troops that are under the sole command of Sir R. Sale; while equal gallantry, more favourable circumstances, greater numbers, more ample provisions, a more formidable position, do not relieve us from anxiety on behalf of troops, whose commander has shown any symptoms of being undecided or unequal to the difficulties of his situation."

This is not said to discourage our countrymen, but to spur their rulers to the insurance of speedy and undoubted success. We cannot be English, and hold a question upon the strength of our daring and the invincible prowess of our arms, which this war is yet to crown with fresh laurels, and to bind to the ear of victory again. We point with exultation to General Sale's splendid retreival of a bygone discomfiture—and in the acts of gallantry that have been already displayed, we recognise the prophet voices of a retribution upon our desperate enemies, as resistless and terrible as it will be dignified and complete.



OUR TROOPS RECOVERING THEIR CANNON.

FORCING THE KHYBER PASS.

This defile, one of the most formidable and impenetrable in Asia, as a line of military defence, extends from Jumrood upwards in the direction of Jellalabad, without interval, for the space of twenty-eight miles, throughout twenty-two of which it has hitherto been reckoned impassable for an army, when the inhabitants had determined to oppose them. From Jumrood, where the pass opens on the Peshawar side, to Ali Musjid, the dell is deep and uninterrupted; and the celebrated fort, just named, which stands on an isolated hill, in the hill, in the narrow, near the middle of the defile, completely commands it. Here it is so sickly, that the troops we have endeavoured to keep in the fort, have from time to time been nearly all swept away. For about seven miles beyond Ali Musjid, the ascent is somewhat uniform till it arrives near Lundee Khana, where, for a couple of miles, it stretches out to the face of a frightful precipice, like the galleries by which the Simplon is traversed.

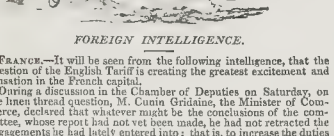
General Pollock had mustered a force of nearly 8000 men at Peshawur by the end of March, but was anxious, before moving, that the two brigades under Colonels White and Bolton, then on their way to join him with an additional force of about 4000 men, consisting of her Majesty's 3rd Dragoons, the 1st Light Cavalry, her Majesty's 31st Foot, the 63rd Native Infantry, with artillery and irregular horse, should arrive. This, however, was impossible, as Jellalabad required immediate succour. The 3rd Dragoons reached Peshawar on the 30th March; the 1st Cavalry, and 6th and 33rd Native Infantry were left behind; while Colonel Bolton's brigade, consisting of her Majesty's 31st and 6th Native Infantry, with the artillery and irregular horse, cannot arrive before the 20th of April. A pecuniary arrangement had been made, by which the Khyberees agreed to secure a quiet passage for us, on the payment of £5000—£2000 beforehand, and the balance after we had reached Ali Musjid. The lesser of the two sums was actually paid to them; but they either broke faith, or found themselves unable to control the other tribes, and are said to have returned it. Nadir Shah a century before had paid them 20,000 for the use of the pass; and the Kings of Cabul had allowed them £3000 a year for safe passage through the country: the continuance of this latter payment we had sanctioned two years since. On the 5th of April the army moved into the defile, which was obstructed at its entrance by heavy barricades of stone. The principal portions of our troops took possession of the heights covered by a tremendous fire of grape and shrapnell from ten pieces of artillery. So soon as the hills were occupied, and the defile cleared by the guns, the principal column, with the baggage, moved along the bed, and reached Ali Musjid the following evening, with very trifling loss. The enemy were supposed to have mustered more than 10,000 men; but, finding their position completely turned, they seemed to have lost all confidence, and fled. The remaining thirteen miles, leading on to Lundee Khana, at the head of the pass, was traversed almost without opposition by the evening of the 9th. On the 10th our rear-guard reached Dakka, eight miles further on. It is probable that by this time the Khybereen had heard of General Sale's victory on the 7th, and become completely disheartened.

The casualties incurred in the course of this most perilous advance are singularly insignificant in amount; and the dangers of the ascent are now viewed as almost entirely over. It is probable that Jellalabad will be attained by the 15th of April, the distance to be now travelled over being no more than forty-seven miles. Thus, by the admirable skill of the arrangements, and the patience, valour, and good conduct of the troops, has the Khyber Pass, hitherto believed to be impenetrable in the face of opposition, been forced. The effect of this will at once be felt throughout Central Asia. Candahar, Ghuznee, and Cabul, had, within the period of modern history, often yielded to the arms of victorious enemies: the Khyber Pass was never forced till now.



FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—It will be seen from the following intelligence, that the question of the English Tariff is creating the greatest excitement and sensation in the French capital.

During a discussion in the Chamber of Deputies on Saturday, on the linen thread question, M. Cunin Gridaine, the Minister of Commerce, declared that whatever might be the conclusions of the committee, whose report had not yet been made, he had not retracted the engagements he had lately entered into; that is, to increase the duties on English threads 20 per cent. "This dignified reply," remarks the Débats, "to the menaces of the English Ministry to resort to reprisals, by opposing tariff by tariff, made a strong impression on the Chamber."

The Constitutionnel affirms that France will keep the position she has taken up, that is, sign treaties refuse to ratify them—enter into engagements, and decline to execute them—and that she will compel the Ministry to maintain it. As to the diplomatic departures, if they should ever take place, the Constitutionnel assures us that they will not change the sentiments of France, and will not smooth the way for negotiations henceforth impossible. The Constitutionnel writes as if it were the organ of a reigning instead of an ex-Minister. The elections will decide how far France goes with the Constitutionnel, and M. Thiers is not Prime Minister. The ides of March are not yet revived. The Constitutionnel is rather facetious at the term nation de boutiquiers, applied to Paris. It thinks it quite grotesque, inasmuch as we have a Chancellor who sits on a woolsack.

The Chamber of Deputies concluded its sittings on Saturday, and when the Chamber of Peers shall have got through the business before it, the ordonnance of prorogation and dissolution will appear The sooner the elections are over the better, for whilst they are pending we shall be pestered by daily denunciations against England in the French press and from French notables, who thereby pay court to popular feeling. Even the French Commerce Minister thinks fit to declare most peremptorily that nothing, no, not even the contradictory report of the commission, shall induce him to suspend the ordonnance raising the duties on the importation of English goods. We need not say that the coup de grace of the commercial treaty was not the raising the duties on this almost only article of English export to France. But the French had never any idea of concluding a commercial treaty. And if they negotiated on the subject, they merely did so as they negotiated the extension of the right of search, with the intention of never ratifying or concluding. M. Cunin Gridaine is a manufacturer himself. When manufacturers are chosen to be Commerce Ministers, it is evident that the head of such a Cabinet means to re-enforce prohibition, and to discountenance trade

The Morning Herald of Wednesday contains, in contradiction to the spirit of the above intelligence, the following significant announcement:—"We are enabled, on the most undoubted authority, to contradict the rumours recently circulated relative to the alleged existence of a misunderstanding between this country and France. No friendly or unpleasant official intercourse or correspondence has been place between the Cabinets of the two countries.

It would seem, in spite of the above, that M. Thiers is trying to gain by his way into office upon the strength of the popular national feeling against England. The Chronicle, in treating this subject says:—"I. M. Thiers come in, and he, though infinitely more spirited a quarrelsome than M. Guizot, will keep peace better. He will inwardly and openly proclaim that no concessions are to be made, no hostilities interchanged, that the French army and navy are to be kept on a war-footing, and that the French Government is to be in all the antagonist of England." We do not believe that the journalist here faithfully represents M. Thiers's policy were he minister. M. Thiers now tries to get in with the war cry. Were he in office, he would try to keep in with the peace cry; and he would do just what M. Guizot is doing, and nothing else. The only difference would be, that whilst the present French Government gets the Chamber to vapour and bully, and look warlike for it, whilst itself wears a most meek aspect, M. Thiers would vapour and bully for himself. The result to us, we think would be pretty much the same. M. Thiers would not do more than the present Ministry has done in keeping up twenty sail of the line. He would not sign the treaty for the right of search, as they have not. M. Thiers may now speak and write as spiritedly as he pleases; he has public opinion to flatter. Were he Minister, he would have the majority to consult: and the majority even of the present Chamber, though wicked in words, has been very wary in acts.

The Courrier Français accuses M. Guizot bitterly as the Minister appointed by foreigners But what had foreigners to do with the great majority that supported M. Guizot, both on his accession to office and at the opening of the session just expired?"

The Paris papers of Tuesday contain no news of importance. It was stated on the Bourse that the Baron de Rothschild had declined to avail himself of the late ordinance, signed by the Minister of Finance, permitting the contractors of the last loan of 15,000,000f. to hold over the payment of the instalment still due, but had paid into the Treasury the amount of the monthly instalment due on the 12th instant, being 15,000,000f.

SPAIN.—The following telegraphic despatch was received in the early part of the week

BAYONNE, June 4.—General Rodil, on the receipt of an estafette from the Government, started immediately from Tolosa for Madrid. The Regent had called upon the Presidents of the two Chambers to form a cabinet. Nothing further had transpired respecting the ministerial crisis up to the 31st ult.

Last night, at half-past one o'clock, after a session of thirteen hours, the longest, and likely to be the most important I have witnessed in the Spanish Chambers, a direct and deliberate vote of censure was passed in the Congress upon the Gonzales cabinet, by a majority of seven. The censure was also the fullest I have seen since the appointment of the Regent, 163 members having been present and voted on the occasion. The fatal and long-threatened blow which opens anew so many sources of speculation upon the future fortunes of this country, has therefore been at length struck.

The news of a vote of censure being passed upon, and the chances of its leading to a total dissolution of the Gonzales cabinet, will doubtless, excite much interest, and lead to much speculation—gloomy, perhaps—in foreign countries. In France it will be hailed with delight as the harbinger of the overthrow of a ministry erroneously considered hostile to its policy; in England it will be heard with regret, as favouring the idea of the unfitness of Spain for representative government, and presaging future ills to the country. Some acquaintance with the national character, and experience of the working of things here, without at all underrating the importance of the present event, dissuade me from indulging in the anticipations I have just alluded to. I have seen worse, much worse, than the present aspect of affairs discloses—three-fourths of the whole nation in the bloody strife of civil war—the Treasury without enough of money to provide lights or wafers to seal dispatches—Don Carlos and his wild host of followers looking down from the hills around Madrid like so many hungering vultures upon their prey—all this, and much more I have seen, and yet from all I have seen, the peculiar elasticity and resuscitative forces of the national mind and resources of the country saved it at last. Fear for Spain, as it is felt abroad, and was once felt by me, has ceased to hover over my pen in recording trying events of this kind, for which hundreds of parallel examples will be found in the history of every country in its progress from despotism to freedom.

The worst, indeed, I anticipate is, that things will merely go on as they have done for some time back again, and that we have not men here capable of combining short, by the adoption of a new and better system, the throes of transition through which the nation is labouring. But I have not time or space to pursue these thoughts further, and have only to conclude by informing you that up to six o'clock this evening Ministers had not resigned: and that they were then preparing to go to consult with the Regent upon the course to be adopted. Though many think that the remnant of the Cabinet left might be retained, and that a dissolution might be had recourse to by them, I am far from sharing in this opinion. As a ministry, that of Gonzales is virtually dead. The best the Regent could now do would be to select the six best men he could, send them down to the Chambers with good measures, and, if not supported by both, immediately dissolve, taking care to have one, at least, among the new combination to manage the new elections, upon which all now depends PORTUGAL.—(Private Correspondence.) We have advices from our Lisbon correspondent to the 30th of May. The commercial and slave-trade treaties were both, at length, in such a state of forwardness, that there was no doubt whatever of their being signed within a week or ten days. A Council of Ministers had been held on the Saturday, at which all the questions relating to these negotiations were fully discussed. Some objections were made by the Ministers of Justice and Marine, but after explanation by Baron Tojal, the Government pronounced its opinion unanimously in favour of the treaties. The opposition of Silva Carvalho and Rodrigo Magalhaes had been overcome, and a deep-laid intrigue had become entirely abortive, of which our correspondent has forwarded to us very full particulars. In every human probability, both treaties would be signed during the course of the week, and forwarded to London by the next packet. The ratifications would be exchanged before the end of June. Baron Tojal had concluded the most satisfactory arrangements with regard to British claimants in Portugal, as to the dividends now falling due in London, which he had remitted sufficient funds to meet; next, as to the claims arising out of the services of British officers during the Peninsular war, the first instalment of which, amounting to 12 contos of reis, would be paid in Lisbon on the following day; and, thirdly, as to the claims decided on by the commission sitting in London with regard to services performed during the war of succession, the first instalment of which he directed the financial agent of Portugal to pay forthwith on each certificate that he might be served on between Baron de Moncorvo and Lord Aberdeen, whether £15,000 or £25,000, the entire sum amounting to £150,000.

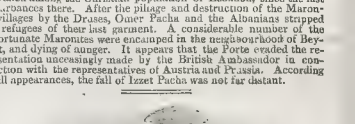
HAMBURGH, June 3.—(From our own Correspondent.)—There was an improvement in Change this day, and as money is becoming daily more abundant, bills on London were in good demand, and first-rate paper commanded high rates, although the Course was only quoted one-fourth sch. higher than last post. Those dealers in British manufactures whose property was destroyed during the late fire, appear now desirous of recovering their stock, and they were eager purchasers of bills. Sugar is in fair demand, but the heavy arrivals of coffee appear to frighten buyers, and to induce them to hold off. The total arrivals for this article for this year, up to the end of May, amount to thirty and a half-millions of lbs., and the present stock is estimated at twenty millions of lbs.

An advertisement appears in the Nachrichten this day, concerning the affairs of Baring Brothers company, from which it appears that 2200 claimants have already sent in their demands, to the aggregate amount of 9,629,854½ marks banco, and against which the utmost sum which can be hoped for are 3,312,231½ marks banco; but it is to be feared that the full amount of all liabilities will not be contributed, and that the ultimate dividend will be less than appears now on the face of the statement. The Galter Company have likewise published a report on their present position, from which it would appear that their total losses by the late fire will be 2,220,000 dollars (about £330,000); and that if all the liabilities of parties who are bound by their principle of mutual insurance to contribute in proportion to their means are forced to pay up, they will continue their business with a considerable guaranteed capital. It must, however, be admitted, that the statement is made up to show the best face, and that it does not obtain confidence to the full extent which it would deserve upon a mere periodical examination. The Burgomaster of Hamburg are to be called together in a few days, to deliberate upon propositions, which will be laid before them by the Senate, connected with the recent casualty. Various reports are in circulation as to the nature of the proposals, but it is perhaps better to abstain from further allusion to these reports, as a few days will bring the facts before us.

STATE OF SYRIA.—Intelligence has been received from Beyrout of the 17th instant, announcing the breaking out of an extensive rebellion at Latakia. According to the last accounts from Syria, brought to Constantinople by the mail from Beyrout, Omer Pacha still remained at Deir-el-Kammer, where he had received considerable reinforcement of Albanians. The number of those irregular troops may be estimated, without exaggeration, at about 8500 men. Other troops are ready to follow the same destination. Travellers just arrived from Beyrout give a frightful description of the misery which prevailed among the Christian population of Lebanon, since the last disturbances there. After the pillage and destruction of the Maronite villages by the Druses, Omer Pacha and the Albanians stripped the refugees of their last garment. A considerable number of the unfortunate Maronites were encamped in the neighbourhood of Beyrout, and dying of hunger. It appears that the Porte evaded the representation unceasingly made by the British Ambassador in conjunction with the representatives of Austria and Prussia. According to all appearances, the fall of Izzet Pacha was not far distant.



IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY

In the House of Lords, Lord DENMAN laid on the table, after presenting several petitions in its favour, an act to provide for a general form of affirmation for all persons objecting to oaths from religious scruples.

Several petitions having been presented, their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY

Several private bills were advanced in their respective stages. The Lough Foyle Drainage Bill passed a third reading.

Mr O'CONNELL presented a long petition respecting the last election for Belfast, from a person named Coppock The gist of the matter appeared to be, that the petitioner had been less skilful in relation to his pecuniary transactions at elections, and had turned them to a less profitable account than some of his more distinguished countrymen.

In reply to a question from Sir R. Inglis, Mr. GLADSTONE said that the directors of the Great Western Railway had promised to make arrangements for closing the carriages unlocked

Mr. ADDERLEY moved that a new writ be issued for Newcastle-under-Lyme. Mr. HUME moved, as an amendment, that the writ be suspended for a fortnight, and that a select committee of inquiry into the facts of bribery be appointed. After a protracted discussion the house divided—

For the motion	111
Against it	97
Majority for the issue of the writ	46

Lord J. RUSSELL moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better discovery of bribery at the election of Members of Parliament.—Sir R. PEEL concurred entirely in the object of the motion, and proceeded at considerable length and with great clearness and ability to explain the objects which ought to be kept in view, and the inconveniences and difficulties which were to be surmounted in legislating upon that subject. After a few words from Mr. HUME, Mr. ROEBUCK, and Lord SANDON, the motion was agreed to

[Upon this coquetting with election writs, and with the whole question of bribery and corruption, the Times pertinently remarks.—The decisions of the House of Commons on issuing writs to boroughs in which the sitting members have been displaced for bribery are somewhat remarkable, nor do we profess to understand the principles upon which those decisions are regulated. First, Sudbury is to be disfranchised for gross and extensive bribery—so far so good. Then Ipswich, convicted of the same crime by the same authority, on the same kind of evidence, is to elect its two members as if nothing had happened. Then the Nottingham writ is suspended sine die, because Mr. Roebuck has heard and believes something about a corrupt compromise, and the Southampton one for a fortnight, because after the close of the examination and the unsaying of the sitting members, a Mr. John Wren promises further disclosures; and now finally, the house falls back into its former indulgent habits, and allows Newcastle-under-Lyme to proceed to a fresh election, though proved guilty to no ordinary or limited extent of the same crime as Sudbury, Southampton, and Ipswich. Truly, we wish we could understand it all.]

The house then resolved itself into a committee on the Customs Duties Bill, Mr ROEBUCK moved an amendment reducing to timber and wood, that the duties on colonial and foreign timber be rendered equal.

Mr. P. M. STEWART brought forward the motion, of which he had given notice. It was to the effect that the duty on colonial timber be reduced to 3s. per load, and the duty on foreign timber to 35s., and that the measurement of deals for the purpose of charging duty be taken according to the recommendation of the committee of 1835. After much discussion the committee divided—

For Mr Roebuck's motion	16
Against it	243
Majority against the motion	227

Upon the motion of Mr. STEWART no division took place.

Sir H. DOUGLAS moved—"That the duties, on and after the 10th day of October next, should be 30s. on foreign timber, and 50s. on foreign deals, both per load, and that no alterate reduction, as contemplated, should take place in either"

The motion was opposed by Sir ROBERT PEEL, and was negatived without a division

The house then resumed, and almost immediately adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS, TUESDAY

The Australian and New Zealand Bill was read a third time and passed.

In answer to a question by Lord SUDELEY

The Duke of WELLINGTON said the money raised under the Queen's letter would be paid over to the Sustaining Distress Committee, which has existed in London since 1826 It was by order of that committee that the amount sent to Barnsley had been remitted.

On the motion of the Earl of RADNOR, and after some conversation, a return was ordered of all the sums which had been received for the relief of public distress, with or without a specific vote of the House of Commons, from the 1st of January, 1821, to the present time.

The Ionian Islands Bill went through committee and was reported.

On the motion of the Lor. CHANCELLOR the bringing up of the report on the Copyright Bill was postponed till Tuesday next; and their lordships then adjourned until Thursday

HOUSE OF COMMONS TUESDAY

The Earl of DARLINGTON and Mr. THOMAS GLADSTONE took the oaths and their seats as members for Ipswich.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:—The Melbourne Inclosure Bill, the Gravesend Town Pier Bill, the Church Stretton and Longdon Roads Bill, the Imperial Bank of England Bill, the North American Colonial Bank Bill, the Ireland Bill, the Ipswich Gas Company's Bill, the Beccwood Improvement and Market Bill, and the Ross and Cromarty Courthouse Bill

The Lords amendments to the following bills were agreed to, and the bills passed.—The Warwick and Leamington Union Railway Bill, the South Metropolitan Gas Bill, and the Tyne Fisheries Bill.

The following bills were read a second time, and ordered to be committed:—The Chester house Hospital Estate Bill, and the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Bill

Mr FERRAND said that under the resolution of the preceding day to have been informal, he had to withdraw his motion for the adjournment of the house on Wednesday, the 10th of June, he should move for a committee of the whole house for the purpose of considering a resolution to the effect that this House thought it expedient that some relief be provided for the destitution of the working classes, and that for such purpose the address should be voted [illegible] grant of one million, the said grant to be provided for by the [illegible]

Mr. BLACKSTONE gave notice of his intention to move an address to the Queen, praying her to propose an alteration in the franchise of the borough of St Ives

In answer to a question, Sir JAMES GRAHAM said, that not one farthing would be deducted, as official fees, from the amount raised under the Queen's letter

Lord ASHLEY, in the absence of Sir J. GRAHAM, who called forth the warm admiration of the house, as well for the benevolence of its spirit as for the ability [illegible] evinced, obtained leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of chaplaincies and salaries.

To an inquiry by Mr. M. ATTWOOD,

Mr GLADSTONE answered that it was not the present intention of the Government to introduce the Isle of Man bills for the operation of the [illegible]

The house then went into committee on the Customs Duties Bill.

On the question having been put, fixing the duty on boots and shoes imported,

Mr. G. PALMER moved, by way of amendment, that the duty be 30s.

After some discussion the amendment was negatived by 118 to 38

Mr. MANGLES then proposed, as a suggestion by Mr MELNER GIBSON, who was duly opposed by Lord STANLEY—that the duty on Indian cotton should be reduced from 5 to 3½ per cent

Previously to the division a squabble took place between Mr. FERRAND and Dr. BOWRING, in consequence of an assertion by the former that the Doctor when in Switzerland, had refused to receive the evidence of persons opposed to his own views. Dr. Bowring denied the charge, and after a good deal of talking, and the interchange of personalities between some hon. members, Lord Stanley suggested that this denial ought to be sufficient to prevent the continuance of the discussion.

Several successive motions for adjournment were then made and negatived, but at last one was agreed to without a division. Mr. Mangles's amendment, and the gentle passage between the members for Knaresborough and Bolton were thus got rid of, and the routine business having been gone through, the house separated at half past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House of Lords did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

In the House of Commons

Sir R. H. Inglis presented a petition, numerously signed, from the electors of Nottingham, complaining most justly of being deprived of that share in the national representation to which they are entitled by the constitution of Great Britain, in consequence of a freak which has happened to enter the mind of an individual Member of Parliament.

On the order of the day for the further consideration of the report on the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Bill,

Mr. Mackenzie moved that the report be taken into further consideration this day six months.

After some discussion, the house divided—

For the report	88
For the amendment	21
Majority for the report	67

The report was agreed to, and ordered to be received on Friday next

Captain Polhill moved the second reading of the Manslaughter Bill, and after he proceeded in his motion, notwithstanding the opposition of Sir J. Graham, that it should be withdrawn, it was negatived without a division.

The house then, after a move from Mr. Hume, on account of the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, went into committee on the Customs Acts Amendment Bill.

Mr. Mangles moved that the duty of 5 per cent on Indian cotton manufactures be reduced to 3½ per cent

The amendment was opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and at the end of a discussion of little interest, negatived by a majority of 42 to 7

The subsequent items of the twelfth schedule of the tariff, down to damask, were, after some brief discussion, agreed to.

On the proposition that for every £100 value £90 be inserted, and that the words "damask per square yard 10d. and draper 5d." be inserted,

Mr. S. Worsley suggested the expediency of more simple protection to the British manufacturer.

Mr. Gladstone supported the measure as it stood

The clause was then agreed to.

The remaining items in the schedule, down to "cotton or waste of cotton wool," were agreed to

On the proposal that a duty of 2s. 11d. per cwt. should be imposed on "cotton of waste of cotton wool.

Dr. Browning commented on the impolicy of duties on the raw material of manufactures, and moved that the blank be filled up with 1d. instead of 2s. 11d

Mr. Brotherton and Mr. Phillips supported the amendment.

Mr. Gladstone supported the item on the ground of revenue, and observed, that the proposed reduction of £50,000 on cotton would involve a reduction of £250,000 on wool

Some discussion took place, when the house divided

For the original motion	7
For the amendment	14
Majority	7

On the proposal with regard to the duty on the import of foreign sheep and lambs' wool.

Mr. C. Wood moved that the duty be reduced to 1s. per cwt.

Mr. Bulkeley felt it to be his painful duty to corroborate the statement of the preceding speaker, that the woollen trade had sadly diminished, and that the sales were in no ways increasing

Mr. Hutton opposed the amendment, and remarked that, after the house had voted as it had done, the duty upon cotton, it could not be said that this duty was a matter one iota less

Mr. S. Worsley, Mr. Alden, and Mr. Lascelles supported the amendment, on the ground that there were special circumstances in the case.

The committee then divided—

For the original motion	142
For the amendment	80
Majority	62

Mr. G. Wood moved that the duty on the import of sheep and lambs' wool, not being of the value of 1s. on the pound thereof, be reduced to 1s per cwt.

Mr. Gladstone opposed the amendment.

The committee divided

For the motion	47
Against it	76
Majority	29

The remaining items of the schedule were then agreed to, and the house resumed.

The Tithes Commission Bill was considered in committee on the motion of Sir J. Graham, and several amendments were agreed to.

The reports of the Slave Trade Suppression (Ilgin) Bill, of the Slave Trade Abolition (Argentine Confederation) Bill, and of the Slave Trade Treaties Bill were brought up and agreed to

The house adjourned.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Singular Suicide of a Youth.—Mr. Baker held an inquest on Tuesday at the London Hospital, on the body of John Coe, aged 16, an apprentice to Mr. Lovett, hairdresser, of Smithfield. John Coe, of 20, Highstreet, Wapping, said that about two years ago the deceased, his son, was in the service of Mr. Dimond, of the Commercial-road. His master was at that time charged with and found guilty of a serious offence—deceased being the chief witness against him. The circumstances of the prosecution gave deceased much uneasiness, and he often complained of how greatly annoyed he was at the conduct of a policeman, who frequently, in his presence, spoke to witness on the subject. It vexed him to such a degree, that several times lately he said he could not bear the sight of the policeman, as it always made him think of the cause of the punishment of his late master. He had been recently working for Mr. Lovett, and he returned from business earlier than usual on Friday last, and sat down to write a letter to his brother; after which he joined in prayer with the children, and went to bed. At six o'clock the next morning he went to his work, and at seven in the evening witness heard that he had been found in a dying state from the effects of a dose of arsenic near Stratford Church, and taken to the London Hospital. He said that he had bought some poison, and drank it in some coffee. He died in the hospital in a few hours. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

At the Kensington police-court, on Tuesday, Thomas Shores, a labouring man, about twenty-four years of age, who has been in custody since the 23rd ult., on a charge of having wilfully set fire to the house of his brother, John Shores, on the previous evening, at Hanworth, near Hounslow, whereby his life had been placed in danger, was brought up for further examination. The wounded man was well enough to attend, and said he did not wish to appear against his brother. Mr. Clive, however, said it was too late now to prevent the case from going to trial. Some further evidence was given, and the prisoner was then remanded till Friday.

Fires.—Between twelve and one o'clock on Tuesday morning, a fire was discovered on the premises of Mr. Coleman, carpenter, Winchester-street, St. Saviour's, Borough. By the speedy arrival of the engines, and the exertions of the firemen, the flames were got under, but not before the building was much damaged, and a considerable quantity of stock consumed. It could not be ascertained how the fire originated.——About half-past nine o'clock the same morning, a fire broke out in the manufactory of Mr. Parry, coffee-roaster, No 6, Type-street, Finsbury, which did considerable damage to the building, and destroyed a quantity of coffee to the amount of upwards of £160. On Monday night, between nine and ten o'clock, a fire occurred at the premises of Mr. Noll, baker, corner of Bell-court, Bermondsey-street, which did considerable damage to the building, and destroyed a large quantity of flour. The fire was caused by the overheating of an oven.

On Tuesday, the mortal remains of the Right Hon. Thomas Lord Manners were removed from his house in Upper Brook-street, for interment in the family vault at Kelham, Notts. One of the best of men is gone to his last account; may we all be as well prepared to meet it in our turn. Kindness, generosity, singleness of heart, and strictness of honour and integrity, were his characteristics, and such was the happy effect of these qualities to win regard, general friendship, and disarm animosity, that no man ever had more friends or fewer enemies, and so Lord Manners began and continued a long public life. He became, in his professional career, successively Solicitor-General to the Prince of Wales, Solicitor-General to the King (George III.), a Baron of the Exchequer of Ireland, and Lord High Chancellor of Ireland. He presided over the Court of Chancery in Ireland for above twenty years, to the satisfaction of an able and learned bar; and, as evidence of the respect and affection with which he was regarded by the legal profession in that country, the addresses and magnificent testimonial presented to him on his retirement are conclusive. On his resignation of the seals of Ireland, he retired altogether from public and official employment, cherished, admired, and beloved by all who had the fortune to enjoy his intimacy. At the advanced age of 87, having lived a long and happy life, because a life of usefulness, integrity, and distinction, he died, leaving an example to others of the inestimable benefits and blessings of sound religious and moral principles, earnest and persevering industry in the duties he had to perform, and a social, friendly, and affectionate disposition.

OXFORD

THE CONVOCATION.

We give below the particulars of the remarkable Oxford Convocation, to decide on the question of the restoration, preceding it with comments made by the correspondent of the Standard, the organ of the High-church party, and stanch opponent of Puseyism. The Standard says—"We were fully prepared for the result of the contest at Oxford. It was too much to expect that those members of Convocation, who, in 1836, voted in favour of the statute for depriving Dr. Hampden of one of the privileges of his office, would in 1842 reverse their former vote: it was too much to expect that his able and faithful discharge of his duties as Professor, in asserting the great doctrines of the Gospel, and in exposing the grievous errors of the Tractarians, would conciliate or mitigate his original enemies. The leaders of the Tractarian party were foremost now, as before, against Dr. Hampden; and skilfully availing themselves of the influence justly due to the names of several strong Anti-Tractarians, who joined them and signed their circular, they were enabled to represent the question as having no connexion whatever with their own favourite views, and thus to gain the votes of many members of Convocation, who, on the broad question of Puseyism or no Puseyism, would have been their staunchest opponents. Their stratagem has succeeded, and yet, after all, they have little to boast of; for, in spite of their organization and activity, their triumph in 1842 bears no comparison to that in 1836. They then succeeded by a majority of seven to one; now only by three to two. Let not Dr. Hampden be discouraged by the result; he has gained ground: they have lost it. Truth is mighty, and will ultimately prevail."

Oxford, Tuesday.

A Convocation was held this day, at two o'clock, to decide on the statute proposed in Congregation on Saturday, for restoring to the Regius Professor of Divinity his privilege of sitting at the board for the appointment of select preachers, of which he was deprived during the excitement of 1836. It was supposed until within a few days that the statute would have passed without opposition, Convocation having consented to assign the professor a place at the new theological board, lately formed, for the examination of students in divinity. It appears, however, that the Tractarian party, to whom the Hebdomadal Board have given dire offence, by refusing to recognise Dr. Pusey as professor in theology, thought the present a good opportunity of retaliation, and by a dexterous appeal to the consistency of many of those members of Convocation who united in passing the statute of 1836, contrived to reject that of this morning by a majority of 334 against 219. On a former occasion the numbers were 474 to 94. Previous to the division, Mr. Sewell, of Exeter College, opposed the proceedings in a Latin speech, entering a protest against the legality of the statute being brought forward. This, however, was overruled by the Vice-Chancellor; and the protest, which, if successful, is likely to be the means of introducing an entirely new working of the University system, and to throw the initiation of all convocational measures into the hands of the combined forces of the Tractarians, is to be forwarded to the Chancellor, or made the basis of legal proceedings.

Later speeches in favour of the measure were also delivered by William Way, Esq., of Glympton Park, and Mr. Phillimore; and against it by Mr. Vaughan Thomas, and another gentleman, whose name escaped us; after which the Tractarian party were ordered to withdraw into the Divinity School, adjoining the Convocation-house, and the placets to remain behind. The Tractarians cheered loudly when the numbers were announced.

The temporary defeat sustained by the friends of the measure is mainly attributable to the complete organization of the Tractarian party in the University, and to the hesitation on the part of the Hebdomadal Board to canvass in support of their proposition, from a feeling that such a method of securing its passing was questionable. In consequence, the nature of the measure and its bearing on the interests of the University were imperfectly apprehended, and the non-resident members, as being unsolicited, except by the Tractarians and their adherents, remained passive until it was too late to turn the scale.

Amongst the supporters of the measure were the members of the Hebdomadal Board present, with the exception of Dr. Richards and Dr. Faulkes, of Jesus College, and perhaps another. The Bishops of Llandaff and Sodor and Man voted also in support of the measure of the Board, as did not wish to appear against his brother. Dr. Clive, however, said it was too late now to prevent the case from going to trial. Some further evidence was given, and the prisoner was then remanded till Friday.

THE CITY.

Great confidence continues to be shown in our own securities, and prices are exceedingly well maintained. The delay in bringing the tariff into operation has precluded purchases to any extent, either in produce or manufactures, and hence a great abundance of unemployed capital in consequence of the absence of demand for commercial purposes. The public, in general, have now too dearly ascertained the real nature of foreign bonds, that dealings in them are confined to a few time bargains among the speculators themselves, and, at present, no legitimate investments offer, except our own securities and railroad shares. Under these circumstances, it is not a cause for surprise that a Three-per-cent. stock is now worth 93, and so long as monetary affairs remain as unsatisfied as at present, little doubt exists but that a further advance may yet be expected.

No fresh or extensive business has been transacted during the week, excepting some purchases of 3½ per cent. reduced, by the broker who generally acts for the Bank of England, and the last prices were, Consols 91⅞ for the opening ex dividend; 3½ per cent. reduced 100¼; India Bonds 23s., 25s., and Exchequer Bills 48s., 50s., premium The other Stocks are closed preparing to pay the dividends due 5th July.

The small number of bonds issued by States which keep faith with their creditors, and the absence of speculation—these render it unnecessary to make any particular remark. The closing prices were, Austrian, 110, 111; Belgian, 102, 103; Dutch, 5 per cents., 101, 101½, the 2½ per cents., 52¾, 52½; Danish, 80½, 81½; and Brazilian, 66¾, 67¼.

The quotation for Mexican was 36¾ ¾. The government of that country appears both able and inclined to satisfy the demands upon it, but in the present uncertain state of political affairs, though no reason exists why a holder who has paid a high price for his bonds should sell them at the enormous discount at which they are at present; yet, as these are among the documents which are speculated upon, those who are fortunately without them, should remember as the quotations are raised or depressed by the machinations of a few to the victimising the unwary.

Railroad shares have been in good demand, although but few are offering. The prices are—London and Birmingham, 177, 179; Birmingham and Gloucester, 50, 52; Great Western, 87, 88, the half shares, 61, 62; South Western, 62½ 63½; North Midland, 65, 67, the new shares, 32, 33; South Eastern and Dover, 25½, 25¾, the scrip, 7-16; Eastern Counties, 9, 9¼; Northern and Eastern, 4¾, 4⅝; Brighton, 11, 11¼; and Brighton A, 25, 26 per shares.

The Great Western has for the last few days engrossed the larger share of speculative business, and the gratifying declaring light traffic has produced a buoyancy which each report of coin, that the credit is more and more established. Bankers and merchants can now speak of the great saving labour imposed upon them, and when the effect reaches the class of smaller tradesmen it must of necessity be serious.

Fatal Rencontre in a Union Workhouse.—On Friday, two boys, inmates of the St. Alban's Union Workhouse, having had some trifling dispute, a scuffling fight ensued, when the youngest, a fine boy of eleven years of age, fell by a blow received on his body from his antagonist, under the effects of which he lingered a few hours, and, notwithstanding every effort was immediately used by the medical officer of the Union, gradually sunk.

Fire in Ely Cathedral.—At eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning, the 8th instant, the city of Ely was thrown into the greatest consternation by the ringing of the fire bells, and the cry that the cathedral was on fire. With an alacrity beyond all praise, within ten minutes after the announcement, the whole of the inhabitants, females as well as males, had assembled, and had formed themselves into double lines from the neighbouring wells, by which means a most ample supply of water was conveyed to the engines; and, within half an hour, from the very great exertions of the people, all danger was entirely removed; and I am happy to say, that at the present I am writing (three o'clock, p.m.), the fire is completely extinguished with but trifling damage.—Globe.

An inquest was held on Thursday afternoon before Mr. Wakley, the coroner, upon the body of the late Lord Congleton; an account of whose melancholy suicide will be found in another column. After a great deal of painful evidence (among which was that given by his son, the present lord, who was greatly affected), which was summed up at great length by the Coroner, the jury retired, and in a few minutes returned the following verdict: "We find that on the 8th of June, 1842, Henry Brooke Parnell, Baron Congleton, was found dead, and hanging, by means of a certain kerchief, which was fastened around the neck, and attached to a certain bedpost, and that he so hung and strangled himself, being at the time in a state of temporary mental derangement."

The Force of Politeness. The following pleasing anecdote is told by M. Casimir Bonjour, in the course of an essay on politeness:—"The Marchioness de Coislin one day solicited an audience of Fouché, then minister of police. The audience was granted, but Fouché, who was resolved to refuse whatever the marchioness might ask of him, received her standing, with his elbow resting on the chimney-piece, and did not invite her to a seat. 'Citizen minister,' said the marchioness, 'I come to ask what crime my sister, Madame d'Avary, has committed, that she should be exiled.' 'She is an enemy of the government,' replied Fouché, 'and has the audacity to set it at defiance.' 'She audacious?' retorted the marchioness, 'she defy the First Consul? How little you know her. She is so timid, that she would not even venture to say, Citizen minister, have the goodness to hand me a chair.' At these words Fouche was so disconcerted, that he lost all his courage to be hostile. Mad. de Coislin had a chair, and Mad. d'Avary received permission to return to Paris."

Romantic Courage of the Earl of Suffolk.—After the siege of Orleans had been abandoned, the Earl of Suffolk was taken prisoner whilst fighting most valiantly, in which he displayed the chivalrous spirit of the times, even at the moment of imminent danger. He was about to surrender himself to William Renaud, but first asked him, "Are you a gentleman?" "Yes." "But are you a knight?" "No." "Then," said the Earl, "I make you one;" and having dubbed him in the field, retired in his custody.

Formation of Fruit.—The Gardeners' Chronicle has an article, demonstrating that in fruit-trees, the flower and then the fruit are formed of leaves. The pear, for instance, consists of thirty-five leaves, which may be seen in the early stages of its formation.

Origin of the Black Doll—a Sign at Rag Shops. -This sign originated with a person who kept a shop for toys and rags in Norton-folgate, about eighty years ago. An old woman brought him a large black doll for sale, but desired it might remain unopened till she called again to see it weighed. Several weeks elapsed without her appearing, which induced the master of the shop to open the parcel, when he found a black doll, neatly dressed, with a pair of gold earrings appended. This he hung up over the door, for the purpose of being owned by the woman who left it. Shortly after this she called, and presented the doll to the shopkeeper as a mark of gratitude for his having by this means enabled her to find out her bundle. The story having gained circulation, this figure has been generally used by dealers in rags ever since.

It appears from a recent statistical return that there are in Australia and its dependencies, including its Italian territory, 25,500,000 Catholics, 3,500,000 members of the United Greek Church, 2,900,000 of the non-United, 1,260,000 Lutherans, 2,240,000 of the Reformed Church, 400,000 Socinians, and 600,000 Jews. The number of religious houses for men amounts to 768, comprising 10,354 persons, and including 27 religious orders. The Brothers of Mercy possess 34 houses, and 542 inmates; the Benedictines 37, and 1093 inmates; and the Franciscans 98, and 1258 inmates. There are 157 convents, containing 3651 women.

It is accurately remarked by Mr. Twining, in his "Aristotle," that the ancients have left us no landscapes; owing, in his opinion, to their not having any landscape painter. They had no Thomsons, because they had no Claudes.

A Profligate. The Morning Post, published at Cincinnati, relates the following anecdote of a young gentleman of that country, who had expended a large fortune, money, lands, negroes, everything in a course of intemperance and profligacy. He had just paid a last year's grog bill of 800 dollars: one day he was walking in the street very leisurely, when seeing a physician on the opposite side, he called out to him, saying he wanted him to come over. "Doctor," said he, "I wish you'd just take a look down my throat." "I don't discover anything, sir," said the doctor, after looking very carefully. "You don't?" said he, "why that's strange; will you be kind enough, sir, to give another look?" "Really, sir," said the doctor, after a second look, "I don't see anything." "Not? why, doctor, there is a farm, ten thousand dollars, and twenty negroes gone down there!"

AFFAIRS IN THE EAST.

INDIA.—THE WAR IN AFFGHANISTAN.

The overland mail, which arrived by extraordinary express from Marseilles on Sunday evening, brought intelligence from Bombay to the 4th May, from Calcutta to the 24th of April, and from China to the 10th of March.

The news which has reached the public from the seat of the Affghan war is of absorbing interest, and will be read with intense avidity. We have to regret that, in the fall of Ghuznee, it should record another reverse to British arms and prowess, although, on the other hand, we have the pride of learning that more important successes have been achieved—that the Khyber Pass has been forced by the valour and intrepidity of our soldiers; and that General Sale has gained in Jellalabad as brilliant a victory as ever reflected lustre upon a soldier's name.

We proceed to lay before our readers such general details of these interesting occurrences as our space will permit; but we must forbid ourselves the repetition of facts which would be consequent upon the insertion of the official correspondence.

GHUZNEE.

(From the Bombay Times.)

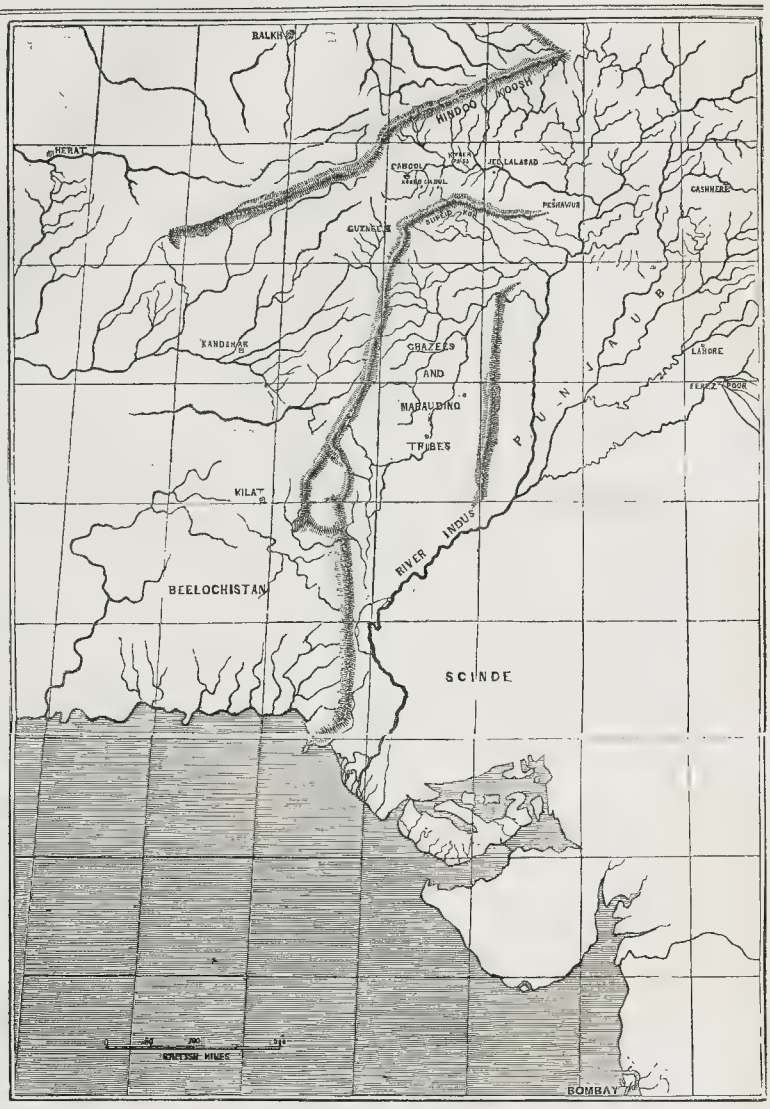
The insurrection which broke out at Cabul on the 2nd of November appears almost simultaneously to have manifested itself at Ghuznee, ninety miles to the south, and thus much further from the Peshawar frontier. On that day Captain Woodburn and 150 men were cut to pieces forty miles to the north. A few days after this Lieut. Crawford, in charge of about 100 prisoners, narrowly escaped; his baggage fell into the enemy's hands, and the greater portion of his men were killed. From the 7th of November to the 1st of March, nothing definite or intelligible was heard from Ghuznee. By the beginning of December the country round was completely mowed up; and though we from time to time heard of the town being filled with insurgents, and Colonel Palmer sorely pressed by the enemy, as his commissariat was believed to be well supplied, a hope was entertained that he might hold out till relieved by General Nott from Candahar; or, that he might, so soon as the country was open, be able to retreat without assistance. About the end of February water began to fail him, the enemy appear to have increased in audacity, and on one occasion they were driven back by a gallant charge made on them by the Sepoys, who bayoneted them in great numbers. A despatch from him, of the 1st of March, dispelled the illusion as to his safety. His original force, which consisted of the 27th Bengal Native Infantry, with some artillery, was considerably under 1000 strong—latterly probably not more than 700; of these, 137 had fallen in the course of the siege, and about 100 were sick or wounded; 200 men were detached, holding an outpost, where water had become so scarce that, within forty-eight hours of the date of the despatch, it must have been abandoned. The enemy was under cover in overpowering force within fifty yards of the garrison. The thermometer had, for some time, been 46 degrees below freezing. The garrison were exhausted by the fatigue of incessant duty, and disheartened by their total isolation; and, under these circumstances, there appeared to be no choice but capitulation left to the commander. He states that, in consequence of this deplorable pass, and of having received orders from Sir William M'Naghten to retire, he had agreed to evacuate about the 6th of March. The city was at this time filled with Ghazees, the religious Mussulman fanatics, who had worked so much woe at Cabul; and these were here, as they are everywhere, and at all times, wholly beyond the control of the chiefs. The ground was thickly covered with snow; and Colonel Palmer, at the conclusion of his despatch, expresses fears for the safety of the force. They were to have proceeded immediately in the direction of Cabul, on their way to Jellalabad, under a safe conduct from the chiefs. Nothing whatever having since this period been heard of them, there remains scarcely any reason to hope but that they have all likewise perished. According to a rumour lately prevalent in Scinde, three or four of the officers were in the hands of the enemy as prisoners. Thus have the Ghazees avenged the massacre of the prisoners under our authority when Ghuznee was taken by Sir John Keane. On the 21st of July, 1839, it was captured by us, with a sacrifice of 500 of the enemy. It was surrendered by us about the 6th of March, 1842, with a loss, it is to be feared, of the whole garrison and camp followers, amounting to upwards of 1000 men.

JELLALABAD.—The last authentic intelligence from this quarter is contained in Sir Robert Sale's despatch of the 7th of April, though letters came down to the 9th. Five weeks intervening between these two periods have been more fertile in events of interest than any other similar space since the close of the first month of the blockade. Throughout the earlier portion of the month of March, the enemy had insulted and annoyed the garrison by swarms of skirmishers into the ravines and hollows round the walls, and behind the numerous mud forts in the vicinage, which it had been found impossible entirely to destroy, and from the cover thus afforded them they maintained an incessant fire of musketry on the parapets. On the 10th the Affghans showed themselves more than usually audacious and persevering. On the same evening information was received that a mine was being driven at the northern face of the fort; and though General Sale considered that there was much reason to doubt the accuracy of this, he resolved on making a sortie to ascertain the fact, and check the boldness of the enemy. On the morning of the 11th, 300 of her Majesty's 13th, under orders of Colonel Dennie, with 300 of the 35th Native Infantry and 200 sappers and miners, at daybreak moved out from the Peshawur-gate, and swept steadily round the low ground to the spot where the enemy were said to have broken ground. The cavalry, under Captain Oldfield, at the same time appeared upon the plain towards the south, to distract the attention of the Affghans. The post where the enemy were expected to have been met, unexpectedly proved to have just before been abandoned—a strong picket in the neighbourhood was gallantly driven in and pursued to a considerable distance, by Captain Broadfoot, at the head of the sappers and miners. An attempt on the last-named body by a heavy force of the enemy's cavalry was repelled. The troops having accomplished the objects of the sortie, in examining the ground around the wall, where neither mine nor gallery could be found, retired in perfect order into the fort, without serious casualty of any sort. For the next twelve days constant skirmishes appear to have occurred betwixt our foraging parties and the Affghan horsemen.



MAP OF THE AFFGHAN COUNTRY.

Provisions once more began to run short, and on the 24th a strong foraging party having been sent out in quest of supplies, they were attacked by a large body of the enemy. These were readily beaten off; not, however, before Captain Broadfoot, of the sappers and miners, had been severely wounded; he is now recovering. It was said that by the end of the first week of April their supplies would be entirely exhausted. A few days afterwards, however, a very successful sortie was made; 500 sheep having been seized and brought into the fortress.

On the 5th of April the rumour ran that General Pollock had been repulsed, and the following morning a salute was fired from the Affghan camp, in honour, as it was understood, of the defeat. As it was reported, in addition to this, that troops were being despatched to meet the advance from Peshawar, as also that Akhbar Khan was about to withdraw his force, Sir Robert Sale resolved to attack him with all his force before his departure, with a view of driving the enemy off from General Pollock, of relieving the blockade, or of chastising them so long as within reach, according to whichsoever of the reports might chance to turn out well-founded. The force marched out accordingly at day-break on the 7th, and after a brilliant action defeated the enemy on every point. Our total strength scarcely exceeded 1400 men; yet with this 6000 of the enemy were put to rout—their guns, four in number, taken from the Cabul force, captured, and a heavy loss (it is said 500) in killed and wounded inflicted on them. The gallant Colonel Dennie, of her Majesty's 13th, was killed when in the act of leading his column to the attack of a fort which the enemy very obstinately defended. The defence of Jellalabad, maintained for a period of nearly six months of severe fatigue, suffering, and privation of every sort, has thus terminated with one of the most brilliant victories which has, since 1815, crowned the British arms.

CANDAHAR.—GENERAL ENGLAND'S ADVANCE AND RETREAT.—General Nott's force had by the end of February begun to suffer severely from the want of carriage—the whole camel conveyance they could command being inadequate for more than a third of his supplies, when necessary to move any considerable distance from the camp: the commissariat was well provided, but ammunition was getting scarce, while medical stores and money were nearly out altogether. The reinforcement and convoy destined for their use was ordered to move from Scinde in three detachments; the first of which, under General England himself, quitted Dadur on the 9th, and reached Quettah on the 16th of March, having lost 300 camels in the snow while ascending the Bolan Pass; some fifteen of the men were frozen to death, and considerable apprehensions entertained for the safety of the brigade. The first detachment consisted of a wing of her Majesty's 41st (445 bayonets); 374 of the 6th Native Infantry; with details of the 3rd Light Cavalry, the Poonah Horse, the 20th and 25th Native Infantry; with four guns; in all, about 1200 men. These had 2000 camels, £45,000 in silver, with ammunition and other stores in convoy. The second detachment, of about equal strength, with 2000 camels, and £90,000 in treasure, under Major Simmons of her Majesty's 41st Foot, left Dadur on the 28th March, and ascending the Bolan Pass without molestation, reached Quettah on the 4th of April. The third portion of the brigade left Sukkur betwixt the 10th and 13th of April, and may be looked for at Quettah about the 7th of May. It consists of the 12th Native Infantry, with a squadron of the 3rd Light Cavalry, amounting to about 1100 men, commanded by Major Reid; they had 2600 camels in charge, with a multitude of other beasts, bearing medical stores, ammunition, and treasure. When assembled, the whole force just arrived at or under orders for Quettah would amount to about 4000 men. General England reached Quettah on the 16th of March, but had only remained a few days when he found it necessary (on the 26th) to move out towards Pisheen, a valley some twenty miles off, to protect the people, who were favourably disposed towards us, against the insurgents, and to obtain forage for the 1500 camels which still remain to him—supplies of this essential not being procurable at Quettah. During the first two days, scattered parties of insurgents were seen along the line of march, and some skirmishing ensued. On the 27th the troops passed the village Hykulzie, and were received in the most friendly manner by the chiefs. Not the slightest hint was given by them that any interruption or annoyance was intended us, though it must have been perfectly known to them that two months' labour had been expended in barricading the pass, a few miles in front; and that Mahomed Sadeez was posted in the hills close by, with a strong force just arrived from Candahar. On the morning of the 28th, considerable numbers of men were seen on the hills on either side of us. These were at first supposed to be scouts or marauders. Further on, a group of low hills skirted the road, betwixt two of which lay our line of march. That on the right was strongly barricaded—that on the left covered with irregulars. The light companies of her Majesty's 41st, and the 21st and 25th Native Infantry, amounting in all to 180 men, were ordered to charge up the hill, in line, as it was imagined the enemy would decamp on their approach. Instead of this, they kept themselves concealed within the works, and the moment that the 41st crossed the crest of the barricade, a rush so desperate and irresistible was made against them that they were compelled instantly to retire, leaving Captain May, two sergeants, one corporal, and fourteen privates dead upon the field. On descending the hill, hotly pressed by the enemy, a body of cavalry which had the day before arrived from Candahar, wheeled round the flank of the hill and fell upon their rear. Here Major Althorp, of the 20th Native Infantry, fell, covered with wounds. He survived two days, and expired on his return to Quettah. A reserve of the remainder of the 41st covered the retreat of the storming party, which formed itself into square to receive the enemy near the bottom of the hill. The Afghan horsemen finding these impenetrable, retired in good order, leaving many of their dead under our bayonets. Of 470 men who had been engaged, including the reserve, twenty-seven were killed and seventy-one wounded. The enemy appeared to have suffered severely. Mahomet Sadeez, the insurgent leader, appears to have headed the charge in person; he received a bayonet wound in the shoulder. Six chiefs, with about thirty others, were killed, and fifty were severely wounded in this affair. They fought with the bravery and enthusiasm of religious zealots, and it is confessed by all our officers, that a finer body of irregular horse than that which charged upon our squares was never seen in Affghanistan. The utmost gallantry was displayed by our men; the sepoys entreated permission to charge up the hill again, but were refused. The 41st were also most anxious to renew the contest. More than half the brigade had been employed in protecting the baggage. It was resolved to retire on Quettah. Our troops having moved off the field, spent the night of the 28th in a ruined fort, three miles to the left; they reached Quettah with but little molestation on the 30th. In the course of these proceedings it had been discovered that the Kojjuck Pass, 63 miles from Quettah, and consequently 84 from Candahar (the total distance betwixt the two being 147 miles) was blocked up, the enemy having for months been engaged in constructing field works for its defence. It had now become apparent that so close was the compact, and so universal the feeling against us throughout the country, that of all that was passing beyond the line of our pickets we were in total ignorance. On the 1st of April, General England wrote to Candahar, informing General Nott of his retreat; stating to him also, that supplies would only be pushed forward in cases of extreme emergency; that the passes must first be opened by a combined movement from the east and west. It was proposed by him that a light brigade, without knapsacks or other encumbrances not indispensable, should move from Quettah as soon as a similar one had marched from Candahar. This last was instructed to bring mortars along with them, these being considered necessary to carry the barricades. This movement could scarcely have commenced from either point earlier than the 15th of April, and must, we should think, considering how entirely all communication is interrupted, be undertaken over 150 miles of rough and irregular country with the greatest hazard. General England seems to have lost all hope for the present of forwarding troops to Candahar, the brigade destined for its reinforcement being now considered necessary at Quettah, where strong intrenchments are being thrown up. We do not quite comprehend the reason of this sudden alteration in General England's resolution; as there seems to have occurred no such change in the state of the Shawl country, betwixt the 28th of March and 1st of April, as to make the presence of 2500 men, which at the former date were partly on their way to reinforce General Nott, necessary at the latter one for the protection of Quettah.

SCINDE.—Through the past month Scinde has been everywhere perfectly undisturbed, the robberies in the Bolan Pass hardly deserving the character of disorders. There is, indeed, scarcely a single occurrence of note that has happened betwixt Dadur and Kurrachee, betwixt the 15th of March and 26th of April, the period over which our present review extends. The movements of the troops upwards, under General England on the 8th, and Major Simmons, of her Majesty's 41st Regiment, on the 28th of March, and Major Reid, of the 12th Native Infantry, now on his way, have already been noticed. The Bengal 19th Native Infantry was daily expected at Sukkur from Ferozepore, to supply the place of the 12th and other troops now on their way to Quettah. The Bombay 17th Native Infantry has gone by steam to Kurrachee on the 18th, 19th, and 22nd of April.

CABUL.—Intelligence of a recent date (not ascertained) has been received at Jellalabad from Cabul about the 8th of April. Another revolution was reported to have taken place, and the rumour will most probably turn out well founded, though not as yet authenticated. The Shah Soojah was said to have been shot in his litter when coming out of the Bala Hissar—a circumstance, this, also extremely probable. Our hostages and prisoners, both here and at Futteabad, were safe and well, though some of them had of late been less kindly treated than formerly. It was said the chiefs were anxious to negotiate for their release; and our conviction is that with Generals Pollock and Sale, now at Jellalabad, and likely to fall back for the present on Peshawar, very little difficulty will be found in recovering, by threats and promises conjointly, the whole of the captives. The Shah Soojah has written a long letter to the Governor-General, endeavouring, it is supposed, to exonerate himself from the suspicions entertained against him of having caused the recent insurrection, or connected himself with its leaders. He lays the blame of our discontents which gave rise to it on the shoulders of the politicals, and states that if his advice had been listened to by the Envoy the present aspect of affairs would have been widely different. No further proof against him has come to light throughout the month.

We now give a return of killed, wounded, and missing in orcing the Khyber Pass: -

Killed—1 European commissioned officer, 1 colour-sergeant and 12 sepoys and privates—14.

Wounded -1 staff, 2 European commissioned officers, 1 fife-major, 2 jemadars, 19 havildars, 2 naiks, 1 drummer, and 85 sepoys and privates—104.

Missing—1 bugler, 16 sepoys and privates—17.

Total killed, wounded, and missing, 135.

(Signed) G. PONSONBY, Captain Assist.-Adj.-Gen.

Camp Ghuznee, Lolla Bey, 7th April, 1842.

Name of officer killed—Lieut. Cummins, her Majesty's 9th Foot.

Names of officers wounded—Staff-Brigadier Wild, slightly; Captain Ogle, her Majesty's 9th Foot, ditto; Lieut. Mulcaster, 64th Native Infantry, ditto.

The following orders in council have been issued since the intelligence of the fall of Ghuznee:—

"The Governor-General in Council has directed that the Commander-in-Chief will submit the conduct of Lieutenant-Colonel Palmer, in surrendering the citadel of Ghuznee, to the judgment of a court-martial, at the earliest period at which such court can be duly assembled.

"The Governor-General in Council has already (on the 28th of January last) directed that a full military inquiry shall be made into all the circumstances connected with the direction and conduct of the troops at Cabul, at the earliest period at which such an inquiry may be practicable.

"The Governor-General has now directed that the conduct of Major-General Elphinstone in Affghanistan shall be submitted to the judgment of a court-martial, at the earliest period at which such court can be duly assembled.

"The Governor-General in Council will further direct that a full inquiry shall likewise be made into all the political functionaries employed at Cabul, at the earliest possible period after he shall be in possession of certain material documents, of which he has already ordered the immediate transmission to Government.

"By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India in Council,

"T. MADDOCK.

"Secretary to the Government of India."

Lord Ellenborough, accompanied by two or three secretaries, had set out from Calcutta to the upper provinces of Bengal. His object in this journey is stated to be twofold—first, to be enabled to communicate without delay with the generals of the army west of the Indus, and the officers commissioned with the management of those provinces; and next, to introduce some reforms there. His lordship, whose decision and promptitude are highly praised, has, it is asserted, required that the commander-in-chief of the army should quit his cool retreats at Simla in order to join him at a more central position. The want of vigour, which was much felt from the beginning of November last, when the Cabul insurrection broke forth, for Lord Auckland hesitated to compromise his successor by any active measures, is no longer complained of.

In the interior of India general tranquillity prevails. Subscriptions to a considerable amount had been entered into all over the country in favour of the widows and orphans (unprovided for by the regulations of the Government) of those who fell during the recent disasters at Cabul. A commercial crisis has taken place at Calcutta; but confidence was beginning to return.

The following paragraph should not be taken in too credulous a spirit. The fate of Affghanistan forms now a curious problem. Shah Soojah, who by temporising and truckling to his enemies, and by many other manœuvres available amongst the Affghans, had contrived to secure himself a precarious existence in the Bala Hissar at Cabul, has at length, as it is now stated, been murdered. His sons have, as it appears, taken different parties, one or two being favourable to the British alliance, while two or three are opposed to it. Various factions are described as at present contending for the lion's share of influence and power, and general confusion, uproar, and bloodshed prevail at Cabul. Shah Kamram, of Herat, nephew of Shah Soojah, after a long contest with his vizier, Yar Mahomed, is also stated to be dead; so that Affghanistan, from the frontiers of Persia to the mountains west of the Indus, may be regarded as in perfect anarchy.

Preceding this summary of our Indian intelligence, we present to our readers an accurate and spirited map of the entire seat of the war in Affghanistan, which will enable them the better to understand the relative position of our troops, and the difficulties to be encountered, and, we hope, gloriously surmounted by the British army. And in another part of our journal we may refer, for a variety of graphic illustrations of the memorable transactions of the bitter warfare we have in hand. We trust these will form an interesting and acceptable present to the British public.

CHINA.

(From the Bombay Times.)

We have received the following letter from Macao, dated March 3, 1842:—"We have little to communicate on the state of our market since the 7th ult., the date of our last circular. Trade at Canton continues free from interruption, but owing to the Chinese holidays, there has been little done either in exports or imports."

Sir Henry Pottinger remained at Hong-Kong, possibly waiting for reinforcements. The post-office, and other public establishments, had been removed from Macao to Hong-Kong. The Chinese had completed their batteries along the Canton river, the efficiency of which there is no probability of being tested. Their presence would present no formidable obstacle to the British force, which would be instantly brought into play against them, if the plan of operations included another attack on Canton. This, however, is not likely to take place. The next step of an important character contemplated by the British Plenipotentiary is a visit to the Celestial City. The Court of Pekin is likely to be embarrassed from another source. Cochin China, which is tributary to China, is threatened with invasion by Siam. This stroke of policy has, in all probability, been effected by British influence at the Court of Siam. Its effect on the councils of the Emperor of China, will, we doubt not, be soon perceived. A most amusingly vituperative proclamation against the British has, in the meanwhile, been issued by his Celestial Majesty.

A proclamation has also been issued by Sir H. Pottinger, in which it is declared that Hong-Kong and Chusan will remain in the possession of England till our demands are complied with by the Emperor; and that they shall be considered free ports, equally open to the ships of all nations. The Chinese inhabitants are invited to return and reside under British protection. Amoy is also to remain a free port in our possession for the present. Sufficient warning is to be given, to permit all property to be removed from it, should it afterwards be resolved upon to restore it to China. One of the stipulations to be insisted on before these possessions be returned, is perfect immunity from punishment for the natives who may have thrown themselves on our protection during existing troubles. The forces with the expedition were in excellent health. The headquarters of the general staff was at Ningpo. It was understood that the naval and military commanders to the northward were authorized by the plenipotentiary to act, in case of emergency, according to the best of their discretion. The Bengal Volunteers had embarked for Calcutta; the 37th Madras Native Infantry were just about to return to India; the English troops were ready to land and be housed in barracks at Hong-Kong.

CHORAL MEETINGS AT EXETER HALL.

The second great choral meeting of Mr. John Hullah's musical classes, instructed on Wilhelm's system, took place on Saturday evening, in Exeter Hall. The attendance of visitors was, if possible, more numerous than on the previous occasion, and amongst the more distinguished auditors present were—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Dean of Chichester, Lord Wharncliffe, the Hon. J. Stuart Wortley, M.P., the Marchioness of Westminster, Lord Howard, Lady Clay, Mr. T. Greene, M.P., Mr. J. S. Pakington, M.P., &c. Lord Wharcliffe, who attended as President of the Committee of Privy Council on Education, under whose direction the classes were originally formed, was loudly cheered both on his arrival and departure.

The music sung on Saturday night was the same as that selected on the former occasion. It comprised the following pieces, viz., the 100th Psalm; an anthem by Farrant; the 95th Psalm; a motet, by Palestrina; the 149th Psalm; the Austrian Hymn, "God save the Emperor," adapted to English words by Mr. Chorley; and a madrigal composed by B. Donato, in the year 1550; besides several other pieces of a simple, but pleasing character; the whole terminating with the National Anthem. These were, on the whole, exceedingly well and correctly sung, although in some of them, and especially in the madrigal of Donato, we detected a few trifling errors in the time; and, indeed, to sing a madrigal correctly, must require the most unremitting practice on the part of so vast a body of singers, amounting altogether to about 3000, as the least "hitch" mars the effect completely. The National Anthem was not by any means sung as we could have wished, and the tenor singers are too prone to vociferousness. Still, taken as a whole, the performance was highly successful, and was honoured with the loudest applause from all parts of the hall.

At the conclusion, Lord Wharncliffe came forward and announced that a third great choral meeting would take place in a short time, in order to defray sundry expenses which had not yet been paid off. His Lordship warmly praised the efficiency of the pupils, and exhorted them to continue their exertions, mentioning, as a sort of stimulus to their abilities, that the Queen Dowager had been much delighted with the evening's performance. It appears, however, that the very same music is to be repeated on the next occasion, although some slight change would, we think, be advisable.

In the course of the evening the hall was unexpectedly visited by his Grace the Duke of Wellington, whose appearance, whilst one of the pieces were being sung, caused the greatest sensation. The singing was suspended, and all the assembly—both singers and auditors—rose with one unanimous impulse, and cheered the noble duke with the most enthusiastic fervour and energy. The scene was gratifying and affecting in the extreme. His Grace appeared in excellent health, and walked down to his carriage at the conclusion of the evening without any assistance whatever. As he retired there was one general and heartfelt exclamation of, "God bless the Duke!"

The other distinguished visitors also retired amidst loud applause, and the evening went off altogether in the most satisfactory manner. Mr. Hullah, as before, gave some of his "manual signs," and without the assistance of any instrument, succeeded in eliciting from his pupils the various notes indicated by him, without the least difficulty, delay, or embarrassment. This is a fact not lightly to be passed over. His pupils, we repeat, do him the greatest credit, and we hope they may continue to progress in the science to which they appear to be such warm devotees.

[In our musical department will be found a full development of Mr. Hullah's system.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1842.

It will be kindly, and perhaps not unwisely, remembered by our readers that, in the promise of the doctrine of humanity which this journal has pledged itself, to the best of its humble power, to enforce, we recorded our memory of the heart and genius of that fine philanthropist, Michael Thomas Sadler, and suggested, with a strong degree of faith and pleasure in the truth of our assertion, that his mantle had descended upon the shoulders of the young, good, and charitable Lord Ashley—a nobleman who has this week vindicated our aspiration and his own virtuous industry in the pursuit of the noble calling he has chosen, and gathered unto himself such laurels of human piety and charity as men adore, but only God bestows.

However, by this time he has won from thousands the "blessings which mount to Heaven," and the whole nation is applauding him with exulting praises for identifying all his parliamentary ambition and distinction with the sorrows, the sufferings, and the salvation of the poor.

In the brief summary of proceedings in our houses of Legislature to which this journal is of necessity confined, we have simply been able to record the fact, that on Tuesday evening Lord Ashley—cheered by all parties—applauded to the echo, to the honour of the English heart—listened to with respect, and believed with the implicit reliance which is due to his character as a Christian, a gentleman, and, as it shall prove, a statesman, too—obtained permission to bring in a legislative enactment of protection for all classes of labourers in our mines and collieries, for the restriction of the young tasks of children, for the entire moral removal of women from their unseemly and disgusting toil, for the relievement of men from the demoralizing influences of their degrading slavery, and for the humanizing of the owners of such property as hold its monopoly in this most marvellous iniquity, who batten upon the brief existence of their victims, and who, in many cases, barter in dwarfing God's image, and the destruction of social happiness and life.

It was not in these words that Lord Ashley framed his motion of Tuesday evening, but it was to all their purpose and effect.

In a beautifully eloquent but painfully circumstantial speech he put forth the accumulated catalogue of the horrors he sought to annihilate, and the grievances he was determined to redress. His oration, for it may be called one—if touching and exciting facts related with purity of diction and in perfect truth and simplicity of heart, be not excluded from the pale of modern oratory—was listened to with an interest as intense as it was honourable to the listeners, and only cheered when the pain of the subject merged for the moment into the humanity of their charity as men admiring, but only God bestows.

It would not, he hoped, be deemed presumptuous on his part, when he rose for the purpose of propounding his motion, and asked for its sympathy and patient hearing, if he stated that he felt quite certain of repaying their indulgence. The novelty of the subject, its magnitude, the deep and solemn interest it had excited throughout the country, the consideration of its vital influence on the welfare of so large a portion of their fellow-countrymen, would, of themselves, be quite sufficient to obtain for him a favourable hearing. Enormous mischief had been discovered, and an immediate remedy was proposed; and sure he was that if those who had the power were as ready to abate oppression as those who had suffered would be to hail the boon with gratitude and thankfulness, sure he was that there would be such a renewal of good understanding between master and servant, between wealth and want, between the ruler and the ruled, as would conduce to the restoration of much comfort, under God's blessing, to the permaneat security of the empire. (Hear, hear.)

This appeal was one of courtesy, modesty, and a nervous sense of right, combined. Let us now turn to a few of the serious, solemn, and too well authenticated statements:—

It was shown in the evidence that a child, only six years of age, in one of the mines in the west of Scotland, carried or dragged half a hundred weight fourteen times every day, a distance as high as the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral. In the evidence of one woman, named Betty Hamilton, it was stated that belts were fixed round the women's waists, and chains were attached to them and ran between their legs, and the enormous weights which they had to drag were fastened to those chains. The women were made old and infirm before they were thirty years of age, and they were seldom delivered of an infant which survived its birth. * * * * *

Those parties who worked were brought up in total ignorance, and one of the evils of this was the destruction of the morals of the females, and they were rendered altogether unfit to discharge the duty of a wife or mother. * * * * *

The miners had regulations and a system of their own, and it occurred when parties committed offences, which rendered them liable to legal penalties, which the miners did not regard in a criminal point of view, they harboured them against the penalties of the law; and, under such circumstances, no constable would venture to descend into the mines to execute his duty. There was abundant evidence that the children were exposed to ill treatment. The colliers worked alone in dark places, and at a distance from observation, and could therefore inflict punishment without detection, and with impunity. * * * * *

It appeared, from the evidence of a witness, that a boy had been seen beaten with a pickaxe; and that there was a large gash in his head, inflicted by the same weapon. There was another case to which he would direct the attention of the house. He had read the case in the newspapers, and went to the Home Department, with the view of having an inquiry instituted. His request was attended to, and the result was, that it was admitted that the case had not been over-stated, and that it was not only substantially, but accurately correct. It was that of a boy who had twenty-four wounds upon his body, his back and loins were beaten to a jelly, and his head covered with marks of old wounds. When brought before the magistrate, he could neither sit nor stand, and was obliged to be laid upon the floor. His arm had been broken, and after that he was forced to work before it was cured. The master admitted that he was in the habit of beating him with a stick, in which a nail was fixed, which projected an inch, and that this penetrated his flesh. Mr. Milne further stated that he had been starved for want of food. The master kept him as a waggoner until he was of no further use, and then sent him home to his mother, who was a widow in Rochdale.

Here is a fearful admixture of cruelty with crime! We go no farther! The heart sickens, and the blood burns over the thought of these enormities of human tyranny, and we shudder to think that in our mining and manufacturing districts it has been worked into a system for the purpose of most unhallowed gain, and what is worse, for the stunting, and grinding, and brutalizing of a far-spread race of English poor.

Let our readers, however, put faith in our intention to make Lord Ashley's measure the means of our aiding and illustrating the whole wretchedness and wickedness which he has denounced and laid bare. For the nonce, we take it only as the topic of the moment—the prominent and absorbful question of the legislative week; but again hereafter, and for ever, until we hear the voice of the people rejoicing over its extermination, will we keep this British suffering and slavery before the eye of the human public—its great and haunting leprosy—its unhealed social sore—its taunt of goading crimination—its stain of blood and sorrow, deepening into the humanity of the land.

Still, we hope that our mission of agitation will be brief. The press and the Parliament have now sounded the tocsin of indignation and disgust—the determination of justice has gone forth among the people, and the public heart is pouring out but one grand response to the imploring aspiration of Lord Ashley, that the Legislature of England would "work out the words of the prophet, and break off our sins and iniquities by doing mercy to the poor."

Cobbett once illustrated a familiar point of English grammar in his own peculiar but very forcible style, by stringing together in a most objectionable and offensive way, what must always appear an unjust and ill-assorted association of objects—"A House of Commons." "A Den of Thieves." Many writers both before and after Cobbett, and many public declaimers too, have endeavoured, with more or less effect, to bring this particular branch of the legislature into disrepute; but notwithstanding the plausible complaints of some, and the querulous aspersions of others, the assembly of representatives has, by the display of those estimable qualities that distinguish the human character and human intellect, maintained that high ground which, by the proper discharge of its functions, it was originally intended to occupy, and justified its assumption of power as the right arm of the British constitution. A learned and distinguished individual, not less remarkable for his varied and profound accomplishments than for his eccentricities, which nothing but his genius could palliate, has more than once taken occasion to express publicly his thanks to God that the country possessed a House of Lords; and the thanksgiving found a willing response in the hearts of many; but more numerous by far is that class which, in the plenitude of its political piety, offers grateful homage for the existence of a House of Commons. It is always, therefore, a matter of infinite regret to the respectable and intellectual portion of the community, when either of these branches of the Legislature in its collective capacity, gives scandal to the public, by allowing its members to descend from the high and palmy ground of law makers, to indulge in scurrilous and personal invective; for although it may reasonably enough happen in an assembly so constituted, that persons of low and unrefined habits may, by some fortuitous accident, find admission; yet, unfortunately, the honourable and high-minded, the virtuous and accomplished, must, inevitably, share the disgrace of such painful and vulgar exhibitions. These reflections are induced by an occurrence which took place in the House of Commons on Tuesday night last, in which gentlemen on both sides of the House obtained a prominent and unenviable distinction. We are not disposed to be invidious, by mentioning the names of any of the honourable or right honourable gentlemen or noble lords who took a part in the fracas between Mr. Ferrand and Dr. Bowring; but it certainly appears to us, that some of the members took a course on that occasion, which, for the credit and dignity of the assembly to which they belong, should act rather as a warning than an example. We are proud to see that our daily contemporaries on both sides of the question, in dealing with this really painful exhibition, have been truly party-proof; and, if this high and gentlemanly tone be only persevered in, refractory legislators will be as anxious to imitate them in manners, as dull ones are to rob them of the fruits of their erudition. Let us in conclusion observe—for the information of members generally—that boldness of assertion, and an uncourteous and impertinent mode of expression, is no proof of either honesty or courage.

In the City article of the Morning Herald of Wednesday the correspondent of that journal alludes to a rumour which has reached town, and which he characterises as authentic, bearing upon the origin of some of the disasters in India, and attributing them to a very extraordinary and hitherto undivined commencement. Now, it has so fallen out that the letter containing the anecdotal reports in question has come into our possession, and will form a curious document to present to our readers, the more so as it has been written in a very high quarter, and we have every reason to believe may be relied upon on the score of authenticity. Let us first, however, give the version adopted by the Herald:—

> Amongst other letters from India just received which throw light more or less upon the state of affairs there, and the occurrences which brought matters in Cabul to such a melancholy pass, one of an extremely singular character may be mentioned, which, from its curious details, is really worthy of attention, more especially as the lady-writer asserts that the facts may be relied upon, and are well known in the higher circles in India. It would seem, according to this statement, that woman, the "cause of all man's woe," was the cause, in part at least, of the late disasters in Affghanistan. The story runs thus: some time after the arrival of Lady M'Naghten in Cabul to join her husband Sir William, he received the news of his appointment as Governor of Bombay. When considering the necessary arrangements for proceeding to take possession of his government, Sir William of course could not but look to the safety of his journey and the comforts of his lady and the other officers' ladies who proposed to accompany her. At that time the passes through the Ghilzie territory, through which lay the route, were still infested and rendered dangerous by the unruly tribes inhabiting them. Previously, in order to restore tranquility and ensure order among those tribes, Sir William M'Naghten, on concluding a treaty with the chiefs, had taken the precaution of making the condition that some of the more influential among them should take up their residence at Cabul, so as to be under the surveillance of the British authorities. The ladies proposing to accompany Sir William to Bombay, well aware of the troubled state of the Ghilzie districts in the mountain passes, expressed naturally great anxiety about the perils of the passage, and in fact a disinclination to proceed without the best security for safety. In consequence, as the most ready means, Sir William summoned the Ghilzie chiefs in Cabul to a conference, at which he intimated to them his desire, equivalent to a command, that they should accompany his party through the unruly districts, so as by their presence and influence to secure the peaceful behaviour of their tribes. On retiring from the conference the Ghilzie chiefs held a parley amongst themselves, and expressed their distrust of the proposition, as being a snare for carrying them off prisoners and confining them in Hindostan, as was the case with the Kadir chief Hadji Khan. They formed the resolution in consequence not to proceed with Sir William, but as disobedience of course would subject them to punishment, they resolved also, as the only way to escape the alternative, to raise an insurrection, the plan of which was combined on the spot. And this was to attack the residence of Sir Alexander Burnes, as the most formidable party they had to deal with, and to plunder the treasury, which, strange enough, was held in the next house to his, and unguarded. Early in the next morning the project was put into execution; Sir Alexander Burnes murdered, the treasury plundered, and the population, already discontented, rose as one man to support this improvised insurrection. The result is known. At the news, every district, valley, and hamlet in Cabul poured forth its man and horse, contributed its sword and musket, to join in the plunder of Cabul, and the expulsion of the Feringhees.
> The moral to be drawn from this lesson, for the facts can hardly be doubted, would seem to point to the impolicy and inexpediency of permitting the accompaniment of the wives or other female relatives of officers, in an expeditionary force, not destined for the permanent occupation of a conquered country.

We now usher forth the original document to society, without in any respect altering it, or cancelling any portion of its peculiar disclosures.

"Banks of the Indus, 4th April, 1842.

"I had almost forgotten to give you an anecdote of the origin of the Affghanistan outbreak, which is no less singular than true. Will you believe it that women was the remote origin of all the disasters that have occurred here? It appears that Captain O——, in a morning call on Lady M'Naghten, by way of badinage, asked her if she had heard of the presents Sir William had received at Cabul. 'Presents,' said her ladyship, 'I have only just received his last letter, and he mentions nothing of the kind. What are they, shawls, or furs, or jewels? Stupid man, he never alludes to such things, although he knows how much I like them.' 'Oh no,' replied O——, 'they are none of these; but perhaps——.' 'Come, come,' cried the lady, 'there is some mystery, and I insist upon your telling me.' 'Well, if you insist,' said the captain, 'the Shah has made M'Naghten a present of twelve slave girls.' 'Slave girls!' roared Lady M——. 'Yes,' replied O——; 'however, Sir William would not have them all, and returned eight, retaining only four.' Lady M—— was evidently excited and in ill-humour, and O—— took his leave. In a furious passion her ladyship flew to her writing-desk, and dashed off six pages of anathema on poor Sir William, which soon after reached the Government office in the shape of a most bulky despatch, to go with the official despatches to Cabul. It was duly burked, which may account for poor Sir William being quite at a loss to comprehend the sulky snubbing letters he subsequently received from his lady, and the sudden determination she had formed of joining him at Cabul. Such resolve she had made, and no remonstrance or persuasion could dissuade her from her purpose. The consequence of her intention to join her husband was, that many other ladies were induced to look after theirs, and joined her in journeying through Affghanistan You have heard of the repeated acts of insurrection of the Ghilzie chiefs, some of whom had been pardoned, but with the reservation that they resided in Cabul, near the throne, instead of on their mountains. When Sir William M'Naghten was appointed Governor of Bombay, it was necessary that he should proceed overland to that presidency on the Indus to Bombay, and as the Ghilzie passes and mountains were in a very unsettled state, the ladies vowed they would not move unless the Ghilzie chiefs under surveillance at Cabul were directed to accompany Sir William's camp, that their influence might be exerted with their tribes to keep the road free of molestation or plunder. When the desire of the Envoy was intimated to the chiefs, they immediately suspected that it was some ruse to carry them off to Hindostan, and to imprison them, as the Kakeer chief, Hadjee Khan, had been in the fort of Chumur. They therefore held a consultation in the city, when it was resolved, that they would rather die than be led into captivity to India; that they would attempt an insurrection in the city which should implicate all parties, and from a small spark burst into a flame. It was determined to murder Sir Alexander Burnes, plunder his house, in the heart of the city, and the treasury, which, in the infatuation of the politicals, was placed next door to his residence. All was arranged. Sir Alexander was murdered, the treasury forced and plundered; blood once shed, the excited passions of the Mussulmans were not allowed by the priests and Ghazies to slumber; the city rose in open insurrection, and was shelled from the Bala Hissar for some days. The news spread to the remotest valleys, and all flocked to share in the plunder of it, or in the destruction of the Feringhees. The Ghilzies of the Khoord Cabul Passes rose en masse, and every valley and hamlet and sheep farm turned out its sword or matchlock, now to man the heights along which Sir Robert Sale was at this very time traversing with his brigade on his return to India, in the cause of relief the last remnant of the army of the Indus. Everything had been reported as in a state of profound tranquillity. The brave old man had to fight his way for eight days through the passes of Jellalabad, where he has been beleaguered ever since. The murder of Sir William M'Naghten the destruction of the Cabul fort—the imprisonment of the ladies in the fort of Lughaum –the defeat of Wild's brigade—all may be traced to this silly story of the slave girls. What a subject for writers on human passions! Without moralizing, however, it proves the folly of allowing women of any rank to join or accompany an army in an enemy's country."

THE COURT AND HUNT TON.

On Monday the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by his Excellency Count Mensdorf, left town at twelve o'clock, in an open carriage and four, escorted by a party of Hussars, for Windsor Castle. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, were in the following carriage and four. The Counts Alphonso, Alexander, and Arthur Mensdorf, also occupied another royal carriage.

Her Majesty, on entering Windsor, was met by the whole of the scholars of Eton, who surrounded the carriage, and kept up an incessant huzza until the royal carriages reached the quadrangle of the Castle.

The following distinguished suite attended her Majesty:—Lord Morton and Lady Portman (the Lord and Lady in Waiting), Lord Charles Wellesley and Sir E. Bowater (Equeries), Captain Meynell (Groom), and the Hon. Misses Paget and Ladell (Maids of Honour).

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out in pony carriages on Tuesday.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, their Serene Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Meiningen, the Duchess Ida and the Princesses of Saxe Weimar, and the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen and suite left town on Monday morning in open carriages and four for the Lodge, in Bushy Park, and partook of a déjeûné Her Majesty and her illustrious relatives returned in the evening to dinner to Marlborough House

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Augusta of Cambridge left town on Monday, for Kew. Their Royal Highnesses returned to Cambridge House in the evening.

WINDSOR, Tuesday.—This day the Queen, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the distinguished visitors and suite, honored Ascot Races with their presence. The Royal cortége occupied eight carriages and four, each carriage being preceded by outriders in their scarlet liveries, and left the Castle at ten minutes past twelve o'clock, proceeding by the usual route through the Park.

The Queen and Royal party returned to the Castle between four and five o'clock.

HER MAJESTY'S PROGRESS TO WINDSOR.—It has been noticed by persons accustomed to witness the daily progress of the royal cortége, on her Majesty taking her usual afternoon drives, and on other occasions, that since the late diabolical attempt on her Majesty's life, the attendants, whether consisting of the royal equerries only, or of a escort of soldiers, have so placed themselves around the royal carriage as best to tend to the preservation of their royal and illustrious mistress, should there be another individual in existence so fiendish as to make another regicidal attempt, which God forbid. During her Majesty's progress to and her return from the review on Wormwood Scrubs, on Saturday last, the above precaution was particularly noticed; and, again on Monday, during the Royal progress from Buckingham Palace to Windsor Castle.

HER MAJESTY'S HEALTH.—The effect of the recent atrocious and cowardly attempt on the life of our beloved sovereign is, we regret to say, but too plainly perceptible in her Majesty's countenance and demeanour when in public. Distinguished as is the Queen for calm fortitude and more than womanly courage, her Majesty must, indeed, be more than human, were she altogether superior to those apprehensions which a second dastardly attack upon her life would excite in the stoutest heart. We regret to state —and we do so on information derived from those who have frequent opportunities of observation—that in place of the former cheerful and confident demeanour of the Queen, when taking her accustomed drives, there is a manifest perturbation, a hurried and anxious cast of countenance, which portrays too plainly that the calm flow of happy feeling which the presence of the assembled troops of her people formerly created, has sustained an interruption, and that apprehensions of danger excite almost involuntary vigilance to detect its possible approach. In these feelings of anxiety, lest a recurrence of the attempt of Monday evening last should be made, it is evident that Prince Albert and the Duchess of Kent also participate. These indications of alarm were especially visible in the Queen's manner yesterday on her Majesty's progress from Buckingham Palace to the Chapel Royal. The attendance of two equerries, one on each side of the Royal carriage, in place of one, as formerly, showed that the remarks we were led to make on the absence of proper precautions on the part of those to whom such matters ought to be an object of incessant care, after the premonition of danger supplied by the attempt of the Sunday preceding, had not been made in vain. The Chapel Royal was on Sunday crowded to excess. Not merely was the theatre hemmed in to attend to join their Royal mistress in thanksgiving to Heaven for her renewed deliverance from death, but a very large number of the nobility were also present. The Bishop of London preached a most impressive sermon on the occasion; in the course of which he alluded to the attempt upon the Queen, and to her merciful deliverance, which he ascribed to the immediate interposition of the Deity. The form of thanksgiving ordered to be read on the occasion was joined in by the assembled congregation with marked fervour—a feeling which was too strongly marked to escape observation in the metropolitan churches, in which it was generally read. The ministers of the different denominations of Dissenters also alluded to the event in their prayers with marked and emphatic gratitude. We are informed that upwards of 2000 names of the nobility and gentry, with those of all the Ambassadors from foreign states, were inscribed at the Palace during the past week; thus marking the deep interest which her Majesty's danger and deliverance had excited.—Globe.

Lady Shelley's first of a series of matinées musicales took place at Fulham on Monday, and was attended by 400 fashionables. The music was excellent. The amateurs were assisted by Signor Puzzi, F. Chatterton, Negri, Balfe, Madame Balfe, Miss Poole, Miss Mdlle. Stockel on the pianoforte.

DEVONSHIRE HOUSE.—The birthday of the Duke of Devonshire was celebrated on Monday. The heads of the Noble Duke's household partook of a sumptuous dinner, and the domestics and their families were liberally regaled. A ball concluded the festivities.

The Right Hon. Sir Robert and Lady Peel left their residence in Whitehall-gardens, at half-past four o'clock on Monday, on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle.

CELEBRATION OF THE BIRTHDAY OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF HANOVER, AT KEW.—His Majesty the King of Hanover's birthday was celebrated on Monday at Kew with respect and gratitude; for, although his Majesty is absent from his native village, he does not fail to dispense his charity among the poor of that parish. A royal salute of twenty-one guns was fired on the green in front of his Majesty's house both morning and evening. A match of cricket was played on the green by the juveniles of the parish; after which, they were plentifully supplied with cake and wine, when his Majesty's health, and that of the Crown Prince of Hanover, were drunk with the greatest enthusiasm. A large party of gentlemen and his Majesty's tradesmen assembled at the Coach and Horses Hotel for the same purpose, and the conviviality of the evening did not close until a late hour; indeed, a general holiday was observed throughout the parish.

FASHIONABLE PARTIES.—The Marchioness of Lansdowne had an assembly on Monday night at Lansdowne-house. Nearly 400 personages of rank and distinction honoured her ladyship by their company.

The Marquis of Salisbury entertained a select circle to dinner at his mansion in Arlington-street, when his excellency Baron Gersdorff, Baron Gustave, Countess of Mamesbury, Viscount and Viscountess Jocelyn, Viscount and Viscountess Mahon, Lord Fitzgerald, Lord and Lady Willoughby D'Eresby, Lady Alice Peel, Sir Frederick French, Mr. G. Talbot, &c., were among his Lordship's guests.

The Countess of Zetland had a matinée musicale at the family residence in Arlington-street. The selection of music was sacred, and comprised some of the most admired morceaux from the oratorios of Handel and more recent composers. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester honoured her Ladyship with her company. An elegant déjeûné was laid out in the principal dining-room for the visitors, who did not exceed 130 in number.

LORD AND LADY FRANCIS EGERTON'S PARTIES. The theatrical divertisements given by the above noble Lord and Lady, five years back, at Bridgewater-house, were the rage of the season, as also her Ladyship's tableaux vivants, and these delightful amusements have been long remembered in the fashionable circles. A series of theatrical entertainments was commenced on Friday last, when the Duke of Wellington, Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, Marquis of Salisbury, Countess of Carlisle, and a select circle of about 100 of the leading aristocracy graced the representation by their presence. On Monday night her Ladyship had another representation of Sheridan Knowles's "Hunchback." From the annexed programme, handed to the noble visitants, the cast of characters will be seen: This evening will be represented the "Hunchback." Julia, Mrs. Butler; Helen, Miss Adelaide Kemble; Master Walter, Mr. Vandenhoff; Sir Thomas Clifford, Mr. Henry Greville; Lord Tinsel, Mr. De Bathe; Master Wilford, Mr. Charles Seymour; Modus, Mr. Butler; Gerard, Mr. Lyttleton; Fathom, Mr. Francis Seymour; Thomas, Mr. Murray; Stephen, Captain Cole.

It will be observed from the above bill of the performances, that those who took part in that popular drama were, with only one or two exceptions, amateurs in the histrionic art. An elegant temporary stage was erected in the back drawing-room of the family mansion in Belgrave-square, and at the end of the saloon seats were erected for the distinguished audience. The performances commenced shortly after nine o'clock, and terminated at half-past twelve, when a petit souper was served up in the dining-room.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR AND LADY LYNDHURST'S PARTIES. On Wednesday, in George-street, Hanover-square, the noble and learned lord gave a sumptuous entertainment to a select circle, and subsequently her ladyship held an assembly.

The Duke of Wellington left town for Windsor Castle, on a visit to her Majesty.

MONTAGUE HOUSE.—The Duchess of Buccleuch has commenced her morning parties for this and the succeeding month. They commence on Thursday next from three to seven o'clock. The grand pavilion next the Thames has been rebuilt, one portion of which will be set apart for the déjeûné. About five hundred persons are expected. No day is named for the Queen's visit; but it is rumoured that her Majesty is expected before the end of the season.

Lord and Lady Francis Egerton entertained a distinguished party with another of those theatrical representations which has made so much noise in the fashionable world. Amongst her ladyship's guests was Mdlle. Rachel, who was the object of universal interest and marked attention from the noble host and hostess.

The Caledonian Ball, which takes place on Monday next, promises to be one of the grandest fêtes this season. The noble charity for which it is destined, and the rank and fashion which heads the list, are certain to insure a crowded attendance. The Ladies Patronesses, amongst other excellent arrangements, have retained Jullien's and Koenig's fine orchestra for the occasion.

Madame Lephis (Jenny Colon), the pretty and celebrated actress, died on Tuesday morning, after a tedious illness, at her residence, Rue Neuve des Mathurins.

QUEEN CHRISTINA.—Queen Christina of Spain has, it is said, become the purchaser of Malmaison, the favourite residence of the Empress Josephine.

GRAY'S INN, June 8.—The undernamed gentlemen were this day called to the degree of barrister at-law by the honourable society of Gray's Inn, viz., William Smith, Esq., and Frederick M'Mahon, Esq.

LISZT, THE PIANIST.—The celebrated Liszt gave a grand concert at St. Petersburgh on the 22nd ult., for the benefit of the city of Hamburgh, at which a sum of 40,000 roubles (10,000 francs), were received.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

The nuptials of the Marquis of Waterford and the Hon. Louisa Stuart, only unmarried daughter of Lord Stuart de Rothesay, ambassador to the court of St. Petersburgh, were solemnised on Wednesday, at the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, by special licence.

His Grace the Archbishop of Armagh, uncle to the noble bridegroom, arrived shortly after eleven o'clock, accompanied by the Marquis of Waterford and Lords John and William Beresford.

At half-past eleven the lovely and accomplished bride entered the chapel, accompanied by Lord and Lady Stuart de Rothesay, and attended by the bridal train. The bridesmaids were Lady Caroline Somers Cocks, Lady Jane Bouverie, Lady Sarah Saville, Hon. Miss Stuart, and the Misses Beresford.

The chapel was filled by a highly-distinguished congregation of the members of both families, and some of the leading nobility, who obtained admittance by cards the gift of Lord Stuart de Rothesay. Had not that precaution been taken, the chapel would have been crowded to excess, and that by not a very select audience, for it required the exertions of several of the police to maintain anything like order at the entrance to the sacred edifice.

Shortly after the arrival of the bride and family connexions, the ceremony was proceeded with, his Grace the Archbishop of Armagh officiating on the interesting occasion.

In addition to the Marquis of Waterford and Lord and Lady Stuart de Rothesay, we noticed among the relatives and friends present the Dowager Countess of Hardwicke (grandmother of the bride), Dowager Countess of Caledon, Lady Catherine Douglas, Viscount and Viscountess Beresford, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Marchioness of Clanricarde, Lord and Lady James Stuart, and Hon. Miss Stuart, Viscount and Lady Sarah Ingestre, Misses Berry, Lords John and William Beresford, Sir John P. Beresford and Misses Beresford, Honble. Lady Rendlesham and Hon. Misses Rendlesham, Lord and Lady Somers, Viscount Canning, Lady Duff Gordon, Sir Gordon, Lady Antrobus and Misses Antrobus, &c.

At the conclusion of the ceremony, the wedding circle repaired to the residence of Lord Stuart de Rothesay in Whitehall-yard. On the departure of the bride and bridegroom from the chapel, the populace assembled in Whitehall loudly cheered the happy couple.

A déjeûné was given by Lord and Lady Stuart de Rothesay to a select circle of twenty of the immediate members of both families.

Shortly after two the Marquis and Marchioness left in an elegant four, for the Priory, Earl Somers' seat, near Reigate, where it is their intention of staying a week, and then purpose going to Curraghmore, the marquis's princely seat in the county of Waterford.

The noble marquis's establishment leave for Ireland this day, and the preparations of the high tenantry for the welcome of their liberal landlord and his amiable and accomplished bride have, we hear, commenced. Indeed, we have reason to believe the reception of the marquis and marchioness at the seat of the Beresford family, will be of such an enthusiastic character as to have been rarely excelled in that country.

It is a singular fact that although the Royal Chapel at Whitehall possesses more than general conveniences for the performance of marriage ceremonies, it is a rare occurrence to have a marriage solemnized there; for, with only one exception, there has not been a marriage there for some ten or fifteen years back.

THE CHURCH.

ORDINATION.—At the last general ordination holden by the Lord Bishop of Ely at the parish church of St. George, Hanover-square, the following gentlemen were admitted into holy orders:—

Deacons of Oxford. John Cooke, B.A., Balliol College; Edward B. Edgell, B.A., Balliol College; Henry Wills Gray, B.A., Exeter College; John Park Whalley, B.A., University College. Of Cambridge.—John Dowell Ridout, B.A., Christ's College; Thomas Samuel Woollaston, B.A., St. Peter's College; William Pattinson, B.A., St. Peter's College; James Astley, B.A., St. John's College; Francis France, B.A., St. John's College; John Farrar Robinson, B.A., St. Peter's College; Mytous Bright, B.A., Magdalen College; Charles Styles Drake, B.A., Jesus College; William Fowler Kerley, M.A., Sidney Sussex College; George Hutchinson, B.A., St. John's College; George Barham Johnson, B.A., Corpus Christi College. Of St. David's College. Lampeter Thomas Williams and George Robinson Thomas, by letters dismissory from the Lord Bishop of St. David's.

Priests of Oxford.—Rev. Charles Culliford Goodden, B.A., Exeter College; Rev. Richard Lloyd, B.A., Merton College; Rev. Watson Pedder, B.A., Brasenose College; Rev. Thomas Scott, M.A., New Inn Hall; Rev. Wm. Yorick Smythies, B.A., Trinity College; Rev. Wm. Fort Sweet, B.A., Pembroke College.

Of Dublin. Rev. Thomas Robert Crowes, B.A., Trinity College.

PASTIMES OF THE PEOPLE.

THE ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.—The annual sailing match for the prizes awarded by this spirited and gentlemanly club was attempted on Saturday last, but owing to the steadiness of the wind it was not able to round the distance-boat within the time prescribed by the laws of the club, the affair was declared "no match," and the sailing to come off all over again on the 17th instant. But although sport was thus untoward, the excursion is on all hands represented as having been delightful:—"We are bound to admit," says a critic who must abuses it, "that it was very pleasant, and true to the spirit of the club, as usual, did their best to provide, and successfully the comfort of their guests. There was a tolerable band on board the steamer which accompanied the match, and dancing on the upper deck was kept up with much spirit. There was nothing in the way of the day by which any opinion could be formed of the weather powers of the boats, but it was evident the Mystery was overmanned, and that the Sea Nymph had a strange-looking topsail. Had almost omitted to state that the Marquis of Anglesey accompanied the match in a very pretty little steam-boat, propelled on the locomotive principle."

SUICIDE OF LORD CONGLETON.

It is our painful duty this day to announce the melancholy suicide of Baron Congleton, better known as Sir Henry Parnell. His lordship committed the act of self-destruction by hanging himself with silk pocket-handkerchief in his bed-chamber, and was yesterday discovered by his eldest son, the Hon. Mr. Parnell, about ten o'clock in the morning, at which time life was quite extinct. The late unfortunate nobleman, we understand, was taken unwell in the beginning of last April, since which time a marked change has been noticed in his conduct and habits, but nothing to lead to any idea that he contemplated self-destruction. On last Monday week his lordship removed from his residence, No. 19, Chester-street, Grosvenor-place, where he had resided for some years, to No. 43, Cadogan place. The above are all the particulars we have hitherto been able to obtain. An inquest on the body will be held at the late deceased nobleman's residence, in Cadogan-place, this afternoon. It was intimated by the servants that orders would be given only to admit one reporter, but we should think the Coroner will not consent to such an arrangement. [See Latest Intelligence

The deceased, Henry Brooke Parnell, Lord Congleton, who was raised to the peerage by the Melbourne Ministry, in 1841, was the second son of Sir John Parnell, Bart., by the second daughter and co-heir of the Right Hon. Sir Arthur Brooke, Bart. He was born in 1776, and was, consequently, 66 years of age. He married, in 1801, the eldest daughter of the first Earl of Portarlington, by whom he has left a son, the Hon. John Parnell (now Lord Congleton), and five other children. His late lordship succeeded his eldest brother to the baronetcy in 1812. He was chairman of the Finance Committee in 1827. In 1833, he was appointed a member of the Excise Inquiry Commission, and filled the post of Secretary at War in 1831. In April, 1835, he was appointed Paymaster-General of the Forces, and Treasurer of the Ordnance and the Navy, which offices he continued to hold until June, 1841. He represented Queen's County in Parliament from 1805 to 1832, and Dundalk from the latter period till 1841. His lordship was author of a well-known work on financial reform, and of a great number of pamphlets on currency and banking; also of a work upon roads and road-making.

PARTICULARS OF THE MURDER OF SIR A. BURNES.

(From the Bombay Times)

Subjoined will be found a melancholy narrative, the only trustworthy one very probably we shall ever have, of the murder of Sir Alexander Burnes, furnished by a native servant, who witnessed in person the matter he professes to describe. It has every appearance of truthfulness; and for our own part we have no hesitation in attaching to it the full credence.

DEPOSITION OF LOOLIE SHAH.

"Sir Alexander Burnes was duly informed by his Afghan servants the day previous to his murder, that there was a stir in the city, and that, if he remained in it, his life would be in danger; they told him he had better go to the cantonments: this he declined doing giving as his reason, that the Afghans never received any injury from him, but, on the contrary, he had done much for them, and that he was quite sure they would never injure him.

"On the day of the murder, as early as three o'clock in the morning, a Co-sid (Wullee Mahomed) came to me: I was then duty outside; he said 'Go and inform your master immediately that there is a tumult in the city, and that the merchants are removing their goods and valuables from the shops.' I knew not what my master had said on this subject the day before, so did not like awakening him, but put on my chupras and went into the chaubuk; here I met the Wuzeer Nuzamut Dowlah coming towards my master's house; I immediately returned with him, and on our arrival awoke him, when my master dressed quickly, and went to the Wuzeer and talked with him some time. The Wuzeer endeavoured to induce him to go immediately into the cantonments, assuring him it was not safe to remain in the city; he, however, persisted in remaining, saying 'If I go, the Afghans will say I was afraid, and run away;' he, however, sent a note to Sir W. M'Naghten, by Wullee Mahomed. A Cossid came from the king to call the Wuzeer, who asked and obtained permission to go; at the door, the Wuzeer said to Sir Alexander, 'Why, you see already that some of Ameer Oolah Khan's people have collected to attack you: if you will allow me I will disperse them?' He (Sir A. Burnes said, 'No, I will not,' and sent for you; go to him without delay.' The Wuzeer hastily mounted his horse and went away. The house doors were then closed, and were in a little while surrounded by Ameer Oolah Khan and his people. Hyder Khan, the Kotwal of the city, whom Sir A. Burnes had turned out of office, brought fuel from the bazaars on the opposite side of the street, and set fire to the gates. The Wuzeer soon returned from the Bala Hissar with one of the king's pultuns seeing the gates on fire, and the immense crowd about, he took it apparently for granted that Sir A. Burnes had either escaped or been destroyed, and withdrew the regiment. At this time the whole mob was collected and the house in flames. The Jemidar of Chuprasses told Sir A. Burnes that there was a report of a regiment having come to assist him; and he was going up to the top of the house to look, and had got half-way, when he met an Affghan, who said he had been looking about, and that there was not the least sign of a regiment; my master then turned back, and remarked there was no chance of assistance coming either from cantonments or the king. A Mussulman, a Cashmeeree, came forward and said, 'If your brother and chuprassees cease firing on the mob, I swear by the Koran that I will take you safe through the kirkee of the garden to the chadoul, the fort of the Kuzzilbashes;' the firing ceased, and Sir Alexander Burnes agreed to accompany him, and, for the sake of disguise, put on a chogha and loongee. The moment he came out of the door a few paces with the Cashmeeree, this wretch called out, 'This is Sikundur Burnes!' He was rushed on by hundreds and cut to pieces with their knives. His brother, Captain Burnes, went out with him, and was killed dead before Sir Alexander. Captain Broadfoot was shot some time before in the house, and expired in half an hour. There was a guard of one Havildar, one Naik, and twelve Sepahis; they were all killed early in the affair; all the Hindoostanees, except myself, were killed; his Sirdar bearer, who is now with me, escaped, as he was at home; I got away by having an Affghan dress; all the Affghan servants deserted; I got into cantonments after being hid two days in a shop. Sir Alexander forbad the Sepoys and others firing on the people until they set fire to the gates."

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE AFFGHAN WAR.

Upon our first page will be found an article upon the subject of the progress of our Indian affairs, with a spirited engraving of the storming of the Khyber Pass. Elsewhere too we have given an elaborate map of the seat of our Affghan warfare, and under the heading of "Affairs of the East," will be found all the intelligence brought by the overland mail, given with such fulness of detail as its importance seemed to demand. We have now the pleasure to place before our readers a few general illustrations, such as cannot fail, we hope, of swelling the tide of public interest which has already set in upon all that concerns the success of our arms in Affghanistan, while they may also throw some light upon the nature of the country in which we have to wage our war, and upon the manners and personnel of those fierce barbarian tribes which have rolled down upon our devoted soldiery the wild flood of their treachery and revenge—made murder the password of their chiefs and fanatics, and deluged their mountain passes with rivers of English blood. It is a matter of pride with us, however, that the first subject we have to lay before our readers should be also the scene of the first retribution and triumph which our soldiers have achieved since so many of their officers and comrades were massacred in cold blood after the abandonment, first, of Cabul, and subsequently, as it appears to us, with less necessity, of Ghuznee. This scene is no other than the celebrated Khyber Pass, one of the most famous keys to future victory, and a formidable barrier in the way of our success, which the gallantry of our army has stormed and taken in the dashing spirit of our olden triumphs and renown.

In a notice in Blackwood's Magazine of "Fane's Five Years in India," there is given a description of this celebrated pass, which is sufficiently graphic to serve all our purposes of illustration. Speaking of the tourists through the Affghan country, the reviewer thus takes up the thread of his traveller's adventures:—

They at length arrived at Jellalabad, which they found a "small and filthily dirty place," situated in a very rich valley. But its chief consequence then arose from its having previously been the residence of Mahommed Akhbar Khan, governor of the place and son of Dost Mahommed, now become infamously known by the perfidious murder of Sir William M'Naghten, and the detestable and malignant insults offered to his remains. He had been the defender of the Khyber Pass against the troops of Runjeet Sing. From its being much warmer than the high plains of Affghanistan, it was the resort in winter of the chief people of the country as a winter residence, and was at this period fixed upon as a principal winter station for the British forces. The whole country forms a species of Indian Switzerland, in the extreme diversity of its surface, and in the rapid differences of temperature between the mountains and the valleys. About twenty miles from the town they arrived at Chardah, the spot where the heads of the three great passes into Affghanistan unite, and where Mahommed Akhbar usually took up his position to watch the Sheiks, until he fled on the fall of Ghuznee.

Their next movement brought them to the mouth of the celebrated Khyber Pass, the "northern gate of India." From their camp on the river bank, they moved across a barren shingly plain for a couple of miles, and then entered the pass, two mountains rising on either side to a height of 2000 feet, with a gorge for the road of about 100 feet. Beyond this the pass opens out to about a quarter of a mile, which continues, with slight variations, for about eight miles over a tolerably good road, "and then begins the work." At this spot, where a strong British picket was posted, they ascended the very steep side of the mountain on a road cut out of the solid rock. This continued about 12 feet wide for three quarters of a mile, during which the ascent was nearly 2000 feet. It had been till lately almost impracticable; but had just then been got into tolerable order. After getting up this worst part, the road continued much the same, though not ascending, for three quarters of a mile, in which there were two short but very steep ascents, which brought them to a stockade, and a strong party of our irregulars, posted to defend this end of the pass. The whole length of this difficult portion was about thirteen miles. "To say that this pass is bad," observes the writer, "is far too mild a word. I never contemplated anything at all to be compared to its strength; and I can only say, that if a position is wanted to depend on, this spot would be totally impregnable if defended by Europeans." But the pass still continued as far as Ali Musjid, a fort on the summit of a mountain, and the place where, from its command of the whole Khyber, the chiefs levied their passage-money on all travellers. The road was still wild and difficult for three miles more. "At first up and down the rocky mountains, and then along a pathway on the side of one, about three feet wide, which at length led down to a dry nullah, leading out into the plain of Peshawur, so that at last we have got into the plains, and away from those cursed mountains."

KHYBER PASS.

MOHAMED AKHBAR KHAN.

This remarkable but infamous chief is the favourite son of [illegible] Mahomed, whom we dethroned for Shah Soojah, and who is now held in British captivity. He was formerly under his father's reign in Affghanistan, the governor of Jellalabad, and commanded the Khyber Pass, as described in Blackwood, against the forces of his father's enemy. He has lately made for himself a dark notoriety by the appalling and treacherous murder of Sir William M'Naghten, when that unhappy victim of his malignity was secure in his reliance upon the usages of honourable warfare, and did not contemplate a breach of that law of confidence which even savages have held sacred, even from the reckless vengeance and mad barbarianism of the tribes of Affghanistan. But since the commission of that enormous crime, Akhbar Khan has risen high in the estimation of his followers—has become their chief of blood, and gained the wild approval of his sympathising people, by the mean and devilish cowardice and ferocity of a deed which has won him the horror and execration of every civilized community in which its atrocious perpetration has become known. There appears nothing in the countenance of this inhuman fiend to shadow forth the inherent blackness of his heart. On the contrary, his appearance is bold, martial, and manly, and would seem to indicate far other qualities than those which have made his name a landmark, rather of detestation than of dread. The wound, however, which he has received, may, it seems, yet influence his destiny, and bring him within the pale of justice; for, in the able correspondence of the Times, we find the following significant proposition reported as of not unlikely occurrence:—

PORTRAIT OF AKHBAR KHAN.

"It is not unlikely that Akhbar Khan, who has supplied the newspapers for subjects of perpetual quarrel during the past month, may, in consequence of his wound, give himself up, and take his chance of being hung. Nothing to disprove his guilt has appeared during the month; but, on the contrary, two or three eye-witnesses of the deed have appeared, who declare most positively that he shot the envoy with a double-barrelled pistol. His defenders are not the less amusingly pertinacious for all this. How much have we yet to learn of sickening detail, which the release of the captives alone can supply us with! Another month may effect this most longed-for event, and till then your public must further exert its patience."

But, leaving this unworthy chief to his destiny, whatever it be, we now turn the attention of our readers to an interesting and picturesque representation of an Affghan encampment.

To these illustrations we now add a few notices of the geography, inhabitants, and climate of the Affghan territory, interspersing, among our paragraphs, one or two graphic and characteristic engravings.

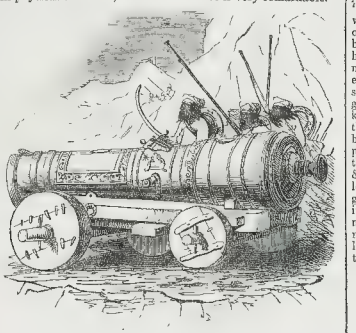
The Afghans.—The Affghans call themselves Pushtaneh, and are termed by the Indians, Patans. Affghan is the name by which they are known to the Persians, and through them to Europeans. Their speech is the Pushtu, a dialect derived from the ancient Zend, and therefore a sister language of the Persian. It has still some marks of near relationship to the idiom of the Kurds. The Affghans inhabit the mountainous region to the northward of the low country of the Punjab, or the plain of the Indus. Their proper country is the southern declivity of the great chain of Hindu Kush, the western continuation of Himalaya and the Paropamisan range: it includes, also, the chain of Soliman, and the table-land to the westward of it. The Affghans are a rude and warlike people, and are distinguished by their manners and language, as well from the Persians as from the natives of India.

A DURANEE ARMED.

The climate of Affghanistan is one of the most delightful in the world. It is dry, as we are informed by Mr. Elphinstone, and the average temperature greater than that of England; the extremes of heat and cold being greater. According to Sir Alexander Burnes, it produces the fruits of England and Southern Europe, and the groves are stocked with our singing-birds, nightingales, blackbirds, thrushes, and doves. The pears and apples of Cabul are celebrated, and the seasons are said to be there delightful. Cabul itself is more than 6000 feet above the level of the sea. The eastern parts of Affghanistan consist of plains intersected by abrupt chains of hills; the western, chiefly of downs and table-lands, in many parts bleak and cold. In such a country we might expect to find the people very different from the natives of Southern Hindostan. We are informed that the Affghan men are of robust make, being strong and muscular, with high noses and prominent cheek-bones, and long faces. Their hair and beards are mostly black, sometimes brown, but rarely red. Mr. Elphinstone says, that the eastern Affghans have generally "dark complexions, approaching to that of the Hindustanees;" while those of the west are of lighter colour, with an appearance of health; but among them, he says, as among the eastern Affghans, men as dark as the Indians, and others as fair as Europeans, are to be met with in the same neighbourhood; the fair being the most common in the west, and the dark in the east. In describing a tribe of Affghans near Dera, the same writer says, "The number of children was incredible; they were mostly fair and handsome. The girls have aquiline noses, fine faces, Jewish features. The men were generally dark, though some were quite fair." The Affghans are divided into a great number of tribes or clans. The Durani are at present the dominant clan, as the Eusofzyi are said to have been in earlier times; the Khyberi and Ghilji are also powerful tribes.

DURANEE SHEPHERDS.

Duranee Peasants.—Though one nation, and little mixed with foreigners, the Affghans differ much among themselves in physical character, and the difference is very remarkable.



AFFGHAN GUN.

The Baluchi and Brahui.—The Baluchi are a very numerous people, of simple pastoral life, dwelling under ghedane, or tents, made of black felt and spread over a wicker frame, with which they wander with their flocks over the vast upland of Kelat, and inhabit most of that great region of eastern Persia which is included between Affghanistan to the north and the Indian Ocean to the south, reaching westward from the Indus to the great Salt Desert. They are a race of Persian Iliahs, and speak a dialect of the Persian language.

The Baluchi are still a tall, handsome race, with good features and expressive countenances; but those who dwell in the low plains near the Indus are of very dark colour. The Brahui, on the contrary, as Pottinger informs us, have short thick bodies, with round faces and flat features, and very many of them have brown hair and beards.

The Khurds.—Kurdistan, or the land of the Khurds, is the high mountainous tract, intersected by deep valleys, which lies between the great Upland or Plateau of Persia and the plains of Mesopotamia. Kurdistan may be considered as extending from the neighbourhood of the great lakes Urmiyah and Van, southward to the borders of Luristan. Its inhabitants are partly Christians, ancient emigrants from Syria, whence they were exiled on account of their adherence to the Nestorian heresy, who speak the Syriac language; but chiefly semi-barbarous Moslemin, named Khurds, who are proved by their peculiar idiom to be a branch of the Arian race. They are divided into a great number of tribes, who differ from each other in language, and in degrees of barbarism or improvement.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

The Ascot Cup.—The subject which Mr. Cotterill has this year chosen to form the group denominated "The Ascot Cup," is in its design as complimentary to the royal patrons of these pleasant races as in execution it is perfect. Mr. Cotterill deservedly stands at the head of the class of artists who model for silversmiths, and his productions, annually exhibited at Messrs. Garrard's, in the Haymarket, have earned for that house a celebrity which no other can equal. We yesterday paid our accustomed visit to inspect the prize, prior to its removal to Windsor and the course, and were, as usual, highly gratified. Mr. Cotterill has selected a fine theme for the exercise of his art—an incident of the Battle of Crecy, when the banner of the gallant King of Bohemia was laid by the Earl of Warwick at the feet of the victorious Black Prince, as a trophy of that glorious field—a trophy which to this day forms the crest of the heir apparent to the British crown. The group is thus constituted:—The Black Prince, in full armour, with his vizor raised, and in an attitude of lofty repose after the tumult of the fight, is seated upon a noble destrier, the energy of whose action contrasts finely with the calm bearing of his rider; the Earl of Warwick is on foot, but, like the prince, armed cap-à-pied, and bending forward, lowers in the dust the banner of "blind Bohemia," bearing on it three plumes of ostrich feathers, with the motto, "Ich dien;" a page, kneeling and unbonneted, on the opposite side, completes the group. Mr. Cotterill has been successful in every point of view, but his greatest force has been thrown into the magnificent horse, which supplies the motive of the work. His form is perfect, uniting vigour with elegance, and suggesting at once the idea of strength with speed. The figure of Edward is also extremely noble, and grace and beauty are strikingly shown in the attitude of the kneeling page. The minor details are exquisitely finished, and the contrast between the golden ornaments and weapons—the baldrie, the shield, the sword, the dagger of mercy, the trappings of the steed, &c., the burnished silver, which imitates the plate armour, and the frosted silver forming the camail, &c., produce a remarkably fine effect. It requires no knowledge of costume, nor interest in the story, to admire such a group, and the rough Yorkshireman, whom we saw looking at it, and pronouncing the horse "a varry pratty one," said as much in its favour as the virtuoso by his side, who delivered a more elaborate opinion. The former would, it is true, "as lief see t' money;" but if he wins the prize he has, at any rate, the satisfaction of knowing that he has got his money's worth,

THE ASCOT CUP.

for fortunately there is no lack of taste to patronise works of art of the high order of those of Mr. Cotterill. Mr. Orde must congratulate himself on having secured such a trophy, the proudest, amongst the many, won by his extraordinary and gallant "Becswing."

Ascot Races.—Tuesday.

Fair weather and the Queen! At precisely a quarter to one o'clock the approach in the distance of her Majesty was signalled, and in two or three minutes more the royal cortège entered upon the heath, and progressed at a slow trot up the racecourse. Immediately the scarlet liveries of the outriders, headed by Lord Rosslyn, the noble Master of the Buckhounds, were seen, the sides of the course became thronged, and as soon as her Majesty came within hearing, she was hailed by them with loud and continued affectionate acclamations. At this time the balcony of the Grand Stand presented an animated assemblage of beauty, and on the sloping sward beneath it thronged the élite of the male population of this country. When her Majesty's carriage came opposite to them, every hat was in the air, and every lady's handkerchief was agitated on high—these glad gestures being accompanied with chanticleer cries of exultation. That they touched her Majesty's generous heart, and that of her princely consort, was evident from the something more than courtesy with which they were acknowledged.

When her Majesty and Prince Albert appeared at the windows of the Royal Stand, a vast concourse of all classes assembled in front, and the dignified obeisances of the royal couple were loyally and gratefully acknowledged by strong and spontaneous cheering.

The royal cortège consisted of seven open carriages and two pony phaetons and four, each whirled along by four beautiful animals. The course was not crowded, but the company were exceedingly select.

Immediately after the race for the Gold Vase her Majesty and suite departed in the same order as they arrived. The farewell that followed her Majesty was most cordial. Her Majesty looked well, and her attire was thoroughly "simplex munditiis."

We open our account of the races with a portion of the sparkling letter of "Craven," the accomplished editor of the Sporting Review, and now the turf oracle of the Herald, as is the well-known "Judex," of the Morning Post. By-and-by, we presume, we may encounter a prophet of our own; but, in the meanwhile, the pleasant scribble of our friend "Craven" comes ready to our hand, and, independent of its anticipations of the "Cup day," at the auspicious dawn of which we are now writing, gives a spirited gossip about Wednesday's sport.

"Tuesday, it has been truly said, was a brilliant and a glorious commencement of this imperial meeting. As a rural sight it was a gorgeous spectacle; and though it came for sport miserably did not return without accomplishing their errand. Yesterday, though the attendance was more limited, the racing was excellent. Iole walked over for the Swinley, from which I was induced to persuade that Pharmacopœia was not able even to walk, neither Gobbo capable of standing. The Coronation Stakes brought out Lord Exeter's Amima filly and Dilbar, a match which the former won cleverly the latter certainly not in her form. She looked half a stone worse, in my opinion, than at Epsom. The Sweepstakes of 100 sovs. each for three-year-old colts mustered a field of four. Auckland booked safe to win. Robinson, on Barrier, went away with the lead, and kept in front as long as he could; but once in the straight round the hill favourite took his place, and it was pounds to pence on him. Just between the stand and the chair, however, Jim caught hold of his horse, gave him an intimation of the whalebone that would have ravished the stone courser in Charing-cross, and landed him first on the post by a head. Ah, that head! how many a race doth it win that is denied to the swift. I mean no reflection on Darling, who jockeyed Auckland, as a good and honest servant, but he cannot ride like "our Jim." I am aware that Lord Westminster wished Robinson to have ridden Auckland, but a previous engagement made it impossible: had he been on him the result would have been different; it was one of those events in which the rider wins and not the steed. The Fifty Pound Plate induced nine to try their luck, and a splendid struggle it was, ending in a dead heat between Dromedary and Mr. Wreford's Escape filly. Howlett's riding on the latter was a thing that a twenty-stone man might have walked, even yesterday, twenty miles to see, and have been well repaid for his trouble. For the Queen's Hundred three came to the post, Satirist, for choice, at all sorts of odds. Ajax, against whom they would have laid anything, came away at scores—beat his horses for speed and bottom, was never caught—and won as he pleased! An indifferent plater, trained by a most rustic-looking yeoman—his owner—comes out at 20 to 1 against him—and beats the winner of the Leger in a canter.

"Doesit become apparent how all this past is germane to my purpose, which is to deal with the future? Of the various items in the catalogue of to-day's sport, there is but one upon which speculation has its eye. Of the eight races in the list, the Cup alone is looked forward to with interest; upon it only has any public betting been done; let us examine it by 'the light of other days.' For the Gold Cup to be run for to-day there is an entry of 11; of these five only will start; viz., Beeswing, St. Francis, Sir Hercules, the Nob, and Lanercost. The latter has been backed freely against the field; though towards the close of the running yesterday he had given way, and 6 to 4 was laid against him. Fired, then, of him. I have Scott's assurance that he never was better nor more fit to run; he is an honest, true-hearted horse—well in—the field neither formidable in numbers, nor very dangerously so in competitors, but ——— Now for the 'buts.' Lanercost is one of those nags that require a good deal of riding—his jockey is Templeman has Templeman power enough to bring him over two miles and a half of ground? And that ground hard as a hearth-stone—will his legs like it? Can they bear it? These odds are more than 6 to 4 against his winning.

"St. Francis that won the vase on Tuesday would appear to have nothing to beat but Lanercost, inasmuch as he, on that occasion, disposed of The Nob and Beeswing, and to-day Erngo, of course, will only go to make the running for him. But St. Francis, The Nob and Beeswing (to say nothing of Rosalind and Pannakeen) were all of a lump, and that looks bad. It is not promising, certainly—but, on Tuesday, The Nob carried 9st., to-day his weight is 8st 5lb. On Tuesday Beeswing carried 9st 4lb.; to-day she carries 8st., which leaves the Nob a balance of 5lbs. in his favour. The weights, in short, for the Cup are on the side of the young division. Beeswing, they tell me, is shaped as if so her Tuesday's race will do her less harm—good could not come to a bromze horse from galloping on Ascot Heath as it now is. To bring all this speculation to a close, I cannot but look upon the field as the safer investment to-day. Lanercost is not a pound better than Beeswing, unless one of the pair be altered in form. If he beats her, The Nob, and St. Francis, he will do more than I am disposed to give him credit for.

"CRAVEN."

We now give the technical details of the sports of the entire meeting.

The races were originally advertised to commence at half-past one o'clock, but in consequence of the number of horses that had arrived on Saturday, they were brought forward half-an-hour later. By this arrangement they should have terminated at half-past four; instead of this, notwithstanding one of them came to walk over, it was nearly six before the Ascot Derby was run. This delay compels us to be brief in our notice of the morning. The first race was

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, June.

Dear Mr. Editor, Nothing very important has transpired in our modes of late: fashions fluctuate under the cheerful influence of the season, and our ladies remain in anxious suspense for forthcoming novelties.

Bonnets will certainly retain during the summer the aerial shapes and colours with which they made their début; nevertheless our marchandes de modes have embellished them with ruches en tulle of a pale rose or blue colour, and, being sometimes shaded in lace, form a charming ensemble; the tie is fastened with long, loose, bewitching nœuds de rubans, en sultane.

Embroided muslins, in Brandebourg style, are very fashionable for dress; flowers and cameos will be much en vogue, they relieve the mousselines so beautifully.

For the hair the style of coiffure for the ball-dress is very becoming, especially the gaze ornées de glands arabes, but the guirlandes Josephine, if adapted to the complexion, are positively irresistible: I might also cite a variety of petites coiffures remarkably classic, most of them constructed of coloured ribbons, or velvets, which are likewise very pretty on account of their simplicity.

Scarfs, mantelets, and pelerines are still to be seen in the most fashionable resorts, and almost in endless variety; but, on leaving the opera or the ball-room, or where the breeze freshens, the silk shawl ombrée, trimmed with black lace, offers the most commodious envelope ever invented for the pearly shoulders over which it is cast.

Au plaisir, Monsieur, JULIE.

Mr. Henry Wallack has taken the Canterbury circuit for a short period, and opens at Tunbridge Wells this month.

GRAVESEND.—Mr. Freer intends opening this theatre in July. We wish him every success.

THE BELLES LETTRES.

We have many topics to discuss for our readers in nearly every branch of Literature, Science, Music, the Drama, and the Fine Arts. In each of these departments, however (with the single exception of a notice of Knowles's new play), we have once more to compromise with necessity, and forego the pleasure of holding original communication with the public, on account of the privilege of precedence which is claimed by actual news. In order to present to our readers full and copious intelligence and illustrations of our affairs in Afghanistan—to elucidate the musical system of education, by which Government propose to extend the civilization of the humbler community—to propound to the public the noise, the life, the spirit, the sport, and the enjoyment of the race-course—to prompt, or rather to second, the loyalty of her attached subjects, by announcing the continued presence of our Sovereign before her people—to sum up the proceedings of a week, eventful alike in foreign intelligence and domestic legislation—in order, we repeat, to effect with point only half the objects with which our ambition would wish to crown the completeness of this journal, we have been obliged to make original papers subservient to news—to delay notices of several important books—to exclude from our department of Fine Arts, a finished specimen of one of the most admired schools of the Continent, as well as prepared criticisms of our own—and, in short, to limit even our theatrical review to the one "great feature" of the week—the production of the new drama, which has been crowned at the Haymarket Theatre with so much success. Next week, when the claims of public intelligence will not be so strong upon us, we shall be found to redeem all our promises upon the score of literature.

THE DRAMA.

MR. KNOWLES'S NEW PLAY.

Mr. Sheridan Knowles has added another leaf to his chaplet of bays, and one which, if the general and enthusiastic applauses of as good an audience as ever filled the walls of the Haymarket Theatre, as was the case on Saturday last, be a criterion to judge by, will wear as well and as long as any preceding sprig in his poetic crown.

The plot of the "Rose of Arragon," a "Play," as it is somewhat quaintly called in the bills, has little complexity or involution of incident, and runs thus:—

The Prince Alonzo sees, at a tournament, Olivia, the daughter of a peasant, whose charms of mind and person have obtained her the designation which gives a title to the piece. At the opening of the play he has married her, but the King, his father, annoyed at the mesalliance, orders his son off to the army in the midst of the honeymoon, and avails himself of the opportunity afforded by his absence to annul the marriage. This last outrage upon the rights of the free Arragonese, added to preceding encroachments on their liberties, is the feather which breaks the camel's back; an émeute takes place, headed by Alasco, the Princess's peasant brother, and his ci-devant friend Almagro, a rejected petitioner for Olivia's hand. The revolt is successful; and the King, on the point of being massacred, is saved by the self-devotion of the repudiated daughter-in-law and the heroism of her brother, a hot and impetuous, but noble-minded youth, whose patriotism has no alloy of selfishness in it, and who, even in avenging his sister's injuries, looks rather to the redressing a public than a private wrong. Alasco, a person of altogether a different stamp, having made the popularity and disinterestedness of Alasco, a stepping-stone to his own advancement, and having at length induced the latter in the fulness of unsuspecting generosity, to raise him to the Regency in preference to the claims of his sister and himself, no sooner does he obtain power than he throws off the mask, despatches Alasco into honourable banishment on a distant command, and devotes his own energies, by fraud or force, to consummate his own marriage with Olivia. The murder of the Knez (one of the Council) but the captive monarch's escape is arranged by the daughter whom he had rejected, while the Prince's return in the disguise of a Moor, apparently devoted to Almagro, enables eventually to his bride's preservation. Alasco, too late aware of the perfidy of his false friend, escapes by a private passage and joins the King, whose life he had saved, now returning at the head of his troops. A second revolution takes place, but not before Rudolph, father to the "Rose of Arragon," is supposed to have expired on the rack, and she herself is in the hands of the pretended Moor, who holds the usurper's warrant for her destruction. Things are in this situation, when in the last scene Alasco, now in his turn triumphant, Almagro conducted into the dungeon of torture for a private conference; he recapitulates to him his own plain straightforward dealing through life, and the base return which his benefits have received in the destruction of all those dear to him, and ends by avowing to enemy the duello. The unsuspecting tempter of Alasco enables the deceiver once again to get the mastery over him, and to possess himself of both the swords: Almagro is about to complete his villainy by assassination, when the voices of his supposed victims, of Ruphino and Olivia, are heard calling on Alasco; his arm falls powerless, and before he can recover his energies, a subtle poison, which he had swallowed immediately on being taken prisoner, operates, and leaves him a corpse at the moment when the entry of the King cum suis, as the old play books have it, leaves nothing to be wished for as far as regards a happy denouement.

This last incident, indeed, londly as poetical justice may call for it, is the principal defect of the piece; that Almagro, who shows himself throughout as arrant "a cur" as ever yelped, and who shirks a combat even when he knows he has not many moments to live, should have ever had "pluck enough" to take the "dring," smacks somewhat of inconsistency; but amidst so much beauty of diction, and such deep interest of character and situation, he must be a hypercritic indeed who would not say, with one of the most candid of his class—

> Ubi plura nitent, non ego paucis
> Offendar maculis.

Thus far we have spoken only of the author; but it would be gross injustice to the talent of no inferior grade, not to say that the fine conception of the poet—the generous, high-spirited, disinterested, affectionate, but proud and impetuous Spaniard could never have been more ably delineated in action than by Mr. Kean, who, from his first entrance on the scene to the last fall of the curtain, was a fine impersonation of all the qualities alluded to, and whose admirable acting might well have rendered popular a far inferior play. His scene with Almagro, in the third act, in which the first glimmering of doubt of his friend's sincerity begins to dawn upon him, and the fine contrast exhibited between his own expenses and that friend's duplicity, was one of the most delicate and masterly, if not the most applauded of his efforts; and the change when his native sense I to have undergone its full growth at length convinced, in spite of himself, of the worthlessness of his idol, was a masterpeece of histrionic art.

Mrs. Kean was an admirable Olivia, and rarely have we seen the truth, tenderness, and self-devotion of woman triumphing over her constitutional timidity so ably and effectively portrayed. Mr. Phelps was a good Almagro, occasionally, perhaps, a little too much in "Leicester," but it was a meritorious performance, and must raise him in public estimation. It is unnecessary to add that the success of the play was complete.

The very enthusiastic approbation with which it was received throughout, was owing not merely to the graces of diction the fervid eloquence of expression, for which Mr. Knowles is distinguished—or the striking character of some of its incidents and positions, but equally so to the very effective manner in which these incidents and positions were placed before the audience. We believe that the rôle of Mr. Kean in this drama is the first original part of any consequence in which he has had an opportunity of appearing. He has, therefore, appeared not only to have taken more pains with his own character, but has laboured—and with complete success—to render the entire representation of the piece as perfect as possible.

SURREY THEATRE.—The horses shortly leave this establishment, as their engagements will terminate in about a fortnight, when they will be succeeded by Miss Romer, Mr. Templeton, &c., who will play in a series of operas. George Stansbury is engaged to superintend the musical department; and, we doubt not, they will be produced in a manner worthy the patronage of the lovers of harmony.

STRAND THEATRE.—Mr. Hall is very busy making a great variety for the public; several revivals are mentioned as about to be produced, and new pieces are in a state of forwardness from the pens of Messrs. Oxenford, Moncrieff, and Leman Rede. Mr. Hall expects an extension of license this year, and he will really need it to produce all the novelty he intends, as the success of the pieces produced at this theatre generally procures them a long run.

PROVINCIAL.

Hooper, the manager of the York circuit, is in town. We presume he is in search of novelty for the amusement of his friends in the north.

NORWICH.—We hear the manager is about to make a vacation in this circuit for a short period.

Yates, of the Adelphi, has been so ill in Dublin that he was not expected to live, but we are happy to say, the last account of him informs us that he is much better. Should anything fatal happen to him it would be an irreparable loss to the theatre of which he is so able a manager, and so great an ornament as an actor.

MUSIC

MISS ADELAIDE KEMBLE.—Rumours have been bruited about for the last few days, that Miss Adelaide Kemble was on the point of closing her professional life immediately, being engaged to be married to a gentleman of a highly respectable family connexion We have it from the best authority, that Miss Kemble has consented to fulfil all the engagements which she has entered into, both in town and country, and that she will, in all probability, appear for one season more at Covent-garden, before she retires from a profession which her eminent talents, both as a singer and an actress, have so much adorned. Post.

On the occasion of Mr. Wilson's lecture on Scottish Music on Monday last, the reserved seats in the orchestra were occupied by the boys of the Caledonian School, attired in Highland costume, with the Rev. John Lees, the superintendent of the school. Sir Augustus D'Este, the Chisholm, Robert M'William, Esq., and other distinguished and active friends of the institution were present.

M. Thalberg had lately the honour of performing at Buckingham Palace to her Majesty and a small party of four, one of his extraordinary compositions on the pianoforte; the Queen and Prince Albert sat on each side of the instrument, and were pleased to express themselves quite delighted. Thalberg will perform at the seventh Philharmonic Concert on Monday next, when Mendelssohn's new symphony will be played, under the direction of the composer.

[On this occasion we shall offer special criticism of the performance, and may indulge in some general remarks upon the present constitution and management of the Philharmonic Society. ED. I. L. N.]

The Philharmonic Society wished to have given a performance of vocal and instrumental music on a most extensive scale at Exeter-hall, but we hear that the directors cannot procure the use of it for the intended purpose.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS

(Sittings in Banco.)

BORRADAILE V. HUNTER AND OTHERS.

This action was tried at the London sittings after last Michaelmas Term, before Mr. Justice Erskine and a special jury, and was brought by the widow of the Rev. Mr. Borradaile, the late vicar of Woadsworth, to recover £1000, the amount of a policy of insurance effected on the life of the rev. gentleman at the London Life Association. The claim was resisted on the ground that the insured had committed suicide by throwing himself into the Thames, and had thereby vitiated the policy, one of the conditions of which was that it should be void if the insured died by "his own hand." It was contended on the part of the plaintiff that the rev. deceased had not died by "his own hand," inasmuch as at the time of committing the act he was in a state of insanity, unable to distinguish right from wrong, and therefore not responsible for his conduct. Evidence was put to prove the manner in which the deceased had come to his death, and also the state of mind of the deceased prior to the event taking place, the witnesses for the plaintiff proving facts to show insanity, and those for the defendants to prove that the deceased, although suffering in mind, was not insane, but capable of distinguishing right from wrong, and that he committed the act with the intention of destroying life. The learned judge left it to the jury to say whether the deceased was insane at the time of throwing himself into the water, as if he was, notwithstanding the express condition of the policy, the policy was not void, as an insane person was an irresponsible agent, but if, on the other hand, insanity was not sufficiently proved, then they would find a verdict for the defendants. The jury, after some time, found a verdict to the following effect:—"That the deceased threw himself into the Thames with the intent to destroy life, being unable at the time to distinguish right from wrong." It was then arranged that on that finding the verdict should be entered for the defendants, leave being given to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for her, in order that the Court might decide whether the finding of the jury was tantamount to a verdict of insanity. Sir Thomas Wilde subsequently obtained a rule nisi, and

Mr. Sergeant Channell now showed cause against the rule, and contended that the finding of the jury was such as to show that the Rev. Mr. Borrodaile, at the time he committed the act, intended to destroy his life, and thereby he had vitiated the terms of the policy. The verdict of the jury, therefore, brought the case within the policy, and justified the defendants in resisting the claim on behalf of the association.

Sir T. Wilde, in supporting the rule, contended it was perfectly clear that it was intended and understood, both by the party effecting the policy and the insurance office, that the policy should afford protection against death resulting from disease, directly or indirectly; and the most correct mode of looking at this question would be to consider what was meant by the word "intention" as applied to the subject. The only intention that the law recognised was controllable intention. There was no doubt that in cases of somnambulism, where the parties rose from their beds, dressed themselves, unlocked their doors, and went out and performed various acts, intention existed in a certain sense; but it was not a controllable intention, or such as could form the basis of any legal process. The object of the assured, and indeed of the assurance office, was to afford protection in the event of death from causes which he could not control. It had been admitted that in a criminal proceeding the verdict would be tantamount to an acquittal, and he (Sir T. Wilde) should contend that a man who caused his death while in a state of insanity, non compos mentis, had, in point of law, no intention.

Mr. Richards followed on the same side.

The Court took time to consider its judgment.

PREROGATIVE COURT, JUNE 6.

MACKENZIE AGAINST YEO.

Sir H. Jenner Fust delivered his sentence in this case, which was argued at great length, and occupied days some time back. The deceased in the cause was Thomas Yeo Tucker, a gentleman of fortune, who resided in Devonshire-place. He died on the 7th of July, 1838, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, whence his remains were brought and interred at his seat in this country. He was unmarried, and his nearest relation was Dr. Yeo, a cousin german, for whom he appeared to have entertained a very sincere regard and affection. He left personal property of the value of £2,000, and a real estate of about £1,000, a year, subject to certain encumbrances. He made his will in 1830, and by it he gave a considerably number of legacies charged upon his real estate, including an annuity of £200, to his stepmother, and the residue of his real estate to his cousin, Dr. Yeo, (who died without), bequeathing the residue to his brother, Dr. Yeo, and his personal estate to Dr. Yeo, whom he appointed his sole executor. Probate of this will was granted to Dr. Yeo on the 27th of August, 1839, and this probate remained unquestioned till December, 1839, when a codicil was produced, of which the executor was called upon to take probate, and which purported to have been executed by the deceased on the 6th of July, 1838. This paper gave to Ann Melton £5000, in consideration of the injury she had sustained from the false and calumnious reports circulated by him (the deceased) to her prejudice; and it bore the signature of the deceased and the signatures of two attesting witnesses, named Mackenzie and Lake. Since the date of the codicil (as above), Mr. Mackenzie had married Miss Melton, and consequently had rendered himself incompetent to give evidence in support of the codicil. The cod[illegible] united to be in the handwriting of the legatee, with the exception of the signature and the first two words, "This is," which were pleaded by the party setting up the paper to be the handwriting of the testator. The learned judge went at very great length through the circumstantial evidence, showing the utter improbability that the testator should have executed such a codicil, or, if he had made it, that he should have concealed it from the knowledge of his friends and attorneys, to whom he was in the habit of speaking with so much resentment of the conduct of the parties. The court was not called upon to decide whether this was or was not a case of forgery, conspiracy, and perjury; the parties setting up such a paper were required to establish it by sufficient proof, and as they had not done so, he pronounced against the validity of the paper, and looking to the manner in which the case had been brought forward, he condemned Mr. and Mrs. Mackenzie in the costs.

COURT OF REVIEW.—WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8.

EX-PARTE REYNAL AND OTHERS IN RE GYE AND HUGHES, THE LATE PROPRIETORS OF VAUXHALL GARDENS.

Mr Archibald, with Mr. Bacon, appeared for the petitioners, and Mr. Anderdon and Mr. Keene for the opponents.

This was a petition from Mr. Reynal and other creditors of the bankrupts, praying that an order of the commissioners to reduce the amount of their proofs might be rescinded, and that the petitioners' proofs upon the separate estates of the bankrupts might be restored to the same state in which they were before the order was made.

Mr. Archibald stated the facts in the petition. In February, 1825, the petitioners lent Messrs. Gye and Hughes £7000 to enable them to purchase Vauxhall Gardens, for which sum the latter agreed to give a post and separate bond and a mortgage on the gardens. The deed was executed in November, 1826. Upon the 28th of November another sum of £7000 was advanced upon a like security, and subsequently a sum of £8000 for the same purpose and under similar security, making in all a sum of £22,000. In the latter end of 1838, £7000 was repaid, thus reducing the debt to £21,000. Subject to the mortgage, Gye and Hughes held the Royal Gardens at Vauxhall. In May, 1840, separate bills were sued out against the same gentlemen, and in June following a joint flat was issued. The petitioners then took steps to secure the benefit of the property in satisfaction of their debts in the usual manner. The assignees contested their right to the property. A reference was made to the commissioners, who decided in favour of the mortgagees. The gardens were then sold by auction in September, 1841, for the sum of £20,300, and £1000 for the machinery. A deposit for the sum of £2020, being ten per cent. on the purchase money, was lodged with the auctioneer, but the petitioners had received no part of it as yet, and they now prayed to be permitted to prove for the full amount of their debts against the separate estates of the two bankrupts, and that the order of the commissioner to reduce their claim under these heads might be rescinded.

His Honour said, that if they meant to insist on having a full proof, they must apply to the court [illegible]

Mr. Archibald said they were about to apply for leave to amend the prayer of the petition to that effect; but the simple question was whether they had a right to prove for the whole amount.

The arguments of the learned counsel on both sides as to these points being concluded,

His Honour said that in this case the petitioners were mortgagees of the estate of Vauxhall Gardens, for a debt of £21,000. The mortgagees two years ago applied to the court for a sale of the premises and leave to prove for the deficiency, which being granted, the estate was sold and purchased by one of the parties who obtained the order, and there was now realised £20,000, which is appropriated to the payment of the debt of £21,000, so that in all reason and conscience £1000 only was due. But they said, "No, we won't touch that, we will go in and prove before the commissioner for £21,000," alleging that to be the amount of their debt, which was contrary to the fact. They were, however, admitted, but the attention of the commissioner being called to the circumstances, and also the order of the court, that they should prove only for the deficiency, he conceived that it was his duty to rescind the order, and reduce the original amount of the petitioners' proof to the deficiency only, and they now come there two years after the estate had been sold in satisfaction of their own debt, and desire the court to allow them to swear that their debt is £21,000, and that therefore the commissioner did on reconsideration was erroneous; but the court declared that what the commissioner did first was erroneous, and that his second order was correct. And, considering that there was no ground for this application, the petition would be dismissed with costs.

APPEAL COURT, DOCTORS' COMMONS.

WOOD AND OTHERS V. GOODLAKE, FIELDS, AND OTHERS.

The last stage in the long-pending contest for the money of the rich Gloucester banker was reached on Tuesday, and the struggle, now the main point is decided, was carried on in the same vigour and animosity which has characterised every step of the proceedings. The bill of costs was offered for signature to this court (in which the formal business of the Prerogative Court is generally transacted) by the proctors for the several parties who have claimed either as heirs, or legatees, or executors under Mr. Wood. It will be remembered that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council pronounced in favour of the validity of the paper presented by Sir M. Wood and the other executors named therein, but directed the costs of all the parties to be paid out of the estate.—Mr. Bevkton, the proctor for Mr. Hitchens, who was admitted a next of kin of the deceased, but who has since died, presented his taxed bill of costs. The principal bill for the main cause amounted to £1341 1s. 11d., and there were three other bills, the first of which was £486 11s. 8d., the second £ 12s. 3d., and the third £171 4s. 8d. Mr. Longden, proctor for the executors, was directed to oppose the bills, and [illegible] the registrar, and prayed to be heard on his petition against Beckton. This proceeding is unheard-of. The executors of the late Mr. Wood, who had unexpectedly come into possession of all his wealth, were desirous, by a quick and quashable of the law, of preventing him from obtaining his fair costs. He asked to be sworn as to the truth and accuracy of the bills, in case of his death no one could recover them, and the executors would then escape altogether. [illegible] wanted a commission, and Dr. Bayford [illegible] objected to the correctness of the items in the bills of costs. Mr. Longden But the Court will not at once sign the bills. Dr. Dauberey: Certainly not.—Mr. Toker, the proctor for Mrs. Goodlake (another of the parties opposing the validity of the papers propounded by Sir M. Wood, and claiming [illegible] presented his taxed bills of costs. The first was for £1474 2s. 5d., the second for £396 12s. 3d., the third for £2326, and the fourth for £1000. A similar course to that took place in this as in the former case, with the addition of Dr. Phillimore expressing his opinion that the proceedings were disgraceful to the practice of the court [illegible] determined to [illegible] petition against the [illegible] Paley, proctor [illegible] were also given in; but in consequence of his absence from illness, the consideration of them was postponed. They amounted, severally, to the sums of £3274 12s. 8d., £6942 15s. 9d., and £41.48 12s. 11d., making altogether £2810 5s. 9d.

The last six weeks' history of this impostor is as follows: In the commencement of last month he met the female prisoner, who is a widow; she having had some little property, he prevailed on her to go and live with him, alleging that he shortly expected a large remittance from his agent in the country. She had been a milliner, and he told her if she could once become established, he would get her abundance of business among his connexion in town. Accordingly they went to the prosecutor's, and took the best rooms in the house, and from that time to this they had subsisted on the proceeds of every disposable article the house contained.—Mr. Greenwood: Why did you, Mr. Levy, let your lodgings without a reference?—Mr. Levy: Why, your worship, they seemed most respectable. They gave their names as Mr. and Mrs. Crawley, and said they were husband and wife. He gave his name as Mr. Crawley.—Prisoner: No; I deny that. My name is Johnson. I am not, and never was, ashamed of it.—A French lady, who lived with the complainants, confirmed their statements. Several pawnbrokers came forward with numberless duplicates of the plundered articles. Mr. Greenwood: This seems a most audacious case. I will remand you both until Thursday, and then commit you for trial.

GUILDHALL.—Mary Mason was placed before Sir Peter Laurie by policeman 37, charged with having robbed a foreign gentleman to a considerable amount.—Captain Semper, a Frenchman, but now in the service of Austria, got into the witness-box, and a scene of amusing confusion ensued. The captain started at full score to give his evidence in his native tongue, and it was some time before Sir Peter could make him understand that he himself did not understand French, and that his evidence would, therefore, be useless until the captain provided an interpreter to expound it for him. An English gentleman said that he had attended for that purpose, and Sir Peter ordered him to take the oath usual in such cases. But now the confusion became worse confounded. The mode of examination is this: the interpreter puts the question asked by the alderman in French, the witness gives his answer in the same language, and then the interpreter translates that answer into English to the magistrate. For the first three or four questions all went on smoothly enough; but the captain, after all, did understand a little English; and as soon as he did understand a short question from Sir Peter, he threw his interpreter overboard, and undertook to give an answer in his own broken lingo, which was not more intelligible to Sir Peter than French itself. For some time it was impossible to stop him, until the interpreter was ordered to inform him, that if he would persist in giving answers in English, he must receive the questions in English too.

Captain Semper: Mon Dieu! Je ne comprehend—that is right any English but mine owns.—Sir Peter, however, persisted, till he was at last brought to his senses, and the particulars were elicited. It was an ordinary street robbery, the captain being feoosh enough to [illegible] ought in Fleet-street—a street which [illegible], to the [illegible] Lou[illegible]. She robbed [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] Bride-street, and left her to [illegible] in Bridewell.

Mr. Stanfield Jackson was brought up on a warrant, charged with assaulting Mr. Dunn, the barrister, and admirer of Miss Burdett Coutts. The offence was committed several months since, and Mr. Dunn, who is still a prisoner in the Fleet, notified his intention of not pressing the charge. The defendant was dismissed in consequence.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

THE EXPLOSION AT APOTHECARIES' HALL.

On Tuesday the inquest on the remains of the unfortunate Mr. H Hennell, principal chemical operator to the Apothecaries' Company (an account of whose melancholy death appeared in our paper of last week), took place before Mr. Payne, city coroner, in the court-room of Apothecaries' Hall.

After the jury were sworn, they proceeded to view the remains, which lay in a shell in one of the store-rooms adjacent to the spot where the explosion of the contents of the pan occurred. It presented a frightful appearance, the head being literally dashed to pieces, and the chest laid completely open, exposing the heart, lungs, &c. The right arm was torn off, as were also the fingers of the left hand. The lower extremities appeared to have suffered little or no injury

The first witness examined was Charles Rivers, of No. 4, Playhouse-yard, Blackfriars, who deposed as follows:—I was assistant to the deceased Mr. Hennell, who was principal chemical operator to the Society of Apothecaries. Deceased met with his death a few minutes before ten o'clock on Saturday morning. I had been with him in the early part of the morning, but had left him between eight and nine for the purpose of going to breakfast. When he came down about half-past seven in the morning, he examined the preparation of fulminating mercury upon which he had been engaged the previous evening, and which had been left during the night under cover in the yard. About nine o'clock he weighed a small portion that had been subjected to a heat of 115 degrees in a steam-drying stove, in order to ascertain the quantity of moisture it contained. When Mr. Hennell went to breakfast, he left it in a pan on a block in the yard. It was understood between deceased and myself that when the composition was sufficiently dry, two grains should be tested by striking it with a hammer. The bulk was afterwards to be weighed. Deceased was not so long as usual at his breakfast, but returned to watch the progress of the preparation. Before I returned to the premises I heard a loud report, and hastened to the spot, suspecting the cause. I there saw deceased lying in the yard in the position described by the jury, as I have seen the body. No part of the composition could be found after the explosion. It is impossible to state positively how the explosion took place. Mr. Hennell told me he had received a communication from the Directors of the East India Company, requesting that 5lbs. of the detonating powder might be ready for shipment on Saturday last. He tried to obtain the quantity from the ordinary manufacturers, but being only able to obtain 2lb. by the time required, he determined upon manufacturing the remainder himself. He accordingly proceeded to prepare the necessary quantity, which, having done, he resolved upon mixing it with the 2lb. that had been purchased, in order to produce uniformity of colour. To this admixture I attribute the explosion. From the known skill and experience of Mr. Hennell, I cannot conceive that the accident originated from carelessness. The composition would not explode in a moist state, but a slight pressure when dry would produce combustion. It was never prepared on the premises before.

George Angell, labourer at the Hall, deposed, that a few minutes before ten o'clock deceased was in the still-room, whence he proceeded into the yard towards a block, on which was a pan. He commenced stirring the contents of the dish with his right hand. In three or four minutes afterwards the explosion took place. He was in the act of stirring the contents of the dish at the time the explosion took place. He was blown about 6 feet from the block. I was at a window at the time, and was nearly forced off my legs by the explosion. I ran out, and saw the deceased lying on the stones with all his upper part shattered to pieces. I know nothing of the nature of the process, but knowing it to be new, my curiosity led me to look out of the window.

Mr. Frederick Leffler, clerk to the establishment, examined.—On Thursday last I overheard a conversation between Mr. Hennell and Colonel Bowyer, who is connected with the East India Company's Military Store Office. I understood that it was necessary that the preparations of fulminating mercury should be ready by twelve o'clock on Saturday last, which Mr. Hennell proceed should be done. Deceased after that explained the nature of the ingredients to me, and said that they required the greatest skill and care in the manufacture, and consulted me how it could be best packed. He told me that, in order to prevent any extensive damage taking place, he would make it in small quantities and in the open air. I believe he said not more than two ounces at a time. He was so devoted to his profession, and to the duties that devolved upon him, that I believe he would at all times undertake the manufacture of any composition, however dangerous. The Company of Apothecaries were bound by contract to supply the East India Company with the fulminating mercury, and Mr Hennell undertook to manufacture it, because there was not sufficient notice to enable him to obtain it from the Island of Guernsey, where it is usually made. Deceased determined that no one but himself should incur any risk in the process. The whole quantity exploded must have been between five and six pounds. The [illegible]sions from the article would be very small.

[illegible] corroborative evidence, and statements as to the [illegible] and excellent character of the deceased,

The coroner summed up, and remarked on the excitement caused by the explosion in the neighbourhood. He trusted, therefore, that the officers of the Apothecaries' Society would never again permit such powder to be prepared on their premises

The jury, after a brief consultation, returned a verdict of Accidental Death.

PRICE OF SUGAR.—The average price of Brown or Muscovado Sugar, computed from the Returns made in the week ending June 7th, 1842, is 37s. 7d. per cwt., exclusive of the Duties of Customs paid or payable thereon on the importation thereof into Great Britain.

THE SINGING CLASSES AT EXETER HALL.

During the reign of Elizabeth and her immediate successors, a knowledge of vocal or instrumental music formed a necessary part of the education of every person who wished to be considered as well informed. The individual who could not join in a madrigal, or take his part in a song for various voices, was treated as a person whose education had been neglected, and folks "wondered where such people had been brought up." The busy time of Oliver Cromwell and the gloomy tenets of the Puritans frowned down a great deal of this cheerful and healthy feeling for a season. The Restoration succeeded, and singing became again a fashionable thing, but associated as it was, too frequently, with the loose rhymes of the Rochesters, the Sedleys, and D'Urfeys of that licentious period, it failed in getting a universal footing among all classes, and had little or no claims upon the consideration of those individuals whose sense of propriety refused to adopt such a union. The string of fiddlers introduced by Charles II. into the Chapel Royal, in allusion to which the song of "Four-and-twenty Fiddlers all of a row" was written, tended so little to make church music popular, that it only excited feelings of astonishment and dislike, and the music of the people became almost exclusively confined to simple ballad melodies. For such airs they always had an open ear and ready voice, and the gay strains of Lillibullero aided powerfully in bringing about the deposition of James II., and the glorious revolution of 1688. "It made an impression," says Burnet, "on the King's army that cannot be imagined by those who saw it not. The whole army, and, at last, the people, both in city and country, were singing it perpetually." The powerful charm, inherent in many strains, has been frequently observed. Napoleon forbade, under pain of death, the playing of the "Ranz des Vaches" in his army, as the melody had such an effect on his Swiss soldiers that they deserted in dozens, the melody having excited an unconquerable home sickness by its association with their native land.

The distaste of the English for music has become a word of reproach among the neighbouring nations during the reign of the Georges, and certainly with some reason. A lively sense of its importance as a means of national improvement is of the recent growth of the last few years. A legislator, a few years ago, would have been—nay, has been, laughed at as an amiable visionary for suggesting the propriety of making singing a part of education in every school. How forgetful were the laughers of the important fact, that the coarseness of manners so painfully developed in too large a portion of our population was owing, in a great measure, if not entirely, to the want of more rational enjoyments, and the proper direction of their minds to higher means of gratification than the beer-shop could furnish, or the bull-bait present to them. It may thus raise the national mind through the gentle medium of its pleasures. Mr. Hullah and his music classes are an army to aid the good cause; a few pioneers have been struggling for years to make its way, but the deaf ear of Government has only slowly and recently opened to the importance of their views.

PORTRAIT OF HULLAH.

John Hullah became first favourably known to the public as the composer of the music to "The Village Coquettes," a little opera by the celebrated "Boz," and which was for some time played at the St. James's Theatre. He is a young man of gentlemanly and prepossessing behaviour, and possesses that essential qualification in a teacher, without which he can never hope for great success—a good-natured kindliness of feeling, that will smile when the scholar smiles at anything ludicrous (and there are many things ludicrous in the system), or appreciate fully the difficulties a student may have to encounter, and do his best to remove such difficulties, by as clear an explanation as he can give, not with the sour air of a learned superior, but with the good-nature of a friend; and this, in a great measure, is the secret of the success of a system that undoubtedly has many faults, and in other hands than Mr. Hullah's will fail in realizing the expectations formed of it.

The method of teaching singing employed by Mr. Hullah, is an adaptation to English use of the one used in France by Monsieur Wilhem, a gentleman who had the good fortune to obtain the ear of the French Government, through the help of his friend Monsieur Orfila, a member of the "Conseil Royal" for public instruction. Wilhem ultimately reigned lord supreme as a teacher in Paris, to the exclusion of all other professors, towards whom a most unjustifiable spirit of illiberality prevailed. Mr. Mainzer, who was the first to show how fruitful a field of instruction might be opened among the working classes, on applying for leave to open gratuitous schools for their benefit in Paris, was refused, and having by great influence succeeded in giving a public concert in that capital, when nearly a thousand of his pupils, common working-men of the city, whom he had taught gratuitously, executed a variety of concerted pieces with great precision and effect, he was never allowed to repeat his performances. The lame reason given was the fear of an émeute, if so large a number of working-men were allowed to meet; but M. Wilhem was allowed to continue with his methods unmolested. This is not a solitary instance of exclusive patronage.

There is, doubtless, a great deal of disingenuousness in the assertion made in the "Prefatory Minute of the Committee of Council on Education," prefixed to the manuals used by Mr. Hullah's pupils, where it is declared that no method had previously existed "for facilitating the teaching of vocal music" in elementary schools. Many such works exist, fully as clear, and quite as useful, as the one now adopted by Government; and it is to other sources than this to which we must look for "the impediments to the introduction of vocal music among the lower orders in Great Britain." Twenty years ago Mr. Edward Taylor (the Gresham Professor of Music) using his own method, taught sight-singing to two hundred Norwich weavers, who have performed the most difficult oratorio ever written, Spohr's "Crucifixion," to the entire satisfaction of the composer. If the magic "sanction of Government" was not given to those systems and their hard-working superintendents, in the name of justice let not the very existence of such facts be placed out of sight, by a declaration appended to a more fortunate system that "has found favour in the eyes" that have been so long clouded, and which possesses the singular power of overlooking talent immediately within their reach, while they can occupy themselves in rambling researches in Switzerland, Holland, the German States, Prussia, Austria, and France;" and, with Gallic feeling, prefer the latter to all the others, its own included. But this is the constitutional defect of the British Government; we can but hope for the best, and waive all controversial remarks.

Let us walk into Exeter Hall, where, day and night, is to be seen the indefatigable and ever-cheerful Hullah busily superintending his classes. He is mounted on the platform in front of the great organ, and between two powerful lamps, where, baton in hand, he regulates the movements of some hundreds of pupils before him. Each pupil has a "Manual" of instructions open in front of his seat, and alternately listens to the teacher, or goes through the exercises to be found in these lessons. We will begin "at the beginning." The first lesson teaches us what "scales" and "intervals" are; the major diatonic scale is "represented by a ladder," and the eight lines of this ladder represent the octave, the first line being "Do" or C. The pupil is first taught to repeat the numbers in ascending the scale or ladder; at the same time elevating the right arm, and keeping the hand open, closing it on reaching the semitones at 3 and 7, and then descending, closing the hand at 8 and 4, according to the marks at the side of the diagram. The general effect of this process, when some hundreds are employed upon it, is not a little grotesque. The eager looks of the learners, who are doing something, for the first time in their lives, which they are anxious to do properly, but do not fully comprehend; the hundreds of upraised arms and clenched fists, all directed towards Mr. Hullah, seem to give that gentleman a most unenviable position; albeit, it is quite irresistible to all who have a taste for the ludicrous, and we must plead guilty to a frequent laugh ourselves.

PRACTISING SEMITONES.

The hand is, in fact, a very essential feature in the system, and is continually brought into use; the five fingers of the hand answer to the five lines in music; and the spaces between them to the corresponding musical spaces, taking in the notes from E to F; or, as this system calls them, from Mi to Fa. This method of naming the notes is open to many objections: the grand one being, that the pupil will begin and finish his course of lessons without being acquainted with the names of the notes as they are universally used in England. A writer in the Spectator of July 10th, 1841, says, "Turn one of Mr. Hullah's pupils into any English orchestra, and he will be ignorant of the very language which is spoken and written by every performer in it. He will, literally, and not by a figure of speech, be ignorant of the difference between A and B." This is an unnecessary change, and will at once preclude the pupil from gaining any additional knowledge from the many works on singing published in this country, all of which are constructed according to the usual manner of naming the notes, from the first seven letters of the alphabet. Many of the pupils of this system, ay, and its teachers too, are unable to sing or understand anything but the contents of their own manual.

HAND FOR NOTES AND INTERVALS.

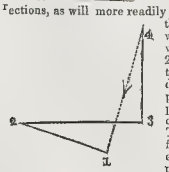
The places of the notes on the five lines and spaces, or rather on the hand, having been taught, beating time is the next part of the pupil's instruction. He takes a bar of four beats, and practises thus:—The left hand is held open, on a level with the waist, and the right hand is moved swiftly in four directions, as will more readily be understood by a reference to the diagram. The right hand, with the palm open, moves towards the left arm, or from 1 to 2; returns back to 3; is elevated to 4, and then is brought swiftly down to 1, at which point the palm of the left hand is to be placed; consequently the hands clap together at every four beats. This action is accompanied, at first, by counting 1, 2, 3, 4, at each move, which, after a little practice, is abandoned for mental counting. The effect of this practice is singular to a spectator. Three or four hundred arms move backward, forward, up, and down, in solemn silence, and with various degrees of violence, until the fourth beat, when the ringing sound of an army of clapping hands echoes suddenly through the hall; followed by another deep quietude, to which another violent clap succeeds at proper intervals during the lesson. The violent contrasts of silence and noise are strikingly peculiar, and add much to the odd effect of the whole process.



TIME BEATS.

BEATING TIME.

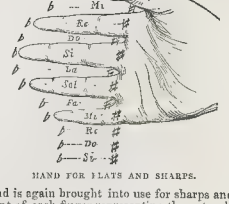
The scholar is afterwards taught the value of a semibreve, minim, or crotchet, by repeating the word "semibreve" on the first beat, and remaining silent on the three following ones, and repeating the word "minim" on the first and third beats, being silent on the second and fourth; while for crotchets, he repeats that word shorn of a limb, and exclaims aloud "crotch" upon every move of his arm. The monotonous cry of "crotch, crotch," ad libitum, carries the imagination at once to a village duck-pond, and the "quack, quack," of its innocent tenants, equally busy and harmless.

There is nothing very peculiar in the lessons that immediately follow these, or the songs introduced in them, except one on the interval of the octavo beginning—

"Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
How I wonder what you are!"

which never was, and never will be, sung without a roar of laughter. It is irresistibly funny (remember, dear reader, that we belong to the school of Democritus) to hear adults singing such words—men of thirty summers, or "by'r lady inclining to threescore," and jumping an octave at every other syllable. The words might do well for children; from them such words may come with propriety; but then the music! What child would, or rather what child could, sing it, except as a punishment? Such music should not be wedded to such words; and the sooner a divorce takes place the better.

But we scarcely dare venture on the subject of the words to which the exercises are sung. To any body who has a taste for what George Colman calls "the sweet pretty sublime, and the dear little grand," we should say, buy Part Two of the Manual, and a rich treat awaits you. The art of sinking in poetry was never more delightfully exemplified; and the fun is not a little heightened by the declaration of the committee, that the words commonly sung to airs in infant schools "are rather foolish than simple, and fantastic than sprightly," and par consequence "taste" has been grievously maltreated. Can they tell us what the concluding lines of "old John Cross" mean? or any one line of "The Sea Boy?"—both original (perfectly original) POEMS! Heaven save the mark! The Queen's English grammar, natural history, national manners, and common sense, were never before so grievously maltreated in so short a poem? Is this the Government "article," and are all others contraband? We hope not. We wish a page had been left opposite those exquisite "bits of solemn fun," and an English translation given, after the fashion of the Italian and German Opera books! Why, too, in the song on Christmas Day, talk of the "Rood on which our Saviour died" in a Protestant land, and make it rhyme with "blood," in the subsequent line. Alas! for such "taste!"



HAND FOR FLATS AND SHARPS.

The hand is again brought into use for sharps and flats, the central joint of each finger representing the natural notes, the tip representing the flat notes, the roots the sharps. This use of the hand is far from being a novelty, as is generally supposed. It is 700 years of age, being the invention of Guido Aretino, the musical mark of Arezzo, who flourished in the eleventh century, and who first applied the syllables still used in solfeggio exercises to the notes, having selected them from a Catholic hymn to St. John. In England, even, it is no novelty, having been used for the same purpose forty years ago, but abandoned as an unprofitable waste of the pupil's time. Surely the general disuse for centuries of so well known a thing is a sufficient proof of its worthlessness. It may amuse children who like to play with their fingers, but it can be attended by no better result, for it produces an association of fixed ideas, and as the key-note in music is constantly ing, it can be nothing but an embarrassment to the pupil, because it is not adapted to such change of keys.

It has been well observed that "Go-carts have gone out of fashion since it was discovered that they were so great a help to a child that they prevented it learning to walk." The two systems are nearly analogous.

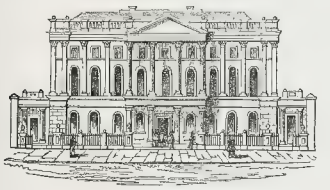
In some instances the explanations given in the book are very happy; as for instance that of compound common time. The bar of common time and its four notes form the central square, and each note being divisible in compound time into three, the triangles at each side of the square at once make this apparent to the eye.

We must now close our necessarily brief notice of a system that now occupies a considerable share of public attention. Let not our remarks be misunderstood. We hail with pleasure the introduction of a musical taste, and are glad to find it so extensively sought after. But "a clear stage and no favour" should be given, and not a blind adherence to the manners of a French teacher of small merit, but of great good fortune. We much doubt the amount of good that will be the abiding result of such system. It appears to us, and we speak from experience, that the pupils obtain only that amount of knowledge, which convinces men better grounded of their ignorance. That they are herded together and driven on to a certain point, aided by the ear, listening to some few apter scholars, and are thus enabled to do much together, but to do nothing for themselves, we are certain. We speak of scholars who have been taught their only knowledge of music through this system, but a large number of scholars are to be found among a class who had some previous knowledge, therefore the public exhibition of their vocal powers is nothing more wonderful than the public school examinations of pupils in arithmetic, who perform great feats while under the eye and system of the master, but who are utterly unfit for a counting-house. There is after all no royal road to learning of any sort, and the pupil after going certain lengths in such pretended road, is but obliged to retrace his steps, or worse still, unlearn much that he has learned, and which but serves to hinder instead of aid him. The railroad system of tuition is always suspicious, and but throws hundreds of conceited smatterers upon a land where too many are already found. All such schemes, however successful in appearance, are amazingly like the notable one of building a town without mortar.

SCIENCE.

In our last number we availed ourselves of the publication of a lecture delivered at the London Institution, to sum up the progress of science, and to enumerate the principal discoveries during the past twenty-two years. We purposed at the time illustrating our article with a view of the building, but press of matter precluded the possibility of our fulfilling our intention.

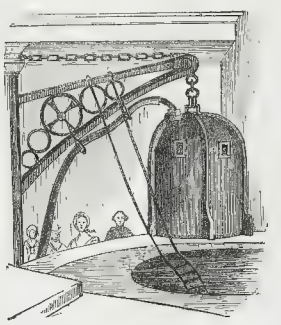
We have now, however, the opportunity of acting up to our wishes, and the sketch of the external view of the institution is subjoined.



The building was erected from the plans of Mr. G. Brooks and was completed in 1819. It consists of a handsome entrance hall, supported by eight Doric columns. On either side are the news, the pamphlets, and the committee-rooms. In passing forward we reach the theatre, a noble apartment, capable of containing a thousand visitors. Attached to the theatre are the laboratory apparatus, and professors' rooms. The library occupies the whole extent of the building, above the hall, &c., and contains many thousand volumes, being, we believe, next to the Museum, the best library in London. The institution is supported by the annual contribution of its proprietors, of whom there are nearly 1200.

Electrical Telegraphs.—Many of our readers are doubtless aware that Professor Wheatstone has recently invented a telegraph on the principle of electro-magnetism, which is likely, ultimately, to supersede all others now in use. We have not space in the present article to explain the principles on which this most wonderful machine is constructed, although we shall take an early opportunity of so doing; suffice it here to say, that by means of a galvanic battery certain motions are communicated to a dial-plate, which, if the wires connecting the apparatus be sufficiently long, will enable a person at the distance of two, three, or four hundred miles to read letter by letter and word by word any necessary communication; and, what is more advantageous, this communication takes place with the celerity of light and the utmost precision. Hitherto the great obstacle to the universal adoption of this means of rapid communication has been the great expense of laying down wires to carry the current of electricity, since it was deemed necessary at all times to use wires protected by a cotton or silk covering, in consequence of a prevalent idea that moisture of any kind dissipated the electricity. Messrs. Wright and Bain, who have devoted much attention and time to the matter, and to whom we are indebted for many valuable discoveries, were induced to make certain experiments on this subject, which go far to do away with this universally received opinion. The experiments were first tried at the Polytechnic, but subsequently were repeated on a larger scale in Hyde-park, by permission of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. The electricity was first transmitted from bank to bank of the Serpentine, through two bare wires immersed in the water without any protection. No dissipation whatever took place, but a curious effect was observed, that the magnetism did not subside at once, but diminished very gradually. The wires were next conveyed from the bridge at the west end to the east end of the river—the same effect was produced as in a complete metallic circuit. In all the experiments a Grove's battery of two inches surface was used. This is a vast improvement; the expense of laying down covered wires of communication was between £200 and £300 per mile, while one-fifth of that sum will now be sufficient.

Sub-marine Operations.—A French gentleman, Dr. Payerne, has recently caused considerable sensation in the scientific world, respecting the means of which he professes to be the discoverer, and by which individuals may remain in a diving-bell without communication with the external air for an indefinite period. We say professes, for as yet there appears to us to be no inconsiderable doubt existing relative to the affair. On Wednesday last Dr. Payerne descended in the diving-bell at the Polytechnic Institution, taking with him a box, supposed to contain apparatus for restoring or renewing the atmosphere in the bell, together with a lighted candle. He remained in the bell between three and four hours; and upon returning, it was found that the candle was still burning, and he, the operator, had suffered no inconvenience. The process, if any there be, is kept a secret, Dr. Payerne stating it to be his intention to take out a patent for it. It is well known that atmospheric air consists of oxygen, nitrogen, and a small per centage of carbonic acid. At each inspiration the oxygen is consumed, and the nitrogen, charged with a greater quantity of carbonic acid, is evolved. This latter fluid is highly deleterious, and if the process of inspiration and expiration were to be continued, the entire oxygen would be consumed, and the air, charged with a superabundance of carbonic acid, and possessed of none of its vital portion, would soon prove destructive to human life. It is evident, then, in order to continue to live in the atmosphere of the bell, where no fresh supply of air is administered from above, it would be necessary to form oxygen, and to get rid of the carbonic aid. How this is accomplished, it is of course, impossible the process being a secret, for us to say.



But now of the doubts, which we expressed in the first portion of this notice. In our opinion the process has not yet had the advantage of sufficient experiment. The bell at the Polytechnic contains a vast quantity of atmospheric air, and it would require some two or three hours for it to be so far deteriorated, as to be incapable of supporting life. Messrs. Tatam and Wynn have, since the experiment of Dr. Payerne, descended and remained beneath the water for nearly two hours, without communication with the external air, and without any attempt to interfere with it. If two persons, therefore, can breathe this air for two hours without inconvenience, we have a right to argue that one might do so for four hours, a time equal to that of Dr. Payerne. At all events we cannot be convinced until we have witnessed more extended experiments.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RACES.—THE THIMBLE-RIG.

My dear Horace,—I have been to Epsom, and participated with thousands in the dust and noise. I like neither. All the rogues, thieves, and swindlers of the metropolis appeared to me to be congregated there in one focus. At Ascot, however, the "family men" were kept in the rear. At most large races the roulette booths are numerous; but among the "smaller game" of the gambling set, the pea and thimble-rig proprietor appeared to me, strange to say, the most clever in his calling. With his small round table, about a foot in diameter, well polished with black lead and supported by three strong legs, that are easily "unshipped," and frequently used by those vagabonds and their confederates as bludgeons in an impromptu fray, his three thimbles, and his eternal gauble, he reaps an excellent harvest; and the fools are such a numerous family, that, notwithstanding the endeavours of the public press and their own costly experience, they still venture their half crowns and sovereigns upon a game in which neither skill nor chance avails. It is a mere juggling trick. It grieved me sorely to see that emblem of woman's skill so desecrated, and put to so base a use.

There is, in my mind, an association of ideas which renders the thimble an object of peculiar interest. I remember the splendid silver thimble of my honoured grandmother, which in the days of my infancy attracted my attention. Seated on her footstool, intent upon the pictures and the history of Jack the Giant Killer, Cinderella, or some other early romance, of deeper interest than any I have since perused in maturer years, I would now and then glance at the kind old lady, as she plied her nimble needle upon her favourite patchwork. But I am digressing.

The table is waiting. "Now, gentlemen, sport the blunt—half-crowns, crowns, or suv'rains. I wish to give everybody a chance, and everybody a choice—(stand back there, will you?) Will any of you bet? A sharp eye and a quick hand, and the work is done! There's the pea, and there's the thimble—it's all as fair as daylight only don't wink, and you're sure to win." The suv'rains, crowns, and half-crowns pass like winking.

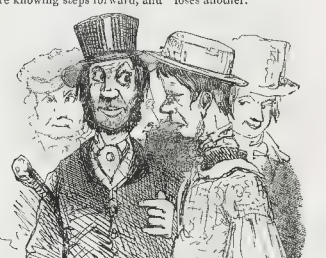
And now, moving the three thimbles about in the figure of a reel, he offers to bet, and lays down a sovereign.

"Don't touch them," cries a dandy shopman, in his Sunday suit, with all the eagerness of certain gain; and, placing his sovereign on the board, he raises the thimble—the pea has vanished, and his money gone. A loud laugh ensues; and one more knowing steps forward, and loses another.

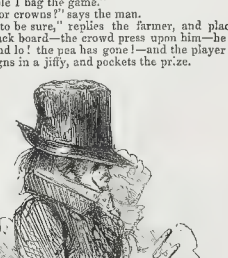


A man in a smock-frock, who has been standing by, eyeing the players and the board, now raises one of the thimbles with a cunning leer, as the master of the board turns his head, and discovers—the pea.

"Hands off -no shifting," cries a young farmer, "and I'll bet you a couple I bag the game."

"Suv'rains or crowns?" says the man.

"Suv'rains, to be sure," replies the farmer, and places his gold on the black board—the crowd press upon him—he raises the thimble, and lo! the pea has gone!—and the player whips up his sovereigns in a jiffy, and pockets the prize.



"Well! I never saw the like o' that!" exclaims the man in the frock, with astonishment, "that bangs every thing I ever see!"

An old man is standing by, fumbling in his pocket, and looking wistfully at the thimbles.

"Now's your time; 'faint heart never won fair lady,'" continues the player. "Try your luck, there's the pea—guess right, and pocket a suv'rain at a word. I'd rather lose than win any day, but you won't let me. There's no gammon here—look at the thimbles. Come, if any of you have a half-crown, and wish to double it, now's the time o'day! If you haven't any money, get your mother to sell her mangle, and you may turn it to account, and double your fortune. It isn't every day you have such an opportunity of laying out your money. P'haps you don't like to ruin me; but don't fear, I've a large capital, and am as difficult to break as a wild colt."

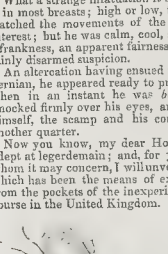
The man in the frock insinuates himself close to the elbow of the old man, and whispers in his ear, "I say, old card, I'll go your halves—let's have a shy!" and displays four half-crowns; the wavering resolution of the old fool is fixed, he takes the proffered money, and lays down a sovereign.

The "old card" turns up the thimble, and of course loses; his partner in the venture whistles, and proposes to double the stakes; in the excitement of the loss this is done—and so is the "old card." Of course, the rustic gentleman in the frock is a confederate. There are also confederates who do win, in order to decoy others into the trap.

What a strange infatuation it seems! This spirit of gambling is in most breasts; high or low, the propensity is the same. I watched the movements of the player with a great deal of interest; but he was calm, cool, and collected; and there was a frankness, an apparent fairness in the whole affair that certainly disarmed suspicion.

An altercation having ensued with a hot-headed young Hibernian, he appeared ready to protect his interests vi et armis, when in an instant he was bonneted—that is, his hat was knocked firmly over his eyes, and before he could extricate himself, the scamp and his confederates had decamped to another quarter.

Now you know, my dear Horace, I have always been an adept at legerdemain; and, for your benefit and for all those whom it may concern, I will unveil the mysteries of this juggle, which has been the means of extracting hundreds of pounds from the pockets of the inexperienced at every fair and race-course in the United Kingdom.



First, then, know that the player has the game entirely in his own hands, and you never can win by any chance without his will. The "pea," as it is called, is a piece of new bread, worked up in the hands till it assumes the blackness of, and is softer than a piece of Indian rubber, and is, moreover, very adhesive. When the player places it on the board, he takes the thimble between his fore-finger and thumb, and so he pretends and appears to place it over the pea: he then takes the pea adroitly up with the thumb nail. This, by practice, can be done with either hand, and completely deceives the eye. Of course, the pea is not under any of the three thimbles, and when you select one, he instantly raises one of the remaining two, and drops the "pea" at the same moment, to convince you that it really was under one of them.

And in this sleight consists the whole trick, which may be more readily performed than you are aware of. Its simplicity, indeed, is only exceeded by that exhibited by those who risk their money with such a certainty of loss, as I trust I have fully described and proved.

I am very tenacious of unveiling those tricks that delude only to amuse the spectator; but when these arts are used to plunder the weak and the unwary, I should deem myself a sort of confederate in the crime, if I concealed my knowledge from the world. That I shall receive any acknowledgment, I neither expect nor desire, and am amply repaid in the assurance that I shall receive your thanks for my communication.

Believe, me, my dear Horace,

Yours, truly.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE

Sir Robert Sale.—Sir Robert Sale has gallantly served his country for a period of not less than 47 years, the greater part of which has been devoted to India during some of the most eventful periods of its history. He entered the service in 1795, and began his active military career at the battle of Malavelly, in 1799, during which actr he served at the storming of Seringapatam, for which he received a medal; in 1804 he shared in the fatigues of the campaign in the Weynaud country; was present at the storming of the Travancore lines in 1809—at the capture of the Isle of France in 1810—at the capture of Rangoon—served throughout the Burmese war—has been four times wounded—aided most effectually in the storming of Ghuznee, and has crowned his career by the successful defence of Jellalabad.—Morning Paper.

The Army.—The following changes of depots are about to take place in Ireland: The 27th to Mullingar, 30th to Galway, 74th to Cashel, 55th to Cork, 35th to Clonmel, 46th to Carlow.

The 84th Regiment. The last division of this gallant corps marched from Rochester on Monday morning, at half-past four o'clock, for embarkation on board the General Kyd, bound to Madras; strength, under the orders of Captain Veitch, 4 lieutenants, 1 ensign, quartermaster; 10 sergeants, 2 drummers, and 215 rank and file; 20 more men are expected to join from the depot at Chatham. The names of officers embarked are Captain Veitch, Lieutenants Saunders, Harrison, Iremonger, Smith, Ensign Cassen, and Quartermaster Farrell and lady.

United Service Institution.—The ordinary meeting of the members took place on Monday evening last, Captain Ford, of Chelsea Hospital, in the chair. The minutes of the preceding meeting having been confirmed, a number of presents were exhibited. Captain Ramsay read a communication from Mr. Allen, captain of the Vixen, respecting steam communication with the Cape of Good Hope; and Mr. Snow Harris delivered some observations upon his method of protecting ships from damage by lightning.

Experiments with Large Guns at Deal.—The preparations for making experiments on an extensive scale with large guns on the coast betwixt Sandwich and Deal, are now nearly completed, and the experiments will be commenced in the course of the next or following week. Major Hardinge, K.B., and Captain Fyers, of the Royal Artillery, have proceeded to Deal, the latter to join Major Macbean's company, by whom the experiments will be carried on. Major Hardinge, as senior officer, will have charge of the whole, and, from his great practical knowledge as an artillery officer, will be able to give correct report of the details, and how far they may be likely to prove of an advantageous nature to the military and naval services of this country. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Board of Ordnance have, with a spirit of liberality in this matter worthy of the heads of these important branches of her Majesty's service, and have spared no personal exertion, in addition to the fullest instructions, for carrying the experiments on in the most effectual manner. The following guns having been previously mounted on ship carriages at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, have been delivered at Deal, along with 50 rounds of balls and cartridges for each: One 68-pounder, weighing 112 cwt., on Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas's principle, removed from the Geyser steam-frigate to try its range on land; one 56-pounder, weighing 97 cwt., on Mr. Monk's principle; one 56-pounder, weighing 90 cwt., on Mr. Monk's principle; one 12-pounder, weighing 60 cwt., on Mr. Monk's principle; one 10-inch gun, weighing 85 cwt., on General Millar's principle; one 8-inch gun, weighing 65 cwt., on General Millar's principle. Several magnificent guns of very large calibre, capable of containing solid shot of 130lbs. weight, were recently cast at the foundry of Messrs. Walker and Co., for Mehemet Ali, Pasha of Egypt, and proved at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich. The founders of these guns having expressed a wish to have a range of one of them tried to its utmost extent, their desire has been complied with, and a suitable ship carriage and one of Messrs. Walker's guns will be forwarded to Deal for that purpose. A 32 pounder gun, weighing 50 cwt., and a splendid 32-pounder brass howitzer constructed on a plan of Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas, Inspector of Artillery, will also be forwarded at the same time, for the purpose of having their qualties reported upon.

The death of the Right Hon. Lord Somerville, aged 57, took place at the Hall, Berkhampstead, on Friday, the 3rd instant.

Australia. Extract of a letter received by a gentleman in England from a respectable farmer who, with all his family, consisting of ten persons, embarked with the first body of settlers in 1840, for the Western Australian Company's settlement at Australind:

"Australind, 31st Dec. 1841.

"Dear Sir.—I am sure you will have been much pleased to hear of our safe arrival by the 'Parkfield.' I have reason, and especial reason, to be thankful that I and my family of eight children, and many young, should be brought over the mighty deep, 15,000 miles, without even an accident. This, I assure you, Sir, is a beautiful country; the land, where the town site is to be, is sandy; but on the sides of the Branswick, upon the plains and upon the hills, a few miles from us, is the best land I ever saw; it is covered with excellent feed for cows or sheep, and there is a great extent of territory southward, capable of supporting vast numbers of people. I have been in Roe's Range, and was quite astonished to see such land. Upon the whole, the Company's land is said to be the richest ground in Western Australia. The Port (Leschenault) is very fair, the bottom mud and clay, and I believe that a ship of any burthen may anchor there with perfect safety, providing the tackle is good. The climate is very pleasant. We have had occasional showers ever since we have been here, and everything in the gardens looks beautiful. We have plenty of water, and, I can say with truth, that there is no country in the world, as far as I have heard, where the emigrant may succeed better, with care and industry, than in this part of Western Australia. To prove to you, Sir, that I think well of Australind, I have just bought one rural section and two town sections, in addition to my former purchase. We are anxiously waiting for another ship. Men of business, mechanics, such as carpenters, sawyers, bricklayers, &c. &c., will get a deal of money here, if steady. Women servants will also do well.—Believe me, dear Sir, yours very truly, Lewis Birch." It appears by the Perth Inquirer, No. 52, of the 15th December last, that provisions were tendered to the Commissariat Department at the following prices: Wheat, 8s. 2d. per bushel; Flour, 1l. per ton; Beef and Mutton, 3½d. per lb.; it is added that the public are to be served with the two latter articles at a corresponding rate. The great increase of the number of sheep in the colony will, it is supposed, almost immediately place the latter articles at a very moderate rate. In fact, it is expected that, in another year, the price of fresh meat will not exceed 4d. per lb.; and in this case the large sum annually paid for imported salt provisions would be saved to the colony.

The New Royal Proclamation. A royal proclamation regarding the gold coin, bearing date the 3rd instant, has attracted great attention. This document sets forth that large quantities of light gold coin are in circulation, contrary to the provisions of the Proclamation issued in the first year of his Majesty George III., dated 1st June, 1774, and further, that by his Majesty's father, George IV.; and there being reason to believe that due attention has not been paid to the weighing of gold coin, nor to the Acts of Parliament now in force regarding deficiency in the same; and as to the breaking and defacing of such of the said gold coin as may be found of less weight than the weight specified in the last of the said proclamations—Therefore it is declared, that from the date of this proclamation, every gold sovereign of less weight than 5 pennyweights 2½ grains, and every half-sovereign of less weight than 2 pennyweights 13½ grains, shall not be allowed to be current, nor to pass in any payment whatsoever; and her Majesty, with the advice of her Privy Council, ordains all persons accordingly to attend to and abide by the regulations in the various Acts of Parliament now in force with respect to cutting and defacing such of the gold coin as shall be deficient in weight; and all sovereigns and half-sovereigns of the weights above specified are ordered to pass current as lawful money of the United Kingdom." This event has caused considerable commotion, for now the private bankers, like the Bank of England, scrupulously weigh every piece of gold, and of course hundreds of thousands will be refused, if not millions; for the quantity of light gold in the country, clipped and ground abroad, is enormous, as has been noticed on former occasions. Light gold will have to be carried to the bullion dealers, who will pay its value by weight, and by which it will be carried to the Mint to be recoined. This measure was rendered indispensable by the enormous quantity of light gold in circulation. The fact would seem to suggest the expediency, if practicable, of taking gold in value by weight, instead of by legal standard of coin value, as on the Continent generally.

A Lost Play. It is an authentic anecdote of Hogarth, that he was wont to make certain miniature sketches on his thumb-nail, to be elaborated at an after time. A certain dramatist followed the like practice. He would write a plot in the same limited space in shorthand. He was once consulted on a new drama by a manager. "I have it," exclaimed the ready artist, and he immediately marked the plot upon his thumb-nail. Weeks passed over, but no play was presented. The manager waited on the author "Now, about the piece? It's done, of course—you took it on your thumb-nail?" "To be sure," replied the author, "and there it was for some time, but, as ill-luck would have it, I one morning, unfortunately—washed my hands!"—Punch.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Illustrated News Office, Friday Evening, June 11.

THE QUEEN.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert yesterday again honoured Ascot Races with their presence, accompanied by the Duke of Wellington, the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, and other distinguished visitors, beside the whole of their suite.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—Thursday.

In the House of Lords last night the Jurisdiction of Justices (Ireland) Bill, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor, and the Fines and Recoveries (England and Wales) Bill, on the motion of Lord Wharncliffe, were severally read a third time and passed.

The Civil Decrees (Ireland) Bill passed through Committee.

Their Lordships then adjourned.

The House of Commons did not sit, there being only 34 Members present at four o'clock.

Friday.

Their lordships met at five o'clock; and the Bishop of Exeter presented some petitions against idolatry in India and the national system of education in Ireland; and also in favour of Church Extension and the Affirmations Bill.

The Earl of Radnor gave notice he should ask for information respecting a bill giving power to magistrates to erect additional county gaols.

Lord Melbourne gave notice that if the second reading of the Income Tax Bill was permitted sub silentio, a debate would be raised on the next stage.—Adjourned to Monday.

The House of Commons assembled at the usual hour; and several petitions were presented.

In answer to a question relative to "light" sovereigns, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that great complaints had been made of a portion of the gold coin being below the proper weight, and it therefore had been thought necessary to call the public attention to the weight at which gold coin was current, and to make arrangements with the Bank, by which they agreed to receive it at the Mint price of £3. 10s. 7½d. per ounce for all light gold coin.

Mr. Gladstone wished the house to meet on Saturday to discuss the Railways Bill; but the motion was successfully opposed by Mr. Hume, and the house agreed to adjourn till Monday.

A long discussion on the merits of postponing the writ for Nottingham was proceeding when we left.

THE COUNTRY.

Destruction of a Cotton-mill by Fire at Manchester.—A serious fire broke out on Wednesday morning at a very early hour, by which property to the amount of at least £5000 has been destroyed. The property in which the fire occurred was one of the oldest cotton-mills in Manchester. It was situated in Pin Mill Bow, and was known by the name of the Pin Mill Factory. The property was covered by insurances.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

IN RE CHARLES JAMES MATHEWS.

The following is the only case of interest to the public which yesterday's proceedings produced in any of the courts of law.—This case came on for hearing yesterday, and attracted a crowded court. The only creditor who opposed was a person named Alexander Loggie, a theatrical ornament maker.

Mr. Bodkin counsel supported the insolvent, Mr. Nichols, Mr. Cooke, and Mr. Woodruffe.

The case has been mentioned on some former occasions. It will be recollected that Mr. Mathews was the late manager of Covent-Garden Theatre, and that from various theatrical losses he had become insolvent. He had been a short time out of prison on bail.

The Chief Commissioner explained to the creditor, who claimed £48, that he must first ask questions, then give evidence, and call witnesses if he thought proper. The learned Commissioner, from the manner in which Loggie conducted his case, was compelled, on several occasions, to interpose.

The evidence of the insolvent went to show that a Mrs Cassidy was, about two months ago, housekeeper at Covent-Garden Theatre, and had been discharged on its being discovered that she had pledged various articles, particularly out of the Queen's box. He positively denied that she had pledged articles at the desire of Mrs. Mathews. The jewels which his wife had possessed were sold in the year 1838. He owed Lawrence Levy £100, and on the creditor calling out the name of that party, no answer was given, which, with the grotesque appearance and interlarded remarks, such as "Charley Mathews," &c., elicited a good deal of laughter. It was in vain that the learned Commissioner explained the usual mode of procedure adopted by creditors.

Loggie next examined the insolvent respecting some books which had been sold for £80, to Mr. Willis, a bookseller, Piazza, Covent-Garden, and a bill given for four months, which was in the hands of the provisional assignee of the court. He at once admitted that it was understood that if he could raise the money he was again to have the books, but he declared that the price was a fair one, and such as any other party would have given. The books were not of value, but consisted of various collections he had made. It was a bona fide sale.

Mr. Cooke mentioned that there were several small executions issued at the time, and the books were sold in the manner described, so that all the creditors should obtain any benefit to be derived.

Mr. Nichols informed the court, that out of the £1750 received in America, the insolvent had remitted £500 for the purposes of the Olympic Theatre.

Mr. Cooke mentioned that there had been a loss of £3400.

It was stated that property had been sold for nearly £200, which sum was in court, arising from jewellery and wearing apparel.

The Chief Commissioner asked the insolvent if there was any other property belonging to the creditors.

The insolvent replied in the negative.

Chief Commissioner—You say that solemnly?

Insolvent I do solemnly.

The Court asked Mr. Mathews again whether he had any other property.

The insolvent said a piece of plate had been subscribed by the performers of Covent-garden. It had been suggested that it should not be given until after his discharge, as it would belong to the creditor. He had mentioned this circumstance.

The Chief Commissioner thought Mr. Mathews had done quite right, and that under the circumstances mentioned it did not belong to the creditors. The Court ordered the insolvent to be discharged. No assignee was appointed.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel arrived in town yesterday morning, from a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle.

Monsieur de St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador, visited Mdlle. Rachel yesterday to congratulate her upon her arrival in England, and in the evening Madame de St. Aulaire received this great tragedian at her family dinner party.

Mendelssohn.—This celebrated musicius, we understand, will play upon the organ at St. Peter's Church, Cornhill, on Sunday morning next, the 12th instant.

Mdlle. Rachel will make her first appearance this evening at her Majesty's Theatre, in Corneille's tragedy of Les Horaces.

The Times of to-day says, "A marked sensation was produced in the city this morning, by intelligence that the highly respectable firm of Briggs, Thurburn, and Co., had suspended their payments. The immediate cause of this unfortunate event is understood to be the continued absence of returns from Calcutta for advances made upon consignments, and of remittances to meet draughts upon the house."

Some sensation has been caused on the Stock Exchange this afternoon by the appearance of a second edition of the morning papers, containing letters relative to China, which are looked upon as rather serious. Large bodies of Chinese were expected to make a descent upon the British troops, who were nevertheless represented to be perfectly ready to meet them.

VARIETIES.

CHARLES THE NINTH'S ARROGANCE. It is stated that Charles the Ninth of France, when almost a child, thus addressed the Parliament of Paris: "Your duty is to obey my orders: presume not to examine what they are, but obey them. I know better than you what the state and expediency require." This was the spirit that uniformly animated the Kings of the House of Valois.

STEAMING ON THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI.—One may congratulate oneself as having achieved something extraordinary if one descends the 2029 miles from Pittsburgh to New Orleans on the Ohio and Mississippi without accident. The voyage on these two rivers is very dangerous, not only from the rapidity of the latter river, which sweeps everything along in its current, but by the character of those who conduct the navigation. The carelessness and want of attention of these men, added to their puerile ambition of outstripping each other in speed by a few minutes, is the cause of most of the disasters which occur. It is thus [illegible] for passengers to [illegible] striking their boats. The proprietors [illegible] to [illegible] which it is said that a [illegible] of vessels to insure its patronage; however fragile the hull may be, cargo is piled on the deck until it is almost level with the water; to combine the greatest advantage of glory and profit, and not to lose in speed, the engines, which are as fragile as the rest, are forced to the utmost of their power, and sometimes beyond, as the bursting of many of them too fatally proves. What safety can be expected upon such craft, conducted by rude and careless men, who know no law but their own will, and who, instead of being occupied with the cares of navigation, are always to be found extended by the fire with the passengers, and quit not their apathetic demeanour save to preside at meals, to receive passengers or cargo, or for a trial of speed with some other steamboat? These causes excepted, they meddle not with the steersman or engineer, who act without control. A captain has but to look a little after the cook, treat every one with equal vulgarity, and, after stopping for every passenger from the shores, make up in bellowing and swearing for lost time, and he is sure of becoming popular, and of being screened in case of accident. Some reason for excuse must be found; they will say his enemies seduced his engineer, &c., &c.; and if nothing can be said, it will be ascribed to Fate. Les Etats Unis, from M. Isadore Lowenstein.

"TAKE MY HONOUR, TAKE MY LIFE."—When LOUIS the Fourteenth was with the army, a dragoon, mounted on a spirited horse which he could not manage, passed near the King contrary to his intention, and struck him. The King, in the first impulse of passion, struck him several times with his cane. The dragoon, deeply affronted, presented the pummel of his pistol to the King, saying, "Sire, you have taken my honour, take my life." The King replied, "Cavalier, forget; and I will remember it to make reparation." The dragoon kept his word, by rapidly promoting the dragoon.

IMPROVEMENT IN ST. JAMES'S PARK. During the last few days a number of workmen have been busily employed by the Parisian Bitumen Company, of Mill-wall, Poplar, in laying down a new Patent Roadway, commencing from the Spring-gardens entrance, extending to the area opposite the Horse Guards. It is of a peculiar nature, and entirely different from that laid down some time since facing Buckingham Palace. The work now in progress has been ordered by Government as a specimen, and if durable will be adopted throughout the Park.

HOW TO FLATTER SUCCESSFULLY.—A Portuguese merchant brought an exceedingly brilliant diamond to court one day, about which all the courtiers were in ecstacies, but which the King, being accustomed to exquisite things, did not so much admire. "Well," said his Majesty, addressing the merchant, "what would you ask a gentleman for this diamond, if one took a fancy to it?" "Sire," answered the Portuguese, "seventy thousand ducats, the sum which I gave for this offspring of the sun." "Why did you give so much money? who did you suppose would purchase it?" inquired the King. "I knew," answered the merchant, "that there was a Philip the Second in the world." This reply pleased the monarch more than the beauty of the diamond, and he immediately ordered the sum to be paid the merchant, with a recompense in addition.

Yesterday a ballot was taken at the East India House, for the election of a director, in the room of Lieutenant-Colone. Patrick Vans Agnew, C.B., deceased. At six o'clock the glasses were closed and delivered to the scrutineers, who reported that the election had fallen on Mr. Elliot Macnaghten.

KING AND QUEEN OF THE MARQUESAS. The French papers state that the Danae frigate is ordered to convey two transports to the Marquesas Islands, laden with troops and stores for the new colony. It is no doubt in the recollection of the public that the holiday costume of the King was limited to a French colonel's uniform and one shirt, while that of her Majesty was confined within the narrow circumference of only one petticoat, which had long done female duty in a theatrical way on board the French Admiral's frigate. It is to be hoped that the French Minister of Marine will take this opportunity of supplying the civilized wants of both these illustrious personages; and, in addition to a liberal supply of integuments for his Majesty, will not forget the claims of his better half. Care must, however, be taken to designate the uses of the respective articles, lest in their appropriation the Queen should haply indue her limbs in garments which ordinarily denote authority. Petticoat influence is by no means of rare occurrence in the Polynesian islands, but it must not be suffered to usurp the sterner attributes of masculine dignity. It is rumoured in political circles that the Danae will be the bearer to King Yoteee of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour; and his Majesty is no doubt as deserving of that distinction as the defender of Mostaganem, or the French consul at Barcelona.

RUSSIAN APPETISER.—By way of digesting our luncheon, a ceremony was performed, which, if we had not undergone the deal at a friend's house in the Russian capital, and which our lamented friend Prince Butera, would have astonished us not a little. A dozen soldiers placed themselves in two files close to each other, and took up each of the party in turn in their arms, and tossed them in the air, catching them again on their arms, and throwing them up again, as quickly as possible, a considerable height. This operation is performed very expertly; the patient who undergoes the business keeps his arms close to his sides, and his legs stretched stiffly out, and feels no sort of inconvenience. It is exactly like being tossed in a blanket. This is accompanied with singing some of their many pleasing but monotonous national airs, to which the softness of the language gives a harmony they do not intrinsically possess.—Cottrell's Siberia.

THE PREVENTION OF SUICIDE. The physician should constantly bear in mind this important fact connected with the suicidal disposition, viz., that those who have had an opportunity of effecting their purpose according to their own pre-conceived notions. A person who has attempted to drown himself will not be readily influenced to cut his throat. A morbid idea is frequently associated in the maniac's mind with a particular kind of death, and if he be removed from all objects likely to awaken this notion, the inclination to suicide may be removed.—Forbes Winslow's Anatomy of Suicide.

HAYDN'S CHILDHOOD.—The father of this great man was a wheelwright in a sequestered Austrian village, and exercised, besides, the functions of sexton and organ-blower to the village church. "He had a fine tenor voice, was fond of his organ, and of music in general. On one of those journeys which the artisans of Germany often undertake, being at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, he learned to play a little on the harp; and on holidays, after church, he used to take his instrument while his wife sang. The birth of Joseph did not alter the habits of the peaceful family. The little domestic concerts came round every week; and the child, standing before his parents, with two pieces of wood in his hands, one of which served him as a violin, and the other as a bow, constantly accompanied his mother's voice. Haydn, when loaded with years, and with glory, often recalled the simple airs which he had sung—so deep and indelible an impression had those first melodies made on his soul." It would not be difficult so find in Yorkshire such families as those of the good newleighs, and such domestic concerts as those which make the genius of Illustrious son. Out of some family of this sort, too, an English Haydn might have sprung, were a musical education as generally accessible in England as it is in Germany.—G. Hogarth.

VIENNA.—We quitted, as all travellers must, Vienna with great regret. Besides the immense number of things worthy of notice, the general spirit of the place is so gay and happy-like, however it may be to the constant resident, residing to the temporary sojourner can be more agreeable. Everything in the shape of amusement, the finest music, and works of art, are on all hands offered to his attention; and in no part of the world are strangers received with more cordial kindness. In your inn, in public places, in private society, you feel the same spirit. In public vehicles, nay, even sitting on a public seat, you find the same friendly and unrepulsive disposition amongst the very best classes; and we found it enough to be respectable English, often in this very manner to begin an acquaintance of the most charming kind. Surely this could occur in no other capital in the world. The English language here, as in Hungary, is studied by the young with avidity. English literature is extensively read; and it is a real pleasure to the refined classes to converse with you on England, and its society, arts, and books. The ideas, too, which we cherish of nature, a love for nature stronger than death, is the very spirit of Christianity. Undoubtedly this spirit is faintly comprehended by the best of us. Some of its most striking expressions are still derided in society. Society still rests on selfish principles. Men sympathise with the prosperous and great, not the abject and down-trodden. But, amid this degradation, brighter glimpses of Christianity are caught than before. There are deeper, wider sympathies with mankind. The idea of raising up the mass of human beings to intellectual, moral, and spiritual dignity is penetrating many minds. Among the signs of a brighter day, perhaps the West India emancipation is the most conspicuous; for in that the right of the most despised men have been reversed. To me this event does not stand alone. It is a sign of the triumph of Christianity, and a presage and herald of grander victories of truth and humanity. Christianity did not do its last work when it broke the slave's chain. No: this was but a type of what it is to achieve. Since the African was emancipated the drunkard has been set free. We may count the disenthralled from intemperance by hundreds of thousands, almost by millions; and this work has been achieved by Christian truth and Christian love. In this we have a new proof of the coming of Christ in his kingdom: and the grand result of these and other kindred movements of our times should be to give us a new faith, in what Christianity is to accomplish. We need this faith. We are miserably wanting in it. We scarcely believe what we see of the triumphs of the cross. This is the most disastrous unbelief of our times. I am pointed now and then to an infidel, as he is called—a man who denies Christianity. But there is a sadder sight: it is that of thousands and millions who profess Christianity, but have no faith in its power to accomplish the work to which it is ordained; no faith in the power of Christ over the passions, prejudices, and the corrupt institutions of men; no faith in the end of his mission, in the regenerating energy of his spirit and truth. Let this day, my friends, breathe into all our souls a new trust in the destines of our race. Let us look on the future with new hope.—Dr. Channing's Last Discourse.

PROGRESS OF KNOWLEDGE. The mind cannot unknow. All knowledge attained, makes more necessary. There is a knowledge which creates doubt, that nothing but a more extensive knowledge can satisfy; and he who stops in the difficulty will be perplexed and uncomfortable for life.

VILLAGE CHURCHES.—The situations chosen for village churches seem to me to prove the care bestowed to "find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the Mighty God of Jacob," in the loviest spot which the surrounding scenery could furnish. Here, for example, the low square tower is almost hidden in an old wood of oaks, a mossy forest path being cleared to its southern porch: its grey walls are covered with many a lichen, and the churchyard wall is soft with its mossy cushion. Very pleasant in a summer's evening is the soft green light, which, as the branches wave to and fro, quivers within the still chancel: lovely in autumn the forest tints which flush to the sun, as they hang over the dewy churchyard. Here, at the foot of a steep hill, the steep-pitched chancel throws up its roof; and the eastern triplet glitters to the eye of the distant beholder like lasers of gold. Here, the swift waters of some ancient river glide by the churchyard; and the vesper bell and the rippling stream make sweet music for the traveller on the spring evening. Here again, perched on the summit of a sea-beaten cliff, of rudely squared blocks of granite, and partaking, as it were, the nature of the crags with which it is surrounded, the massy old tower sends out its peal to the conflicting elements, as if in accordance with the beautiful belief, that the spirits of the air, and the powers of darkness, are awed by the sound of the bell, and cease from vexing the winds and the sea. There, in the midst of a marshy tract of country, is one little oasis of limes and elms; and in that green and quiet sanctuary, through the flickering of the sunny leaves, gleam the intracies and flower-knops of a decorated east window. There again, between two mountain ridges, and at the head of a quiet lake, on a low green knoll, the humble chapel, with its simple bell-gable, and slightly projecting rood-turret, catches on its walls the bright flashing thrown off from the laughing waters. So it is with religious houses. And one thing has remarkably struck me in the ruins of those which I have visited. Many of the sites chosen seem to have consulted, in fixing on the site of their future foundations, various motives,—such as convenience, or retirement: the Cistercians alone sought devotedly and abstractedly the loveliest spots; as believing that in the shrines which their Creator had, as it were, marked for Himself, and in which He had bidden Nature to offer to him the choicest gifts,—the jewels of her autumn tints, the living fanwork of her greenwood vaulting, the tracing of her interlacing branches, the incense of her breathing flowers, the music of her gentlest gales, her whispering foliage, her sweetest birds, her gliding waters, they also could most suitably worship Him. Quiet nooks, beloved by some ancient river, as Kirkstall; rocky banks, encircling with verdant foliage, as Fountains; woody and sequestered [illegible] as Netley; [illegible] plots of [illegible] and romantic steam, as Tintern; shady and silent valleys, as Furness; lovely shores, where the swift brook joins the sea, as Beaulieu;—such were the homes the Cistercians loved. And they have had their reward. While the prouder foundations of Reading, and S. Edmondsbury, and Hide have vanished like a dream, the houses of Cistercian devotees are still "familiar in our mouths as household words."—Hierologia; by the Rev. J. M. Neale.

Ecclesiology is a different thing from mere church architecture, as embracing both it and all its collateral branches of information as to church history and antiquities. Cicero, you say, says that it is next to impossible that a perfect orator should arise, because one that is so must have a perfect knowledge of all arts and sciences whatever. And so it is with the Ecclesiologist. First, he must be well versed in history, especially church history: antiquities are, of course, a part of his study; of masonry and carpentry he should have some idea: music, so far as Ecclesiastical compositions are concerned, comes within what he requires: something of geology he should know, to supply information respecting building stones; the glazier's art is by no means unknown to him: with embroidery, tapestry, and the like, he has much to do: of the goldsmith's craft he should know something, for the precious metals are in a church: of the potter's, for encaustic tiles: some knowledge in the value of labour and the price of materials is very proper: some acquaintance with sculpture is desirable: [illegible] to a certain degree, necessary, for the computations of the calendar: and, after all, these things will be of little avail by themselves. As Cicero says that none but a good man can be a good orator, much more may I say so of the Ecclesiologist; for who else can enter into the feeling which animated the design of our ancestors, and the absence of which makes the most correctly wrought details of modern times too often little more than a dead letter? Ibid.

MADEIRA. I doubt if you can, on the face of the earth, find so very a paradise as that sweet island. Would that I could set you by my side in the vine corridor of some one of the quintas, that half-way up the mountain overlook the city of Funchal! How readily can I recall the scene! At my side, the square stone pillars, roofed frescoed, that bear aloft the trellis canopy, lovingly embraced by the vine tendrils; the broad leaves, with their various shades of green, hardly allowing a view of the sky, and rustling pleasantly to the wind. One side of the corridor is fenced by a fuchsia hedge, flushing gloriously in the slant rays of the sun; the other, overhung by a luxuriance of roses, both white and red; the props themselves festooned with honeysuckles and green climbers. The pavement is curiously inlaid with black and white pebbles; at a little distance a fountain plays, cooling the air and refreshing the gardens. Through the rose-hedge we may gain some peeps into that same garden: we may see the ripe golden lemons which hang on this tree, the snowy orange-flowers which gleam from the green gloss of that; the thick border of geraniums, with the down of their leaves, and the purple or scarlet of their flowers; the passion-flower, the white iris, and a thousand more, which —for I am no botanist—I will not attempt to describe. Nor does there lack music—though not like the music of home; for many wild canaries and goldfinches do their best to entertain one, or rather join, to their utmost ability, the general hymn of Nature. The hum of insects, so pleasant in the shady lanes of England, is wanting here; but every now and then a lizard, scaling the low wall of our corridor, makes its appearance on the top, and, after surveying one for a moment with its bright little eyes, darts into some cranny of the rocks. We have the incense of roses, and myrtles, and oranges and honeysuckles;—who can wonder at the balminess of the gale? And then, our position commands the Bay of Funchal: the sun, now near the horizon, brings out the huge precipice of Cape Girao into the strongest relief; behind us, the mountains, seamed and scarred into many a rift, tower up, concealed here and there by a passing wreath of clouds; and above our heads, as if man would build a temple to God half way between earth and heaven, hangs the church of Nossa Senhora de Monte. Far below us Funchal lies crowded together, yet so that we may distinguish the red-dark tower and low spire of its cathedral, the cupolas of San Pedro and Santa Clara, and the tall white cross of the Jesuit's church. The bay lies before us, with clouds floating like islands (on account of our height) over its face: the play of the ripples is just visible; the rigging of the yachts, and of the one man-of-war that lies like a giant beside them, glow in the sun; and long tracts of golden and purple glory sleep on the sea, till they fade into the far horizon. The black Loo Fort—a sullen island amidst the cheerful ocean—contrasts well with the general hue of the scene; and, to the left, evening is darkening rapidly on the heights of Cape Garajao, and on the woody Palheiro.—Ibid.

ANGLING.

We have often thought that angling alone offers to man the degree of half business, half-idleness, which the fair sex find in their needlework or knitting, which, employing the hands, leaves the mind at liberty, and occupying the attention so far as is necessary to remove the painful sense of a vacuity, yet yields room for contemplation, whether upon things heavenly or earthly, cheerful or melancholy.—Quarterly Review.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

THE FLY-ROD.—Mr. Ronalds, in his "Fly-Fisher's Entymology," says, "Like the bow of the archer, the rod of the angler should be duly proportioned in dimensions and weight to the strength and stature of him who wields it. The strong or tall man may venture upon a rod about fourteen or fifteen feet long, but to the person who is shorter and less robust, one so short even as twelve or twelve feet and a half, and light in proportion, is recommended, as the command will be sooner obtained, and with very much less fatigue to the arm."

For my own part I would not use a rod longer than thirteen feet at the utmost, and this will be found long enough for most of the rivers in England. The best rods are those in three parts; ash for the bottom piece, hickory for the middle, and lancewood for the top, with a little piece of whalebone at the top, about five or six inches long; some recommend the top to be made of bamboo, and then you will not have any occasion for whalebone. Excellent rods of every description are now to be purchased in almost every part of the kingdom.

THE ROD FOR ROACH AND DACE should be light and perfectly taper, and for my own fishing I should prefer one fourteen to fifteen feet long, rather stiffer than a fly-rod, as much will depend upon your quickness in striking when you have a bite. Many anglers use running tackle, let them be fishing for what they may, that they may be ready for a large fish, should one chance to come that way. I, myself, when roach-fishing, with a maggot or gentle for a bait, have caught barbel nearly three pounds weight, which would have been rather difficult to manage had I not happened to be provided with a reel and a few yards of line.

THE BARBEL ROD for Barbel fishing, should be from twelve to fourteen feet long, strong, and a stiff top, for ledger bait or lodging plumb, be provided with an extra top, shorter and stiffer than the one for float-fishing.

YOUR PIKE ROD should be about fifteen feet long, very strong, and with large rings, that the line may run freely upon an emergency. Your barbel rod will be found to answer the purpose for pike-fishing.

LINES, for fly-fishing, should be about twenty-five yards long, composed of silk and hair, wound on a small brass reel, fixed to the butt end of the rod, and running through the rings, so that it may be shortened or lengthened at pleasure. For convenience in throwing, the line should be taper, and the best (the patent plaited line) may be bought at the principal fishing-tackle shops in London and the country. For roach-fishing I use a very fine, and for barbel and pike a strong, silk line.

BAITS.—The worm is the most general natural bait that can be used in angling. The lob or dew-worm is to be had during the spring and summer months; it will kill almost every description of fish, and is used as a ground-bait for barbel, &c. The small maiden dew is the best for the hook. There is a great variety of worms used; the brandling is a good bait for perch, dace, gudgeons, &c.; and the small red worm, this is good for all sorts of small fish, it is a universal favourite, and two on the hook together makes it very killing for larger kinds; the marsh-worm, tag-worm, segg-worm, and a long list of others too numerous to mention. The best method of baiting with a large worm is to enter the hook at the head, and to bring it down carefully to within a quarter of an inch of the tail—have a little very small sand with you to put the worm in previous to putting it on the hook and you will thread it all the easier. To bait with two small ones, enter the hook at the head of the first, bringing it down to the middle, then enter the second at the middle and bring it out near the head, and your bait is complete. Maggots, cod-baits, &c., will all be described in noticing the fish which take them. Hoping next week to get a more interesting part of the subject, I shall now conclude.

June 6th, 1842. A DISCIPLE OF IZAAK WALTON.

SALE OF THE EARL OF VERULAM'S THOROUGHBRED STOCK, AND OF THE DUKE OF GRAFTON AND OF LORD MAIDSTONE'S HUNTING STUDS.—Lord Verulam's sale of thoroughbred stock at Tattersall's on Monday attracted a numerous attendance of noblemen and hunting gentlemen. The principal lots did not fetch very high prices, being knocked down at the subjoined:—Coimbra, by Acteon, out of Brocard, 59 guineas; Chesnut, by Acteon, out of Corumb, 52 guineas; Baycott, by Buzzard, out of Brocard, 94 guineas. The three bay fillies by Economist, and Coimbra, were fetched moderate prices. Lord Maidstone's stud consisted of 20 valuable hunters, described as well known in Leicestershire and Warwickshire, and among them were the celebrated horses Harborough, the Devil, the Man of Kent, the Doctor, a good steeple-chaser, Victoria, Harlequin, Satirist, the whole of which were knocked down at fair prices. It was understood that the noble lord did not mean to give up the pleasures of the steeple-chase or the sports of the field. The Duke of Grafton's stud consisted of 30 valuable hunters, masters of weight; his grace, in consequence of his advanced age and increasing infirmities, being unable to follow the chase, having resolved to part with his hunting stud and fox-hounds. The horses fetched high prices.

THE FERNE ISLANDS.—Not long ago the gentlemen of the London Trinity House resolved to erect upon the Longstone Rock, close to Mr. Darling's lighthouse, two cottages—one, we understand, for Mr. W. Brooks Darling (Grace's brother), and the other to be as a reserve for the accommodation of the sufferers from shipwreck, which the dangerous navigation of these islands renders of such frequent occurrence. About twenty men are already employed on the rock, working the stones for the buildings, which, it is said, will cost the Trinity House above £2000. Mr. William Thompson and Mr. Andrew Gordon, of North Sunderland, are contractors for the work, under the superintendence of Mr. Duncan, the agent for the Trinity House.—Berwick Warder.

A block of stone, weighing thirty tons, was last week cut from the Duke of Buccleuch's freestone quarry at Granton, intended to form the statue of Lord Nelson, which is about to be erected in Trafalgar-square, London; it was shipped on Wednesday, to be conveyed here.

JUVENILE PRECOCITY. "Boy, what is your name?" "Robert, sir." "Yes, that is your Christian name: but what is your other name?" "Bob, sir."

KEEN SHAVING.—A market has commenced at Seaham harbour for the convenience of the colliery districts, and to improve and extend the trade at that place, the tradesmen undertaking to supply every article of as good quality and on the same terms as the larger towns in the district. On the last market-day, a pitman went into a barber's shop to get his week's crop removed from his chin, when having been duly soaped, and all ready for the operation of the razor, he suddenly started up and exclaimed, "Does thou shave at Durham prices?" "Yes," exclaimed the astonished shaver, "what for?" "Why," said the pitman, "if thou hadn't thou should have washed the soap off again, my lad, for we'll pay nae mair than Durham prices."—Newcastle Advertiser.

ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.—A further trial of the Atmospheric Railway took place at Wormwood Scrubbs. There were present, among other gentlemen, Mr. George Rennie, C.E., Lord Bruce, Hon. Thomas Vesey, Dr. Buckland, Dr. Arnott, Dr. Conquest, Mr. Cottam, Mr. Hallam, Professor Braithwaite, Sir John Croft, Mr. Vernon, Baron de Steinburg, Mr. George Palmer, Mr. Doull, C.E., Mr. C. Vignoles, C.E., Mr. Guthoven, C.E., Mr. James Pim, Jun., of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway, and a very large number of the first City capitalists. The experiments were higaly satisfactory. The speed attained was considerably above 40 miles per hour, and the vacuum varying from 24 to 25 inches of mercury.—Railway Times.

"Please, Ma'am, to give me a Christmas box," said a ragged little urchin, entering a pastry-cook's shop. "What claim have you upon me?" replied she; "I never saw you before." "Why, please, Ma'am, I's the boy wot looks in at the winder hevery morning to see wot o'clock it is ven hi goes to work."

SYDNEY SMITH AND THE RAILWAY PROPRIETORS.

This witty and facetious divine has again taken the field in the cause of humanity, and bids fair to become as great a terror to railway companies as he has already proved himself to be on several occasions to lay statesmen and the bench of bishops. The cause of the reverend gentleman's reappearance in print, is the objectionable practice of locking up passengers in the railway carriages, by which he contends all chance of escape in cases of accident is prevented; and, having put forth his views on the subject in the columns of a morning contemporary, the Directors of the Great Western joined issue, and the case came on to be argued at the bar of public opinion, as solemnly as the facetiousness of the waggish prosecutor would permit. We cannot find room for the whole of the reverend gentleman's last rejoinder; but the following passages will repay perusal, if, on no other account, as a sample of the sportive style in which even a divine can treat an otherwise nervous and melancholy subject.

SIR,—Since the letter upon railroads which you were good enough to insert in your paper, I have had some conversation with two gentlemen officially connected with the Great Western. Though nothing could be more courteous than their manner, nor more intelligible than their arguments, I remain unshaken as to the necessity of keeping doors open.

There is, in the first place, the effect of imagination, the idea that all escape is impossible, that (let what will happen) you must sit quiet in first class No. 2, whether they are pounding you into a jam, or burning you into a cinder, or crumbling you into a human powder. These excellent directors, versant in wood and metal, seem to require that the imagination should be sent by some other conveyance, and that only loads of unimpass oned, unintellectual flesh and blood should be carted along on the Western rail; whereas, the female homo is a screaming, parturient, interjectional, hysterical animal, whose delicacy and timidity monopolists even (much as it may surprise them) must be taught to consult. The female, in all probability, never would jump out; but she thinks she may jump out when she pleases; and this is intensely comfortable.

But the truth is—and so (after a hundred monopolizing experiments on public patience) the railroad directors will find it there can be no other dependence for the safety of the public than the care which every human being is inclined to take of his own life and limbs. Everything beyond this is the merely lazy tyranny of monopoly, which makes no distinction between human beings and brown-paper parcels. If riding were a monopoly, as travelling in carriages is now become, there are many gentlemen whom I see riding in the park upon such false principles, that I am sure the cantering and galloping directors would strap them, in the ardour of their affection, to the saddle, padlock them to the stirrups, or compel them to ride behind a policeman of the stride; and nothing but a motion from O'Brien, or an order from Gladstone, could release them.

* * * * *

Leave me to escape in the best way I can, as the fire offices very kindly permit me to do. I know very well the danger of getting out on the off-side; but escape is the affair of a moment. Suppose a train to have passed at that moment. I know I am safe from any other trains for twenty minutes or half-an-hour; and if I do get out on the off side, I do not remain in the valley of death between the two trains, but am over to the opposite bank in an instant—only half roasted, or merely browned—certainly not done enough for the Great Western directors.

* * * * *

Railroad travelling is a delightful improvement of human life. Man is become a bird; he can fly longer and quicker than a solan goose. The mamma rushes 60 miles in two hours to the aching finger of her coughing and declining grammar boy. The early Scotchman scratches himself in the morning mists of the north, and has his porridge in Piccadilly before the setting sun. The Puseyite priest, after a rush of 100 miles, appears with his little volume of nonsense at the breakfast of his bookseller. Everything is near, everything is immediate—time, distance, and delay are abolished. But, though charming and fascinating as all this is, we must not shut our eyes to the price we shall pay for it. There will be every three or four years some dreadful massacre—whole trains will be hurled down a precipice, and 200 or 300 persons will be killed on the spot. There will be, every now and then, a great consumption of human bodies, as there has been at Paris; then all the newspapers up in arms—a thousand regulations, forgotten as soon as the directors dare—loud screams of the velocity whistle—monopoly locks and bolts, as before.

* * * * * * *

The first person of rank who is killed will put everything in order, and produce a code of the most careful rules. I hope it will not be one of the Bench of Bishops; but if there be so destined, let the burnt bishop, the unwilling Latimer, remember that, however painful gradual concoction by the fire may be, his death will produce unspeakable benefit to the public. Even Sodor and Man will be better than nothing. From that moment the bad effects of the monopoly are destroyed; no more fatal deference to the directors; no despotic incarceration; no barbarous inattention to the anatomy and physiology of the human body; no command to locomotive prisons with warrant. We shall then find it possible

Voyager libre sans mourir.

SYDNEY SMITH.

'DREAMS OF THE HEARTS.'—Alas, they pass too soon, and when the stern reality of truth breaks in upon us, we sometimes feel very deeply their fallacy. And yet they never entirely desert us; in childhood, in our thoughtful moments, we live in a world of our own creation, and as we grow up, at times in the solitude of our chambers, they come, and perhaps lap us in Elysium for the moment; but when business calls us forth into the world again, and they are dissipated, too often many of us feel bitterly the difference between 'Dreams of the Heart,' and realities of the world.—M. H. B.

THE MIND.—To occupy the mind with useful employments, is among the best methods of guarding it from surrendering itself to dissipation. To occupy it with such employments regularly, is among the best methods of leading it to love them.—Gisborne.

KNOWLEDGE.—'Eighteen years!' says a boarding school girl on her finally quitting the seminary; 'well, I hope I know enough now! I can speak French and Italian—can draw, dance, sing, play, and embroider. How strange that one head can hold so much!' Such is too often the feeling with which girls leave school. 'Seventy years!' said a gray-haired philosopher, as he slowly raised his head from the volume he had been pouring over; 'yes, just seventy! and yet how little do I know! I am going to the grave before I have acquired the rudiments of knowledge.'—Woman's Worth.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

It is a sad, but too sure, consequence of public calamity, of whatever kind, that the greatest pressure of its misery should, in almost every instance of human endurance, fall most heavily upon the poor. A larger amount of injustice—more far-spread wrong—heavier sacrifices, and more unequal burthens, may be borne by the rich, under any of the evil circumstances of imperfect human legislation; but, still, in any condition where society is well ordered—in any state short of anarchy or revolution—the maximum of personal and general suffering inflicted by the sins of the nation, the visitations of Providence, or the misfortunes of the time, is invariably endured by the classes to whom poverty is more familiar than plenty, and whose philosophy should be of that severe school which preaches "contentment under want." This evil is inherent in the nature of society, and the only barriers that communities and legislatures have been able to set up, in amelioration of the condition of the lower and poorer classes, have consisted in a provision of means of employment to ensure comfort—in a cheapening of the ordinary pabulum of the labouring population—a system of emigration, when the land is overpeopled—a redress of crying grievances, engendered by any grown corruptions—a voice in the Legislature for those to whom honest industry has brought the reward of toil—public schools, charities, and hospitals—and, lastly, Poor-laws, to guard against destitution, and punishments to check crime. There may be sects in society that will not admit of beggars—but there can be no great community without more poor than rich: the wealthiest people are the fewest—the middling classes, ranging through all the channels of commerce, from retired enjoyment down to struggling, plodding work exceed the wealthier ranks in numbers (and perhaps in influence, too, under monarchical forms of government); but the useful serving people of the land, the labourers, the artificers, the toilers for their daily bread—these make up the millions, to which the two other divisions of society only bear the proportions of thousands and hundreds, and by these the oppressions of public crime or affliction are always most practically felt. It is true that the pain recoils that, by the very sympathies of our nature, the suffering of the multitude is re-diffused through the whole social system, and becomes part of the common woe; but this affords only another reason why, when all the ordinary precautions of society have failed, when law is inefficient to stem the torrent of destitution, and when Famine, in spite of human foresight, stands and shivers under the lap of Luxury, and beneath the eye of Wealth, the energies of a nation ought to be invoked and active, and all men be taught to feel the claims the importance, and the consequences of public distress.

We are led into these remarks by a reflective view of the aspect of the events of the times, as they follow each other with startling rapidity and effect. We do not write in a Radical spirit—far from it. We are the advocates of religion, order, and the laws; but our politics are irrespective of all party—the politics of humanity; they are founded upon the high and broad basis of Christian brotherhood; and we are proud in the avowal, that it is our glory to championize the poor. Yet, we would warn them also; and, while advocating their interests with the Legislature, we would gag and stifle, as a foul and fell mischief, the dangerous doctrine which would seek for a redress of grievances, less by the calm and manly appeal of justice, than with the simple clamour of agitating discontent.

The truth, however, is now forced upon us, that, first, to raise the personal condition, and, secondly, to purify the morals of the poor, have become considerations of immediate and paramount necessity; and we cannot refrain from the belief that the means of gaining these desired ends are ramified through every artery of our domestic policy, and embrace some of the most salient strongholds of our constitutional law.

The last winter was a dreadful one for the poor: the spring, while giving new fertilization to the soil, and fresh buds and flowers to the beauty of external nature, has held forth little promise of gladness to the thousands whom Christmas had well nigh starved; and now, in the heart and ripeness of warm and cheerful summer, the rags of misery are still fluttering to its breeze, and the voice of poverty is mocking the plenty of its reign. The workhouses are full—this is dreadful; but the prisons are full also, and this is worse. The cry for corn has swollen by hunger into the howling of the wolf, and the "clap-trap" of "cheap-bread" has been almost made sacred by the bitter arguments of want. In the sister Kingdom dreadful riots have ensued, and at Ennis, in Clare, the tragedy which began with poverty has ended in blood. In our own manufacturing districts the people are pining with famine, and, as it were, under the shadow of death; and although the rich have got up festivities for their benefit, and wealth has opened its purse in their behalf—although benevolence has joined hands with charity, and the pulpit and the throne have spoken with appealing voices to win them succour, still there is a frightful and appalling wretchedness wherever the people swarm, and those who are not visited with the tyranny of the workhouse, or the retribution of the gaol, are either crushed by their misfortunes or only supported by their crimes. Their sufferings and their demoralization are horrible alike.

The poor-laws—the dreadful and distressing poor-laws—here present the ugly grievance which humanity is loudest in its cry to remove.

Again, the factory and mining systems have increased the amount of general pauper wretchedness, with individual horrors and corruptions that have startled the Legislature into action, and will not bear the public gaze.

The bad influences that have been exerted at elections—the frightful mass of bribery and perjury that has been recorded against the people—their desperate carelessness of the obligation of the franchise, and recklessness of honour in its exercise—all these are proofs of an abandonment of principle, which is too often the concomitant of poverty, led into temptation by the possession of a privilege to do wrong, without an impulse to prefer the right: and in all these we find the worst mischiefs of deplorable suffering and growling discontent.

There is, in fact, in the condition of the poorer classes, a mixture of sin and sorrow, which we heartily desire to see analyzed and cast away; we blame them less than we pity them—we sympathize more than we condemn; we give great preponderance to their grievances over their crimes, and therefore we invoke the energies of all thinking men and good patriots—we implore a full social consideration of the destitution which has been this year (and still is) climaxed in our land of liberty among the lower classes of our fellow-creatures, and we ardently pray for the exercise of such Divine mercy and human wisdom as shall temper the privations of poverty and make the lowly man sensible of his brotherhood with the rich.

This, we are persuaded, is only to be achieved by searching exposures and diligent political sagacity exercised upon every point of our domestic legislation, and so exercised as to make it one of the brightest and purest fountains of the happiness of the empire.

TEXAN MOUNTED MILITIA.

TEXAN MOUNTED MILITIA

The latest accounts from Texas bring intelligence of threats of an invasion of the independence of that state, and of a probable call of her citizens to arms. The Texans are a young, but a gallant people; they have achieved their freedom with spirit, and now that the country is acknowledged by Great Britain in its separate condition, and that they are beginning to take rank for it as a nation, they will have fresh inducements to uphold their character for courage, firmness, and energy, in any political or warlike struggles in which they may engage. A strong interest has arisen in this country in all that concerns Texas of late years. The land was marked out to English enterprise as one full of temptations to emigration. The climate is salubrious and healthful beyond compare—the soil deliciously fertile—the natural scenery beautiful—the people enterprising, ambitious, and bold. At last the admirable work of Mr. Kennedy, and his vigorous letters in the Morning Chronicle, spread a more intimate knowledge of the Texas among the British public, and tended, in no small degree, to confirm the destinies of the country in a nations point of view. The long-postponed recognition was given by the English Government. Mr. Kennedy himself was allowed to proceed but in a sort of semi-official capacity; he returned the accredited chargé d'affaires of the Texas to this country, and is now, we believe the natural protector of her subjects upon the British shores. Doubtless we shall yet have a thousand illustrations of their land and manners from his own eloquent pen; and, in the meanwhile, in the spirited bit of grouping before the reader, we exhibit the character which chance has afforded us of the Mounted Militia of the New State, just as they are equipped for engagements such as those in which they may shortly have to contend.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The express of Sunday brought with it an intimation that, as some importance is attached to the French and English ambassadors quitting their posts at the present moment, Lord Cowley, it is said, will remain in Paris.

There was nothing of importance in the Paris papers.

The Danaé frigate sailed from Toulon on the 9th, for Monte Video, having on board two French diplomatic agents.

The relations between Lord Cowley and the Minister for Foreign Affairs continued to be of the most friendly nature.

The Commerce persisted in maintaining the truth of its statement, that a complete rupture had taken place between Queen Christina and the leading members of her party, in consequence of her refusal to join in or sanction any further insurrection in Spain. The Commerce, therefore, calls upon the Regent to publish an amnesty to recal to Spain the refugee Maderados.

Prince de Joinville quitted Paris on Saturday, for Toulon, to join the Belle Poule frigate, in order to participate in the manœuvres of Admiral Hugon's squadron, which was seen on the 7th, twenty-five leagues off, S.S. E., steering N.E.

The Moniteur Parisien announces that the King of the French had reduced the terms of imprisonment of M. Lange Levy, printer of the Charivari, and M. Prou, printer of the Mode, sentenced for seditious libels—the former to six months' confinement, the latter to three months—to two months and one month.

The leading articles in Tuesday's Paris prints are principally on the forthcoming electoral struggle.

SPAIN.—General Rodil had, up to Monday, failed in forming a Cabinet. This was Espartero's last hope to make a Ministry out of the Ayacuchos, or of the friends who had served with him in South America.

A banquet of Ministerial Deputies was given in Madrid, at which toasts were drunk to "the Constitution," the "Queen," "the Regent," "the Ministers," "the President of the Congress," "to the Memories of Mina, Riego," &c. The Minister of the Interior had published a circular against the partisans of the constitution of 1842, as announced in Monday's columns

Letters from Barcelona of the 7th instant announce that some disturbances had taken place in that town, on account of the determination evinced by the operatives not only to resist by force the importation of foreign manufactured goods, but to tear off the dresses of those persons whom they saw that are wearing articles not of Catalan make. It appears that a party of workmen, having by violence stripped some individuals having continental clothes on, then made a bonfire of the spoil. The authorities restored order, but a painful impression was left on the foreign mercantile community resident at Barcelona, that neither life nor property was safe with this excitement of the populace.

Our advices from Madrid by the regular mail are of the 7th, one day in arrear of the telegraphic news, confirming Rodil's failure to form a Cabinet. Espartero, it is stated in private letters, was decided on not dissolving the Cortes, so that he will be compelled to make a Ministry out of the Coalition.

The frigate Esperanza was to sail with her Majesty's ship Hirondelle on a cruise to the coast of Catalonia.

Barcelona letters of the 8th state that the Carlist bands in Catalonia were on the increase. Felip had lately entered the town of Ripoll, seized its garrison, and got off after levying contributions without being molested.

THE LEVANT MAIL.—We are in possession of our Constantinople correspondence of the 27th, our Alexandria letters of the 26th, Smyrna journals of the 29th ult., and Malta papers of the 5th instant, brought by the Levant mail of the 11th instant to Marseilles.

The representatives of England, France, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, on the 27th ult., held a conference with Sarim Effendi, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the subject, it was supposed, of Syria.

Sir Stratford Canning having succeeded in procuring the recall of Ashker Pacha, Mahmud Pacha, late Governor of Angora, has been appointed to succeed the former.

The Austrian Observer, in a Constantinople letter of the 25th ult., mentions the dismissal of Hadschi Saib Pacha, the Governor of the Dardanelles.

Our correspondent transmits to us three official documents, the first of a note Sir Stratford Canning, dated Pera, the 12th ult., on the subject of the commercial treaty; secondly, an important official memorandum of the Porte, addressed to the Danish Minister, refusing the firman to allow a frigate of his nation to enter the Dardanelles, on account of the convention of the 13th of July, signed by the five powers, confirming the right of the Sultan to shut the Dardanelles and Bosphorus to all vessels of war; and, lastly, an order addressed by the Porte to the Greek Patriarch, prescribing certain regulations for the printing of religious and other works of the Christians in Turkey.

The intelligence from Persia, received in Constantinople, was stated to be favourable to British policy. The Shah was observing strict neutrality, and the report that he had been sending troops to Herat, to encourage the Afghans in their insurrection against our rule, turns out to be false.

The Circassians expected renewed hostilities from Russia. The former had lost the fort of Soobashee, but were still confident.

Little or nothing is mentioned as to the progress of the Greek negotiations.

Jevich Bey, one of the Secretaries of the Council of Justice, had been sent by the Porte to Aivaly to arrange the troubled state of that country, many families having fled from it.

The report gained ground in Alexandria, that the English Government was arranging with Austria to forward the overland Mail from Egypt to Trieste, and from thence to the Rhine, to descend as far as Cologne, and thus join the railroad at Ostend, as the distance saved is about 700 miles by the Alexandria and Trieste route. Our commerce would have reason to rejoice if their communications were relieved from the fangs of the French post-office administration, which has proved itself to be the bigoted opponent of rapid communication, by the stoppage of all mercantile as well as newspaper expresses.

There is little news from Egypt. The Pacha on the 26th resolved to levy three per cent., ad valorem duty, with the right of inland and municipal dues. This is in opposition to the Hatti Scheriff, which fixed a five per cent duty to cover inland as well as outward dues.

Our Malta letters of the 5th state that the squadron under Sir W. Owen had returned from its cruise to Sicily on the 4th. The Savage left for Tunis on the 3rd. It was not known whether any necessity would exist to send a squadron to Tripoli, now that Ashker Pacha had been recalled by the Porte, on the desire of Sir S. Canning. The Padre Ryllo, a Jesuit affair, rages fiercely at Malta.

THE GARRISON OF GIBRALTAR.—The following melancholy passage is extracted from a private letter, addressed to one of his friends, in England by an officer of the 3rd Native Infantry:—

"AHMEDABAD, April 22, 1842.—Intelligence has just arrived that these poor fellows have been destroyed to a man. There were about 25 officers and 700 men, sick included. The sepoys could not hold their muskets, and the Ghazis referred to in the P. S., perceiving this, closed upon and destroyed them."

WATERLOO.

June 18, 1842.

Yes! more than twenty years have sped
In change o'er old and new,
Since the battle's stern array was formed,
Since the banners proudly flew,
Since the hostile hosts in their fury met
On the field of Waterloo.

How strangely then were the hearts of men
At variance with the scene!
The bayonet gleamed and the rifle flashed
From the rich and green,
And rows of the deadly cannon stood
With the waving corn between.

The morning broke, but did not bring
The light of a summer's sun,
For it rose o'er the earth in cloud and gloom,
And the day, that in storm had begun,
When it sank in night in the western sky,
Left the conflict lost and won

And the trampled soil lay thickly strewn
With the wreck of the battle's pride;
The plumes defaced and the banners torn,
Were scattered far and wide,
With the broken weapons of either host
In the struggle sorely tried.

But sadder still were the human forms
Which mingled among them lay,
And the sounds of anguish, the feeble groan,
Or the shriek of wild dismay,
And all things than which the feeling heart
Must turn with a sigh away.

But to day the summer's sun will rise
On a scene as calm and fair,
As if man's passion, and pain, and strife,
Had never been witnessed there;
No harsher sound than the linnet's note
Will rise on the morning air.

With no less leaf fair will the flowrets bloom,
Nor the grass less softly wave,
Because they spring from the earth that hides
Full many a warrior's grave;
The greensward, like a canopy,
Will shadow the sleeping brave.

For many a time has the ploughshare pass'd
Where the hostile swords have been;
Thou would'st not think that the grassy turf
Had ever a hue but green;
Those few swelling hillocks are all that tell
Of another and sadder scene.

And the lot of the rival chiefs may teach
How varied man's fate may be
One captive died in a lonely isle,
In the distant Southern Sea,
His dwelling, his dungeon and last, his tomb,
But the Victor—where is he?

He lives—and sits at a princely board,
With his comrades gather'd round;
Tho' fewer they meet on each coming day,
By the closer tie they're bound;
Each cup they fill is of bygone days,
With thrilling memories crown'd;
But while one is drunk, there is silence kept,
That says more than a clarion's sound.

So should it be: let a homage deep
Their memory oft renew.
Time should not be suffer'd unmark'd to sweep
O'er the names of the brave and true,
O'er those who are sleeping the soldier's sleep
On the field of Waterloo!

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The chief subject of discussion was the motion of LORD CAMPBELL relative to the case of the Scotch witness, whose evidence in a recent trial a Stirling had been impugned on the ground of his religious opinions. After narrating the facts of the case, he contended that the course which had been pursued was contrary to the received and admitted law of England, as established by rule and precedent, and that if the law of Scotland did not assimilate in this matter with the law of England, it ought to be altered.

The LORD CHANCELLOR had communicated with the Scotch judges, who vindicated the course which had been pursued on the occasion referred to, by affirming its conform ty with the law of Scotland. He (the LORD CHANCELLOR) gave no opinion as to the wisdom or policy of the law; it was enough that, in the interests of justice, it had not been violated.

Several of the law lords took part in the discussion, Lords DENMAN, BROUGHAM, &c., which was closed by LORD CAMPBELL expressing a hope that it would not be forgotten, that it was the opinion of all their lordships who had taken part in the debate, that the proceedings which had taken place at Stirling would have been stopped by the law of England; and that there was every reason to believe that the law of the two countries was the same.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

In the House of Commons, amongst the various questions asked before public business commenced, was one from Mr. HUTT respecting the proposed duty on the exportation of coal. Sir R. PEEL intimated that the Government have altered their original determination, and intend to lay a duty of 2s. on round, and 1s. on screened, coal

In answer to Mr. Chilvers, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER took the opportunity of dispelling the public delusion, as to the extreme depreciation of the gold coinage. It seems that the utmost depreciation does not exceed from one and a quarter to one and a half per cent., so that a deduction of threepence from the value of any light sovereign is the utmost that should be exacted.

Mr. O'CONNELL asked if there would be any objection to laying the coroner's inquisition on the table of the house, relating to the dreadful transactions at Ennis, in Ireland

Sir R. PEEL said that the Irish government had promptly sent down a barrister to investigate the whole matter, and, as the parties implicated by the coroner's inquest must take their trial, he hoped that nothing would be asked for which might tend to prejudice the proceedings.

The committee on the Tariff was resumed.

Mr. MITCHELL proposed to raise the duty on cables from £6 to 8 per ton, arguing that the government rate of duty would not give sufficient protection to the interests concerned

Mr GLADSTONE replied, and, after a short discussion, the amendment was negatived by 169 to 35

Mr. GEORGE BANKES proposed the continuance of the duty on stones for building purposes, chiefly with the view to the protection of the quarriers in the Isle of Portland

Mr. CHRISTIE, in supporting the Government proposition, read some statements respective to the condition of the Isle of Portland quarriers, and expressed his regret that Mr Ferrand was not present to listen to the fact, that the truck system was in stringent operation, not amongst manufacturers connected with the Anti-Corn-law League, but in a Conservative stronghold in Dorsetshire.

After a few words from LORD ASHLEY, Mr. GLADSTONE contended that a continuance of the present duty—20 per cent.—on so trade an article, was more than even the parties interested themselves asked for.

The amendment was withdrawn

Lord HOWICK moved that the duty on foreign coffee be 7d., instead of the Government proposition of 8d., a pound

Mr GLADSTONE admitted that no serious objections could be brought against the proposition on its own grounds; but there were various considerations which induced the Government to resist it, the chief of which was the present state of our commercial negotiations with other countries for long coffee, and with whom we might hereafter make favourable conditions for the introduction of our manufactures, in return for a reduction of duty on their coffee.

Mr. HUME supported Lord Howick's proposition, and regretted he did not go further.

Sir PEEL admitted that, amongst philosophers, it was doubtless sound philosophy that we should buy as cheap and sell as dear as we could. But as we were not dealing with philosophers, but with nations, whose protected interests were strong, we should not lightly throw away advantages which we possessed for appearing to their sense of common advantage, with a view to the extending of the market for our manufactures. For instance, the unwise proposition of the French Government to raise the duty on our linen yarns, was creating a great sensation in the wine-growing districts of the south of France.

Some discussion followed, shared in by Mr. HAWES, Dr. BOWRING, Mr. F. T. BARING, Mr. VILLIERS, and one or two other members. On a division, the amendment was rejected by 81 to 48.

Three other amendments, severally proposed by Lord SANDON, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, and Dr. BOWRING, were also negatived by the house, and after some further progress the committee rose, Sir R. PEEL expressing a hope that the tariff would be entirely disposed of in the evening.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY

The Duke of WELLINGTON moved the order of the day for going into committee on the Property-tax Bill.

Viscount DUNCANNON laid on the table the resolution intended to be moved by the Marquis of Lansdowne, as follows:—"That while the House is unwilling to construct the progress of measures calculated to supply the present deficiency of the public income, and cause it fully adequate to meet the public charges, it cannot refrain from recording its opinion that a judicious alteration of the duties affecting corn, sugar, and timber, would have greatly diminished the amount of additional taxation required by the exigencies of the state; and would, at the same time, from its effects in increasing the comfort of all classes, and lessening the privations of the great body of the people, together with such additions as might have been obtained from some other sources, have been preferable to a tax on income in the present circumstances of the country."

The Bill then went through committee, was reported without amendments, and ordered to be read a third time on Friday.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the Copyright Bill was reported, and certain amendments were ordered to be printed previously to the third reading

On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM, and after some not very good natured sparring between the noble and learned lord and Lord CAMPBELL, the standing order was suspended, in order to expedite the progress of the Witnesses (Scotland) Bill (Mr. Roebuck's), and the bill was read a second time, committed, read a third time, and passed.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Sir H. W. BARRON and Mr. WYSE took the oaths and their seats for the city of Waterford

Gale's Naturalization Bill and the Carlow Roads Bill were read a third time and passed

The following Bills were read a second time, and ordered to be committed—Bourne's Naturalization Bill, Lesbazeille's Naturalization Bill, Ashton's Divorce Bill, and Tories' Park Fencing and Sewerage Bill.

Mr. SHAW, after a speech of great acrimony, moved that a new writ be issued for the borough of Belfast

Mr. O'CONNELL moved, as an amendment, that a select committee be appointed to inquire whether a corrupt compromise has been entered into for the purpose of avoiding investigation into gross and corrupt personation of voters, and consequent perjury, alleged to have been practised at the late election for Belfast.

A debate ensued, in the course of which Sir R. PEEL supported the amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL expressed his willingness to leave the selection of the committee entirely to the right hon. baronet

Sir R. PEEL was understood to decline.

On the division, the numbers were—

For the motion	..	..	..	73
For the amendment	..	..	..	170
Majority against issuing the writ	..	..	..	—97

The house then went into committee on the Customs Act, when the first resolution relating to the duties on which surveys states that there shall be charged upon goods, wares, and merchandise exported from the United Kingdom to foreign possessions, the duties to be afterwards agreed upon, was adopted, as was also a resolution that on coals, culm, or cinders exported in foreign ships, there shall be levied a duty of 4s. a ton.

On the motion that on coals, culm, or cinders, exported in British ships, there shall be levied a duty of 2s. a ton,

Mr. BELL expressed his satisfaction with the compromise to which the Government had yielded

Viscount HOWICK condemned that compromise, and concluded a long speech by expressing his decided opposition to the duty.

A debate ensued, at the conclusion of which the committee divided—

For the motion	..	..	..	200
Against it	..	..	..	67
Majority	..	..	..	133

The remaining items in the Tariff having been voted, the house resumed and the report of the committee was ordered, amidst cheers, to be received, for the purpose of making trifling alterations in some immaterial items of the Tariff

In reply to a question from an hon. member, Sir R. PEEL said, that, as a universal rule, the new duties would come into operation from the passing of the Act

The Sugar Duties Bill was read a third time and passed, as was also the Double Costs Bill.

The Perth Prison Bill was read a third time, and ordered to be committed.

On the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, the Tithe Commutation Bill was read a third time

The Law of Merchants Act Amendment Bill was also read a third time and passed

The Assessed Taxes Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House of Lords did not sit

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Lords' amendments to the Great North of England Railway Bill, and the Boston Harbour Bill, were agreed to, and the Bills passed.

The Stourbridge Roads Bill was read a third time and passed

The SPEAKER acquainted the house that subpœnas had been served upon Mr. Bellamy, and other passengers of that house, to attend and give evidence in an action in which a person named Howard was the plaintiff, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of that house the defendant, and asked that the witnesses have leave to attend.—Agreed to.

In reply to questions from Mr. DISRAELI regarding the state of the negotiation with America on the boundary question, Sir R. PEEL said: The transaction rests altogether between the state of Maine and the Government of the United States. Negotiations of the utmost importance are pending, but I feel that it would be wholly inconsistent with my duty to make any statement respecting them to the house.

After some conversation,

Mr. W. O'STANLEY said it was his intention, to-morrow, to move for a select committee to inquire into the bribery and treating at the last election for Southampton.

Mr. DARBY trusted that the question of expenses would be settled. If the public were to be charged, he there would be no end to such petitions

On the motion of Captain ROUS, the Public-houses Bill was read a third time and passed.

On the motion of Lord ASHLEY, the Mines and Collieries Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed this day week.

On the motion of Mr. REDINGTON, the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill went through committee.

On the motion of Lord STANLEY, the Newfoundland Bill was read a second time pro forma, on the understanding that the discussion should take place on the Bill going into committee, which was appointed for this day fortnight.

The Justice Jurisdiction Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday.

Mr. M. GIBSON moved that the Electors Removal Bill be now read a second time

SIR J. GRAHAM and other members opposed the motion in a discussion, in the course of which it was suggested that the intended alteration might be more properly introduced as an amendment on the Registration Bill when the Right Hon. Secretary for the Home Department intended to propose it.

The house divided—

For the second reading	.. .. ..	102
Against it	.. .. ..	120
Majority		—18

The amendment, "That the bill be read a second time that day three months," having been put, and discussed at some length,

Mr. F. MAULE moved, that instead of being postponed for three months, the second reading of this bill should be postponed only for one week.

The house divided—

For Mr. F. Maule's amendment	.. ..	79
Against it	.. ..	101
Majority for the original motion		—22

The report of the committee on the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) (No. 2) Bill, several amendments having been made in it, was agreed to.

The Dean Forest Poor Bill went through committee.

The Dean Forest Ecclesiastical Districts Bill also went through committee.

The St Briavel's Small Debts Bill went through committee.

Mr. GREENE brought up the report of the committee on the Customs Acts, which was reconsidered in committee, and several amendments were agreed to without any discussion.

The house then resumed, and the report was ordered to be received on Thursday.

The house then adjourned.

SCIENCE.

ELECTRO GILDING.—The science of electricity is progressing with gigantic strides; indeed, so much is this the case, that we are unacquainted with any science which has advanced so rapidly in the same comparatively short space of time. But three years since, and galvanic electricity was considered a mere philosophical plaything—a toy, and nothing more. And now, how vast the difference! It is on the waters, and the boatman may rest on his oars; it is below the waves, and the sea yields up her long-buried treasures; it is the miner's right hand, for by its agency the hardest rocks are shivered, and torn from their solid foundations with celerity and safety. Time and space are as nothing; for by this subtle agent thoughts and words may be communicated for hundreds of miles with the celerity of lightning, and the utmost precision. It is in the laboratory of the chemist; and the most obstinate bodies yield before it, while the most beautiful works of art are copied with a delicacy and correctness absolutely marvellous. We have been led into these remarks from having lately seen some most delightful specimens of gilding and plating effected by galvanic electricity. Articles of plate are manufactured in copper, and submitted to galvanic action in a solution of gold or silver. The metal is at once precipitated from its solution, and deposited on the copper; a coating of silver or gold is thus given, which being polished, has all the appearance given by the ordinary method. Some further experiments have been recently made in Germany on this matter, and we are given to understand that much improvement is likely to result therefrom. It is our intention, in an early number, possibly in our next, to speak more fully on the subject of the electrotype and its derivative arts, when we trust to lay before our readers the experiments to which we have above alluded.

NEW PATENT COMPOSING MACHINE.—We have, during the past week, been favoured with an inspection of one of those triumphs of mechanical genius which assist in working such complete revolutions in the arts. It is called a patent composing machine; it is the invention of Messrs. Young and Delcambre, and has been constructed by their engineer, Mr. J. Wilson. The machine itself has a great resemblance to a cottage piano, with the external framework removed. It has 72 channels, containing a complete font of type, under which are placed levers in connexion with keys similar to those of the piano, each key having engraved on it its character, which corresponds with the channels above, in which the different letters are placed. As the letters are moved out of the channels by the action of the player they slide through various curves on an inclined plane at the back of the machine and fall to one point, where they are received into a spout and beaten forward to a composing stick, or, as it is called by the machinist, a justifying-box, by a very ingenious mechanical movement. This justifying-box is at the end of a receiving-spout, and the type is drawn into it in the width of the page to be set up; and when the usual number of lines have been justified the box is emptied into a galley in the way that the compositor empties his composing-stick. While this "setting up" of the type as the printers term it, but which here is in reality "letting down," is going on, the channels are being fed by two boys. The rapidity with which this machine gets through its work may be judged of from the fact that type equal to half a column of this journal was justified in a few minutes less than an hour—that is, as fast as the reporter usually transcribes his notes. At this machine there are eight persons employed, three intelligent young women and five boys. The first are alternately engaged two hours each in composing, justifying, and correcting. The same system obtains with the boys, one of whom turns the wheel before spoken of, two, as has been stated, fill the channels, and two distribute the type. A clever compositor will set up 2000 letters in an hour, but the average is about 1500 or 1600 letters. The young women whom we saw compose at the machine, have, as they stated to us, been learning for about three months, and the average rate at which they justify, for we observed that the compositor was too quick for the justifier, is about 6000 letters per hour. With nine or twelve months' practice they will very likely be able to compose at the rate of 8000 or 9000 per hour. The cost of composing by this machine was stated to us to be 2d. per thousand, and from the rate at which the machine composed, and the wages which we ascertained were paid to those employed, we entertain no doubt that such is the fact. The movements of the machine are extremely simple and beautiful, and the whole of it being composed of steel and brass, it will work for years without getting out of order.

From this brief and necessarily imperfect description of this machine, it will be seen that it promises in no short period to effect a revolution in the art of printing. But a few months since, he who would have maintained that such complicated movements as the setting up of type could have been performed by machinery, would have been laughed at as a fool, and his assertions derided as the wild day dreams of an enthusiast. And so it has ever been; Fulton was deemed a madman, and even the discoveries of Franklin were laughed to scorn. To ask the machinist to set up a book was very recently considered an excellent joke, but those who disbelieve need but call at 110, Chancery-lane, where, as with us, their doubts will speedily be set at rest.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION OF THE WORKS OF THE LATE SIR DAVID WILKIE.—A visit to the rooms of the British Institution, in which the pictures and sketches of the late Sir David Wilkie are at present exhibiting, is calculated to awaken those mingled feelings of regret and pleasure, in which it is occasionally a melancholy gratification to indulge. We think of the genius that has departed from among us, and sigh that in its most ample possession it gives no exemption from the common lot of mortality; we gaze on the creation of its power, and rejoice that so much is left us calculated to elevate, to refine, and to instruct, for the canvass is capable of becoming as great a moral teacher as the page. Genius, by changing the medium through which it converses with us, changes not in its power over us; and of the works of no artist can it be said with more truth than of those of Wilkie, that "at the pictures of other men we look, but his we read." This observation was applied to Hogarth, by one of the finest critics who ever brought literature to bear on the elucidation of art; but with every admiration for the artist to whom the happy definition is applied, we think it may be said, with even more justice, of the painter of whose works we are about to give a brief, a cursory, and, we fear, an imperfect notice. The advantage of bringing together, as far as practicable, the works of a great artist, and thus showing at one view the whole progress of his genius, we have already brought its cycle from its first awakening, through its development, its improvement, till it arrived at its full maturity, has sometimes been questioned, but, on the whole, we approve of it. It is more painful, perhaps, but not less instructive, to trace its decline from the fulness of vigour to a feebler, or at least, a different manner; but as this is a point on which much difference does and will exist, we will touch but lightly on it and pass on. The seeming errors of genius do not necessarily spring from weakness; may they not sometimes have their source in strength diverted from its ordinary direction, and, therefore, liable to misapprehension? The world frequently resents a departure from that which it has been accustomed to admire, and is slow to recognise the merit of change. Much that has been said and written on the later style adopted by Wilkie, may, we think, be accounted for on this principle. But though a collection of the whole works of a deceased artist may compel us to observe his defects and his mannerisms, as well as the productions of his most vigorous period, the opportunity of examining the whole man, the entire artist, as developed in the works by which he gained his fame during life, and to which he must trust for the "all hail hereafter," is useful and instructive, to the artist especially, who will find in such a collection a perfect field for study and improvement. Wilkie, as a painter, occupied a position at once peculiar and commanding—peculiar for the style he adopted, and made so entirely his own; and commanding, because, though eminently great in this one style, he was not confined to it—he was the lord of his pencil, and not its slave. With all the homely truth, minuteness of detail, and elaborate finish of the best Dutch school, he could rise from it to the dignity of the historic painter, carrying with him to this higher sphere all the qualities that make his delineations of "that which before us lies in daily life" so attractive to the thousands who in them found art speaking a familiar language. In portrait he was not successful, especially when he adopted the life size, and it must be regretted by his warmest admirers that he was ever reduced into this lowest department of the art. But when he gave his portraits in the miniature style of his celebrated pieces, he was more than successful, he was unrivalled, as in the exquisite full-length miniature of the Duke of York. The highly-imaginative he never attempted; we believe there is not a single painting from his pencil embodying the scenes or characters of poetry. He has never given us a Una, a Lucifer, or a Juliet; he was not inspired by the genius of Spenser, or Milton, or Shakspere, from whose pages so many artists have drawn their subjects. Such beings were apparently too ethereal for his pencil, which always required something real, something tangible, something that could, as it were, be grasped with a hardy vigour, and made to live in lineaments such as men gaze on, and say they have lived and acted, and mingled in the daily life of the world. He must not be compared with such artists as Fuseli or Martin; there are no materials for the comparison; his genius differed from theirs, not so much in degree, as in kind. The characters of History he could recall; but the beings of Poetry must be, as it were, recreated, and this he has not appeared to have attempted; seeing where his real strength lay was he not wise in so doing?

The reader can test the justice of our estimate of his genius by an examination of this collection of his works, which contains nearly all his most celebrated paintings, commencing with one of the earliest of his remarkable pieces the 'Recruiting Party;' between this and his last completed picture 'Benvenuto Cellini presenting a censor to the Pope,' what a series of productions is presented to us! The student may derive this blessing from a careful examination of them—that his great success never caused him to wed himself inseparably to one manner of treatment. His paintings show a continual progression of effort and study. The difference between his colouring and execution in the 'Distraining for Rent,' and his 'Blind Fiddler' (in the National Gallery,) is sufficiently perceptible. His Spanish tour had a marked effect on his style, and the evidences of his study of Murillo are evident. His visit to the East, from which he was destined never to return, did not change his style, so much as his subjects; and as the fruits of his voyage consist principally of incomplete sketches, to which he might have hereafter given that elaborate finish for which he never seems to have spared any labour, and to which the startling reality of his figures must be attributed, we may pass them over with the less regret. It is not from these that posterity will judge him. The turbans and caftans, and the "barbaric gold and pearl," among which his pencil roamed till death closed his laborious career, will not win the eye or heart from the 'Reading of the Will,' or the 'Rent Day.'

To go into a criticism of each picture in this collection would require a volume, and we are confined both as to time and space. Where each single figure is a study—where not a stroke can be named that is not pregnant with meaning and effect—where the most homely truth is found united with a strong appreciation of humour, who can hope to do justice to the 'Blind Fidler,' or the world of life that is thrown into the 'Village Festival,' in which the figure of the peasant struggling between the earnest entreaties of his wife, and the boisterous importunities of his boon companion, has been declared superior to any expression of mingled emotion by Reynolds's Garrick between tragedy and comedy, claimed by both, and belonging entirely to neither. Turning to two others, we find how the strict fidelity of truth is as often a satire on human nature as a compliment to it. Is there not a quiet pathos in the 'Distraining for Rent,' and a regard for mammon in the 'Rent Day,' the more effective in both, because in neither is there any exaggeration? It speaks much for the suggestive powers of Wilkie's pencil, that the first named of these pictures has furnished the subject of a drama. We need only mention the names of the other subjects here assembled, not long, we apprehend, to remain together, to call up a host of ideas and associations of a similar kind. The 'Reading of the Will,' the 'Chelsea Pensioners reading the Gazette of the Battle of Waterloo,' the 'Penny Wedding,' and the 'Parish Beadle,' are all works of the highest excellence. We regret that we cannot linger on them, for each would furnish us with a fertile theme. Of the specimens of his historical style, we have, his 'Alfred in the Neatherd's Cottage,' his 'John Knox Preaching,' 'Napoleon and Pope Pius,' 'Victoria's First Council,' and lastly, his 'Maid of Saragossa,' which embodies one of those stirring incidents that form the romance of war, and in depicting which, though

> "Painting, mute and motionless, > Steals but a glance of time;"

yet in that glance is concentrated the life and energy of years. No painter has ever drawn more tributes to his genius from the sister art of poetry than Wilkie; and among the many who have found in his productions both their theme and inspiration, the lines of one living writer so vividly describe both the incident and the painting itself, that the reader will pardon our introducing them. The moment the artist has chosen is when the French troops are retreating, "foiled by a woman's hand, before a shattered wall; "and thus the poet describes it—"

> Look foremost in the picture, where she raiseth
> Her flaming brand to wake the cannon's roar
> And half in pain, and half in passion, gazeth
> On that dear form whose life and love are o'er.
> Enough of beauty for Titania's bower,
> Enough of courage freedom's fight to try;
> Not fearing death e'en in the battle hour,
> And yet with too much youth and bloom to die!
> She weeps not where all might forgive her weeping,
> But shuts up sorrow in her soul of pride,
> Vows to fulfil his part who there lies sleeping,
> And work out all his vengeance where he died.
> Maid of the lofty spirit, now forth beaming
> Its heroism in thy beautiful eyes,
> And meteor-like among Spain's patriots gleaming,
> To fill them with a glad and quick surprise—
> Shalt thou be left alone in thy achieving,
> The single chief, or will the flying host
> Back rally from the battle they were leaving,
> And aid thee to maintain thy honour'd post?
> Yes! Saragossa's heroine's high demeanour,
> Kindles with emulous flame her meanest son.
> And the fort rings with cheers for Agostina.
> From friends group'd with her round her lover's gun.
> And no ignoble friends—with gallant bearing
> See high-soul'd Palafox the cannon place;
> Over its death-charged mouth intently peering,
> His earnest spirit speaking in his face.
> And lo! while two strong volenteers are turning
> To plant secure its pond'rous frame of wood,
> A stern war priest, with martial ardour burning,
> Points with his crucifix its path of blood.
> Another pausing, writes (with wings spread under > His pigeon messenger, but waits to start)
> "Our city's foes fall back before its thunder, > Lanced by a maiden with a lion's heart!"
> In sooth, it is a group of very glory,
> A glowing theme to haunt the poet's soul,
> A radiant episode in Spanish story,
> To pour a stream of light down the whole.
> But all that fancy gleaneth for her dwelling,
> In Muses' numbers after to impart,
> And all the gorgeous scenes of History telling,
> Give here the palm of fame to Wilkie's art.
> There—beautiful, intense, unscared, commanding,
> Full in the midst of dangers that she braved—
> See ancient Saragossa's Maiden standing,
> As there she stood when Arragon was saved.

'John Knox Preaching,' is another of the pictures in which Wilkie has successfully attained the dignity of history; and, taken altogether, it is one of his most successful performances. This picture has awakened the spirit of poesy to do homage to its power, and we will avail ourselves of its descriptive force, to which we can add nothing:—

> It is a grand interior, and looks proud
> With all the solemn signs of its old creed;
> The fair-wrought image whereto kneelers bowed
> In superstitious reverence for the dead;
> The still recess where lonely sin avowed
> The dark remorse that made its spirit bleed—
> Opening the human heart as 'twere a book,
> In the hushed silence of that gloomy nook.
> See e'en the pulpit with adornment fraught,
> Symbolic of a worship not yet dead—
> Angels and cherubs in the foliage wrought
> Of its fair canopy; and overhead
> Beaton's escutcheon—that o'er heart and thought
> Doth cast a deepened shadow dark and dread;
> While memory pauseth with a fear-held breath
> O'er the red vision of his tragic death.
> But that old pulpit hath a living guest,
> Whose voice is thunder to the startled soul.
> All absent thoughts are in the heart represt,
> And every bosom bowed to his control.
> Upon his dauntless brow what quick eyes rest,
> While his their fervid inspiration roll,
> Flashing and deep, as though light's fountain took
> Its source of glory from their meteor look.
> * * *
> Fear cannot come upon him; he doth heed
> Not the arch-prelate frowning fiercely there,
> And listening, with his heart, e'en though it bleed,
> And tear 'twixt admiration and despair.
> Priest Hamilton, the champion of his creed,
> Roused like a lion hunted from his lair,
> Dwells on his words, the slayer by his side,
> Enraged though awed, and silent though defied.

Before this unrivalled collection is dispersed, we should advise every amateur and artist to pay it a visit, for it comprises a whole school of painting, in which we converse with nature delineated with the most minute fidelity, where we are brought into contact with the world of fact, so highly wrought and finished, that its perfection takes more than the force and vividness of imagination.

There is a collection of works by the old masters in the same exhibition; but all we can say of them at present is, that they have not escaped us.

NEWCASTLE ELECTION.—The election of a member to represent this borough in Parliament, concluded on Tuesday evening last, when Mr. Harris, the liberal candidate, was returned by a majority of 20: the numbers being—for Mr. Harris, 499; Mr. Colquhoun, 479. At the last election Mr. Harris was in a majority of upwards of 100.

From some proceedings which took place in the Court of Appeals, Doctors' Commons, on Wednesday last, it appears that the taxed bills of costs in the celebrated will case of James Wood, of Gloucester, amount to nearly £18,000

IRELAND.

In Ireland there have been some riots for food, which, owing to the miserable condition of portions of the starving population, and to the desperation which that condition has engendered, have begun to assume a frightful and alarming aspect. In one locality, Ennis, the most disastrous consequences have ensued from one of these outbreaks; and to tumult and dissatisfaction has been added the excitement consequent upon the death of two of the people in an affray with the police. Mr. C. O'Connell has taken up the cause of the populace with great spirit and activity, and the civil law has begun to vindicate its strength above either the military or magisterial, when the latter is abused by the powers entrusted with its functions. Numbers of the police have been marched off to gaol under the coroner's warrant upon a criminal charge; and an agitation has been got up upon the subject, which is pervading all Ireland, and exciting no small interest and attention in this country.

A summary view of the whole affair, accompanied, so far as it has gone, by sound common-sense comment, is thus digested by the Times:—

"The inquest on the body of Catherine Sheehan, who died from wounds received from the fire of the police during the recent riot at Ennis, instead of throwing light on that lamentable occurrence, has left it involved in greater mystery than before. All parties seem to be labouring under such excitement, that it is exceedingly difficult to discern the truth under their conflicting statements. The only facts which appear certain are these:—that early on Monday week Messrs. Bannatyne, corn-merchants, of Ennis, had reason to apprehend an attack upon their premises by the populace of the town, for the purpose of pillaging their stock of provisions; an outbreak of the same alarming character having actually taken place on the previous Saturday. They requested from the authorities a guard of police, and a force of 42 policemen, men and officers, were charged with the service of protecting them. In the evening, and towards dusk, the anticipated attack took place. A very numerous mob of men, women, and children assembled; stones were thrown, policemen and magistrates struck, and worse violence seemed about to follow. The confusion increased as night closed in; magistrates and inspectors of police lost their self-possession; some magistrates absented themselves, or would not act with their colleagues; excited discussion arose, in which the necessity of firing was talked about, and the word 'fire' was audibly used. At last, whether with or without orders, or with or without the impression that orders had been given, but certainly before the Riot Act had been read, the police actually fired, with fatal effect. Upwards of 15 persons, including women and children, were wounded, two of whom have since died; 38 policemen have, in consequence, been committed by the coroner to take their trials for murder.

"That this is an occurrence which cannot be too much deplored, or too strictly investigated, is evident. Whatever may have been the provocation which the police received, and wherever the responsibility for what was done may lie, it is clear that the firing was illegal. We repeat, therefore, that there is a case for the most rigid investigation; and whatever punishment is justly due should be administered in the right quarter, without fear or favour. If the police fired, as the coroner's jury has found that they did, 'not only without orders from any magistrate or other officers, but in opposition to the positive orders of their officers, and without having received sufficient provocation from the people who were tumultuously assembled, to warrant them in at all firing upon the people,'—if this were so, we know not what should save them from the extreme penalty of the law. Policemen, however, are entitled to protection, as magistrates and mobs; nor are they to be punished as murderers, if bloodshed (however lamentable) happens through their misapprehension of orders given to them under circumstances of excitement or confusion; or if (while their superiors are hesitating or disputing as to what ought to be done) they find their own lives in positive danger, and use the weapons in their hands for the natural purposes of self-defence. There is at all times a very violent popular prejudice against policemen, merely on account of the nature of the service in which they are engaged; it is not unlikely that such prejudice would be quite as cruel as to fire without cause upon a mob. We perceive, also, so many marks of a violent and vindictive disposition on the part of those who conducted the inquiry at Ennis, and so glaring a discrepancy between the evidence (whatever may be its value) and the most important part of the verdict, that we feel called upon to enter our protest against the admission of any similar spirit into the investigation to be instituted by Government.

"The improbability of thirty-eight policemen firing upon a mob from mere wantonness or malice prepense is sufficiently great; that they should have done so with the knowledge that they were acting contrary to orders is altogether incredible, unless they were reduced to desperation by the violence of the mob. When the character of the mob, the deliberation with which they assembled, and the purpose of their assemblage are considered—when the imperfect light and the small numbers of the police force are remembered, it cannot be surprising either that the police should have been seized with panic, or that the mob should have proceeded to the most alarming extremities of violence. It is true that several witnesses on the inquest stated their opinion that the crowd might have been dispersed without firing; but it was also clear that no effectual attempt was made to disperse them. No witnesses were called on the part of the police to show the extent of provocation which they received; and our original account stated that one policeman had his eye knocked out, and that two others were knocked down. With respect to the orders given, one witness swore positively that he 'heard Captain De Ruvynes (a magistrate) say Fire, and Mr. Brown (the county inspector of police), not to fire. I heard Mr. Brown a second time say 'Do not fire, boys.' The word was given by Capt. De Ruvynes before Mr. Brown desired them not to fire. About two minutes after the word was given the firing commenced.'

"A second witness swore that he 'heard Capt. De Ruvynes say 'Ready, present, fire!' Mr. Brown repeated the same words after the captain, and the men fired.'

"A third witness swore that 'Mr. Brown called out to Captain De Ruvynes, and inquired what he was to do? This was five minutes after the captain complained of being struck in the mouth. He (the captain) said he could do nothing, as Mr. Smyth was not there. Mr. Brown replied, I now give you the authority, and you may do as you please. Capt. De Ruvynes then said that the men must fire; then Mr. Brown desired the men to fire; the word was scarcely out of his mouth when the men fired. Before the word was given, I heard Mr. Fitzsimon say, 'In the honour of God, do not fire, but charge upon the mob, and close them up, and they will make away.' Between these words and the firing three minutes did not elapse. It was after Mr. Fitzsimon spoke that Captain De Ruvynes said the men must fire, and Mr. Brown gave the word instantly.'

"Mr. L. Smith, himself a magistrate (who takes the popular side, and who absented himself at the moment when his services were most required), also stated that he 'heard Mr. Brown desiring the people in an indiscreet manner, which he did not approve of; and telling them to stand back, or he should be obliged to fire upon them; though he (Mr. Smith) did not, in fact, hear any orders given.'

"Now, this evidence may be true, or it may be false; but, true or fa se, it is the only evidence (except the declarations of Captain De Ruvynes and Mr. Brown themselves) which the jury had before them, when they found, upon their oaths, that the thirty-eight unfortunate policemen now charged with murder 'fired, not alone without orders from any magistrate or other officers, but in opposition to the positive orders of their officers.' Can perjury go further than this?

"We have time to observe upon the spirit in which the inquiry was conducted. On Tuesday last, Mr. Gulliyan, the local Crown prosecutor, addressed the assembled populace of Ennis in the marketplace in the following strain:—'Fellow-townsmen, it is not often that I address you, but I believe you will admit, that whenever you put your confidence in me you are not betrayed. I never gave you advice calculated to lead to bad consequences. I am local Crown prosecutor for this county, and it is my duty to punish you if you offend, as well as those that offend you, and I promise that as far as I can go, you shall have protection. There has been blood shed, I don't know by whom, but I hear it has been shed wantonly, therefore get all the information you can for the inquest. Appeal to the laws of your country alone; for last night's work will fully prove that you have no redress to get by facing an armed party of police. There is one fact which I wish to mention, and by which it appears the crowd were offering no resistance when fired at. Most of those injured were wounded in the back.'

"At the inquest, Mr. C. O'Connell, a worthy scion of the agitator's stock, who had previously, in a speech to the populace, described the mob assembled to take Messrs. Bannatyne's granaries by storm as 'innocent and unoffending people,' 'her Majesty's faithful, loyal, peaceable, and unoffending subjects,'—this Mr. C. O'Connell was suffered to address 'Mr. Coroner and gentlemen of the jury,' in the following terms:—'Gracious God! if I be rightly instructed, a more barbarous murder was never perpetrated on an unoffending people. I will not move your passions—you saw the bloody wounds that called aloud for vengeance, and demand to investigate the case coolly and deliberately, and find a verdict according to the evidence produced.'

"The proceedings were frequently interrupted by loud intimations of the wishes and opinions of the bystanders, and, upon the whole, the inquest presents a pretty specimen of Irish 'coolness and deliberation.'

"We trust that in a few days an investigation of a very different kind, and the result of which may throw some real light upon the matter, will take place under the directions of the Government. It is absolutely necessary that the people should be protected; but property must be protected too; and if blood has been shed through the misconduct of any parties, care must be taken that those who are to blame, and not the mere instruments of legal discipline, are the parties who suffer for it."

Government, it will be seen by our parliamentary report, has sent over a barrister, and ordered an official investigation.

THE COLONIES.

THE WEST INDIES.—In the Jamaica papers received on Monday, by the Dee Royal Mail steamer, the protection which Sir Robert Peel extended his financial review to our sugar-producing colonies is alluded to as an incentive for the population, both planters and labourers, to use their endeavours to raise the character of the island, which it is stated had drooped under the injustice which it was supposed would, by the admission of slave-grown produce, have been dealt out against all our West India possessions by the Whig Administration. The West India interest are, naturally enough, strong supporters of the policy of the new Administration in this respect, and it is not therefore to be wondered at that a great portion of the leading columns of the various papers are devoted to panegyrics on the plan laid down by the Government to regulate the sugar duties. One of the topics arising out of this discussion is the wasteful expenditure of the funds raised by loan to encourage the project of general emigration; and, in the midst of this, the improvements of the age at home appear to be regarded with a watchful eye. Had these funds, which, according to all accounts, have been most extravagantly used, been directed to the forming of good roads, the opening of a canal, or the construction of a railroad, the impoverished Jamaica proprietors, it is stated, might have found some relief from their heavy encumbrances. A railroad or canal, successfully opened, with improved machinery for the manufacture of sugar and rum, would, it is contended, do wonders towards restoring the condition and credit of the island. It appears that the Assembly are not disinclined to appropriate votes for the encouragement of local improvements, but the great fault appears to lie in the want of practical skill to carry them out, in the absence of which theoretical attempts are made, ending in the total expenditure of the money without any real benefit to the community. To obviate the continued disbursement of the public funds, to the prejudice of sound and wholesome projects when they are brought forward, is the sole desire of the Jamaica editors, who predict from the mighty and energetic strides which the present Ministry is making to revive confidence at home and abroad, a new era of colonial prosperity, which they say is sure to bring with it, in the course of time, if not immediately, those much desired facilities for the profitable and less expensive production of the West India estates. A preliminary report as to the practicability of draining the great lagoons between Kingston and Spanish Town was before the public, the suggestions in which go to show that it can, with some expense, be accomplished, and that the channel of general drainage is adapted for the line of a navigable canal upon which lighters and droggers may ply with advantage and profit. Addresses continued to pour in upon Sir C. Metcalfe, the retiring governor, regretting his speedy departure from the Government, as, in the opinion of the majority, it is under his hands that Jamaica has been saved from much of the discord and the distress she would, considering the tendency of events, have otherwise experienced. The other West India papers are quite destitute of news, and, beyond the mere mention of minor local events, are quite taken up with the particulars of the new tariff, which are discussed with much earnestness, as proving the capabilities of the leader of the Ministry for the post he now occupies. The interests in the several islands appear to be perfectly aware that some reduction of the duties on foreign sugars would be proposed, as has really been the case, by the opposition party, but feeling the strength of the Government they seemed to have no apprehension for the result.

UNITED STATES.

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA IN TEN DAYS.

LIVERPOOL, Tuesday Morning, Three o'Clock.

The British and North American steamer, Acadia, Capt. Ryrie, arrived at this port at midnight, last night, having left Boston on the 1st, and Halifax on the 3rd inst. She had 37 passengers. We have received by her papers 16 days later than before.

Nine o'Clock.

We send a few particulars of the voyage of the Acadia steamer, which we had not time to collect when we sent off our parcel by the express train at three o'clock this morning.

The British Queen, which sailed from Southampton the 8th May, reached New York on the night of the 26th, eighteen days and a half voyage.

The Acadia sailed from Boston at five p.m. on the 1st, and arrived off the Floating Light at a quarter before twelve last night, thus making the passage to this port in about twelve days and eight hours—she having arrived opposite the town at one this morning. She left Halifax on the evening of the 3rd accomplishing the passage thence in ten days seven hours and three-quarters—a rate of steaming fully maintaining the previous speed and certainty of the fine ships of this line. She met the Colombia at midnight, on the 1st, off Boston, and the latter would probably reach that port by two o'clock next morning. It was reported at the time of her sailing from Halifax that a large steamer (supposed the Great Western) was seen passing off that place on the 2nd, on her way to New York. The Acadia fell in with several fields of ice and large icebergs on her passage across the banks of Newfoundland.

The general news brought by the Acadia appears to be of a better character, although they present nothing of a very striking character. The progress of Lord Ashburton's mission appears enveloped in strict diplomatic secresy, but it is fully to be calculated upon, from the little that has transpired, as being of a favourable description.

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY—MAINE LEGISLATURE.

(From the Boston Atlas of May 28.)

We have received the following letter from our obliging correspondent at Hallowell. The proceedings of the Maine Legislature are deserving of great commendation. We entertain little doubt, now, that the boundary question will be speedily and satisfactorily adjusted. The Board of Commissioners appointed on the part of the State of Maine are intelligent and judicious men—and we have no doubt they will do all they can towards a pacific arrangement of the questions submitted to them.

HALLOWELL, MAY 25.—ELECTION OF COMMISSIONERS.—I am gratified to announce to you, that the report of the committe, recommending the choice of commissioners to treat with the General Government upon the North Eastern Boundary Question, and investing them with full powers, has passed the House of Representatives, in concurrence with the Senate, with but eleven dissenting votes. This day at twelve o'clock, both branches of the Legislature met in Convention, and selected with great unanimity the following gentlemen to act as Commissioners, viz., Honourable Edward Kavanagh and Colonel John Otis, of the Senate, Judge Preble, of Portland, and Honourable Edward Kent, of Bangor. The selection is a judicious one, and gives great satisfaction. The gentlemen designated are admirably qualified to discharge the trust confied to them —and I trust, on the other hand, they will guide the rights and honour of Maine, they will present no factious opposition to an honourable arrangement of the important question in controversy. The people of this state are anxious that this vexed question should be settled, and never was a more favourable opportunity than the present to accomplish that object.

On the part of Massachusetts—Abbott Lawrence, John Mills, and Charles Allen, Whigs.

FROM MEXICO.

(From the New York American, May 30.)

Vera Cruz dates to the 12th have reached New Orleans—the papers contain little news of interest. The Picayune gives, in an extra, summary of the intelligence from Mexico. On the 21st of April, Mr. Ellis had his audience of leave of Santa Anna, General Thompson presenting his credentials on the same day. General Thompson's arrival was hailed with delight by the resident Americans. Through his exertions, three of the Americans were liberated on the 27th of April, and the next day sixteen Germans and English were set free. About a hundred of the prisoners still remain in the convent of Santiago, where, though in chains, and made to work in the streets, they are otherwise well treated.

Santa Anna appears to be steadily and quietly carrying on his plans and securing his power.

The Picayune says that, though he his the best President or Dictator the country could have, he is nevertheless hated and despised by a majority of the citizens. His three most influential enemies are General Paredes, Cortazar, and Pedraza, who, it was thought, with the troops they had at their disposal, would declare against him. The assemblage of the Constitutional Congress in time will probably determine his fate, as the majority of that body are strongly opposed to his view.

Nothing was said of an expedition against Texas or Yucatan. Santa Anna, on the contrary, was concentrating as many troops as possible in the capital.

RIOT IN NEW ORLEANS.

The resumption of specie payments by the New Orleans banks appears to have been the remote cause of popular disturbances, which at one time assumed a rather alarming appearance.

On the morning of Friday, the 20th, a large concourse of people assembled in the Place d'Armes, whence they proceeded to the mayor's office, where they were told that arrangements would soon be made for the resumption of the notes. Unfortunately some indiscreet or evil-disposed person threw out a suggestion that the depreciation was caused by the brokers, and in a moment the current of popular wrath was turned against those gentry. Of what followed we give the account furnished by the Bee.

At ten o'clock, our attention was arrested by a clamour in the street, which proved to have been made by the incensed mob, on their way to the second municipality to break up the brokers. We could form no accurate estimate of the number of persons engaged in the riot, as a large portion of the crowd was attracted by curiosity. The mob proceeded across Canal-street, and before there could be formed any organised resistance, went into several of the brokers' offices at and near the corner of Canal and Camp-streets, which were completely rifled. The citizens, however, soon ascertained the object of the mob, and with commendable promptness put an end to their depredations. It is impossible to conceive how quickly the infuriated mass was put down.

MR. PETRICH ASSASSINATED.

(Correspondence, Commercial Advertiser.)

Washington, Monday, Three o'Clock, P.M., May 30th, 1842.—This talented sculptor's studio was entered last evening, at about ten o'clock, by two men with blackened faces, who attacked Mr. Petrich with knives, inflicting upon him three dangerous wounds, two of which were near the region of the heart. His calls for assistance were available for his rescue, the assassins retreating, leaving him bathed in his own blood, while relief came in, attracted by his cries.

He lies in a most critical state. Neither from him, nor from any other source, can the most ingenious speculation devise even a remotely possible cause for an act at once so dastardly and nefarious.

EARTHQUAKE IN ST. DOMINGO.—TEN THOUSAND LIVES LOST.

The American papers received by the Acadia inform us that an appalling catastrophe had befallen the island of St. Domingo. That island was visited on the 7th ult. with repeated and severe shocks of earthquake, which had entirely demolished the town of Cape Haytien, and it was calculated had destroyed the lives of 10,000 of its citizens, Other towns on the same side of the island had, it was feared, shared in the desolation.

The town of Cape Haytien has entirely disappeared, and with it two-thirds of its population, who amounted to about 15,000 inhabitants. A fire broke out after the earthquake, which destroyed the powder magazine, and with it the miserable remnant of the inhabitants who had escaped the earthquake. The towns of St. Nicholas and Port Paix are also said to be destroyed.

The following are extracts from the correspondence of the New York papers:—

By the politeness of Captain Morris, of the brig William Neilson, from Port-au-Prince, we have received Le Patriote of the 11th May, published at that place, which gives an account of a shocking earthquake that occurred in that island on the 7th May, at five o'clock in the evening.

The principal destruction of life, of which we have an account, was at Cape Haytien, which town was entirely destroyed. It contained about 15,000 inhabitants, two-thirds of whom are thought to be dead. The approach of the earthquake was indicated in Port-au-Prince by great heat, and heavy clouds that covered the neighbouring hills, and followed the direction of the south-west to the north-east. The vessels at anchor, some of the sailors report, experienced the shock before they saw the houses agitated, which seemed to indicate that the shock came from the west

There were two shocks at Port-au-Prince very distinctly felt, the first not so long as the second, which last endured about three minutes. Every person strove to get out of the houses, and the streets were filled with the affrighted population. A little longer, says the Patriote, and Port-au-Prince would have been the theatre of a disaster similar to that of 1770, of which disastrous year the remembrance was rushing into all minds

The Patriote also says, that there is hardly a house or wall that has not suffered a little. Some have become almost uninhabitable. The front of the Senate House, where the arms of the Republic are sculptured, is detached and broken. The interior was uninjured.

On the Saturday night succeeding, and on Sunday, there were other shocks. Mass was interrupted, and the persons present ran hither and thither, while many women fainted.

On Monday morning, at 12 o'clock, there was another shock. The weather all the while was changeable, now extreme heat, now rain, now fair, and now signs as if of a storm.

On Tuesday, again, there was another shock, and since then, says the Patriote, "it seems to us that we walk upon a quaking earth."

St. Marc. A letter from this town says that the earthquake was felt there with violence. Many houses were seriously damaged, and some destroyed, but no loss of life is mentioned.

At Gonaives the shocks were yet more serious. The greater part of the houses were overthrown. A fire broke out at the same time, and there was not a drop of water in the town. All the houses that were not burnt suffered from the earthquake. It was in the streets that the writer of the letter giving this account was inditing it. The Church, the Prison, the Palais National, the Treasury, and the Arsenal, were all destroyed.

This letter concludes at 8 A.M., by saying—

"It is only half an hour since that we felt a very great commotion. At present we are ignorant of the number of persons killed or wounded. All the prisoners who are not buried in the ruins escaped. God grant that Port-au-Prince may not have experienced such a disaster."

Cape Haytien. The town of Cape Haytien has entirely disappeared, and with it two-thirds of the population. The families that could escape fled to Fossette, where they were without an asylum, clothing, or provisions.

The President of Hayti has given orders to the physicians and officers of the hospitals to leave the city immediately, in order to give succour to the distressed. Other aid of all kinds was about to be despatched by water to the distressed.

In addition to the above disastrous intelligence from the Cape, a courier arrived from the city a few hours previous to the departure of Captain Morris, who stated that a fire broke out after the earthquake, which, on Monday the 9th, destroyed the powder magazine, and with it the miserable remnant of the inhabitants who had escaped the earthquake. The towns of St. Nicholas and Port Paix are also said to be destroyed. Other parts of the island had not been heard from when Captain Morris left; but it is conjectured that all the towns of the north are a mass of ruins

In addition to the foregoing distressing particulars, we have the following confirmatory letters. The letters from Port-au-Prince came by the William Neilson, at New York:—

"Correspondence of the Atlas.

"Port-au-Prince, May 12, 5 p.m.

"Just before despatching this letter, news has reached us that only one person has been saved, a Mr. Dupuy . all the others being either drowned by the sea or crushed to death. The Cape itself is one mass of ruins."

"Port-au-Prince, May 12

"It is with the utmost regret that we inform you of news having reached us last evening that the town of Cape Hayti and several other places in the north have been destroyed by a dreadful earthquake, on the 7th inst.

"Gonaives has suffered likewise very much, where fire burned down several houses.

"It is said the inhabitants of Cape Hayti are buried under its ruins or washed into the sea.

"Here, we are glad to say, very little damage was done, although the shocks were very severe; as also in the south."

"Port-au-Prince, May 12.

"The Cape Hayti (town) is destroyed by an earthquake. We have no letters in this place as yet, and we much fear the reason of this is that all the inhabitants, or the greater part of them, are buried in the ruins. Our Mr. Dupuy, who left us last night for the scene of misery, is in despair about the fate of his mother, brothers, sisters, friends, and relations. Gonaives has suffered very severely, and some lives were lost; and to add to their misery, the shock caused some lucifer matches in a druggist's shop to ignite, and burn down a whole square of houses. Mr. J. B. Dupuy's house is one of the number, but we hope he would be able to save a good deal. Port-au Prince has suffered also, but only as regarded breakage of glass ware, &c., and the walls (of two feet thick bricks) cracked in many places half an inch wide: at one place a brick pillar fell down also. Even here we could hardly keep on our legs, and the vessels rolled about very much. All this happened on Saturday last (the 7th), and the earth has been in motion ever since. Yesterday we had a severe shock, and we can still, every now and then, feel the ground shake. We do not feel at all at our ease, but we hope we have passed over the worst part of it. The Cape affair is indeed awful to think of!"

"Port-au-Prince, May 12.

"We experienced about 5 p.m., the 7th inst., a severe and continuous shock of earthquake; it lasted several minutes, and since repeated momentary shocks have been felt.

"No great damage has been done here and in the south, but accounts from the north are deplorable.

"St. Marc's is severely injured, and many lives lost. Gonaives is now devastated, the public buildings and many others having been devoured by the first shock. Immediately after which a fire broke out and consumed a whole square. The property saved from the double disaster was pillaged the following day by the country people.

"Despatches have been received by Government from the Governor of Limbe, a place near the Cape, stating that after the shock he sent to that city for news. His aide-de-camp found the city destroyed, and the ruins covered by the sea, with the exception of a small portion, where were assembled the surviving inhabitants and authorities, most of the latter grievously wounded and mutilated.

"The absence of direct news after a lapse of five days makes us fear the worst for the unfortunate 'capital of the north.' The loss of life is vaguely calculated at one to two-thirds of the population. Succours of provisions bought by subscription are despatched hence to-day, for the use of the miserable survivors.

"We make no comment on this horrible catastrophe: its effects on business and the prospects of the country are likely to be very disastrous."

LANDING OF THE QUEEN'S PRESENTS.

Presents for her Majesty.—An Arabian man-of-war, the first that ever appeared in English waters, came up the river on Sunday, in tow of a steamer, and was moored in the afternoon off the Victualling-yard, at Deptford. On Monday she was towed into the St. Katharine's Dock. The pennant was flying at her main-top-mast head, and she had a red ensign hoisted at her mizen. This vessel, which excited much curiosity, is from Zanzebar, and has brought over four valuable Arabian horses and other presents, from the King of Muscat to her Majesty Queen Victoria. The vessel presents a similar appearance to that of one of our own merchantmen of 500 or 600 tons burthen, except that she carries 10 guns. Zanzebar, or Zanquebar, is a country on the east coast of Africa, between 3 N and 10 S. lat. It includes several petty kingdoms, in which the Portuguese formerly had settlements, but it is now subject to the King of Muscat.

SOUTH LONDON FLOWER SHOW.

ROYAL SOUTH LONDON HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The third grand flower show for the season 1842 was held on Tuesday in the Surrey Zoological Gardens: and, in point of beauty and variety, far exceeded those by which it has been preceded. The Society awarded on this occasion no less than forty-eight silver and three large gold medals, and were themselves repaid by a more liberal share of public patronage than we ever remember to have seen in this very popular place of amusement, the gardens being crowded to excess in every part. The more important prizes gained by the several competitors are given below:—

Class I.—Amateurs.—For the best pelargoniums, six varieties, gold medal—Mr. Edmonds. For the second best pelargoniums, large silver medal—Lady Paget.

Class II. Gentlemen Gardeners.—For the best collection of miscellaneous plants, 24 pots, gold medal—Mr. Bruce. For the second ditto, large silver medal—Mr. Atlee.

Class III. Nurserymen, &c.—For the best pelargoniums, 12 varieties, gold medal—Mr. Catleugh, of Chelsea. For the second ditto, large silver medal—Mr. Gains.

Class IV.—Open to All. For the best specimen plants of six distinct genera—orchidaceæ excluded, large silver medal—Mr. Atlee.

Extra Prizes offered by Members. For the best pine-apple grown in England, silver medal Mr. Hampton. For the best basket of black grapes, silver medal—Mr. R. J. Chapman. For the best collections of vegetables, silver medal—Mr. J. Gains.

MELODY OF SONG.

And if even words are sweet, what, what is song,
When lips we love the melody prolong:
How thrills the soul, and vibrates to that lay,
Swells with the glorious sound, or dies away!
How, to the cadence of the simplest words
That ever hung upon the wild harp's chords,
The breathless heart lies listening; as it felt
All life within it on that music dwelt,
And hush'd the beating pulse's rapid power
By its own will, for that enchanted hour.

Mrs. Norton.

THE WORTH OF TIME.

To show us the worth of time, God, most liberal of all other things, is exceedingly frugal in the dispensing of that, for he never gives us two moments together, nor grants us a second till he has withdrawn the first, still keeping the third in his own hands; so that we are in a perfect uncertainty whether we shall have it or not. The true manner of preparing for the last moment is to spend all the others well, and ever to expect that. We dote upon this world as if it were never to have an end, and we neglect the next as if it were never to have a beginning.—Feneelon.

AN IRISH COMPLIMENT.

A lovely girl was bending her head over a rose-tree which a lady was purchasing from an Irish basket-woman in Covent-garden market, when the woman looking kindly at the young beauty, said, "I axes her pardon, young lady, but if it's pleasing to ye, I'd thank you to keep your cheek away from that rose; ye'll put the lady out of consate with the colour of her flower."

SMALL DEBTS.

Dr. Johnson observed that they are like small shot they are rattling on every side, and can scarcely be escaped without a wound; great debts are like a cannon, of loud noise and little danger. Ninety-nine out of a hundred will acknowledge the truth of the doctor's observation.

CHRISTENINGS.

Now of names. Surely I have entered on the register the strangest imaginable. A mason's wife, and belonging to the next parish, presented her urchin. What took place is exactly as follows: "Say the name," said I, "with my finger in the water. "Acts, Sir," said she. "Acts," said I, what do you mean?" Thinks I to myself, I will act the clerk to spell it. He did, Acts so Acts was the babe, and will be while in this life, and will be doubly, trebly so registered, if ever it marries or dies. Afterwards, in the vestry, I asked the good woman what made her choose such a name. Her answer verbatim: "Why Sir, we be religious people; we've got four on 'em already, and they be call'd Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and so my husband thought he'd compliment the apostles a bit." The idea of complimenting the apostles with this little dab of living mortar was too much: even I could not help laughing. I have no doubt she will go on to Revelations, they being particularly religious people. Blackwood's Magazine.

COVETOUSNESS.

The desire of money blinds the eyes, and betrays into frauds which are unperceived. Would you be strictly honest, would you avoid the crooked conduct common in your profession, begin with determining that it shall be your chief object to please God, and not to obtain money; for be assured that a man cannot be true to his gain and true to his God also.—Thornton.

FRIENDSHIP.

I lost my spirits and my health,
But kept my friends, so did not wince,
Until one day I lost my wealth,
And never heard of friendship since.

Countess of Blessington.

LUNACY IN FLEAS.

A descendant and namesake of the great philosophical author of the inductive system, recently puzzled a modern man of science by asking him if he had read Dr. Von Shiernycher's treatise on the cause of lunacy in fleas? "No," replied the boaxee; "but it is a very interesting subject, and it must be curious to trace the disease among the lower insect tribes. But (added he, after a solemn pause) how has it been ascertained that fleas are liable to insanity?" "Oh, very easily," rejoined B——, "since so many of them die cracked."

A HARD NAME.

A man named Stone exclaimed in a bar room, "I'll bet I have the hardest name in the company." "Done," said one of the company; "what's your name?" "Stone," cried the first. "Hand me the money," said the other, "My name is Harder."

GOOD ADVICE.

(From the German of Goethe.)

Listen, youth, these hints from me,
Useful to thine early day!
Cautious learn betimes to be
Fortune's scales but seldom play
Long from wavering bias free!
Thou must either fall or stand,
Lose, or gather to thine hand;
Over others empire court,
Or let others govern thee;
Mourn or triumph—and, in short,
The anvil or the hammer be.—L. F.

WOMEN.

The prevailing manners of an age depend more than we are aware of, or are willing to allow, on the conduct of the women. This is one of the principal things on which the great machine of human society turns. Those who allow the influence which female graces have in contributing to polish the manners of the men, would do well to reflect how great an influence female morals must also have on their conduct. How much then is it to be regretted that woman should ever sit down contented to polish, where they are able to reform—to entertain, where they might instruct. Nothing delights men more than their strength of understanding, when true gentleness of manner is its associate; united they become irresistible orators, blessed with the power of persuasion, fraught with the sweetness of instruction, making woman the brightest ornament of human nature. Education and circumstances form the character. General states of mind, turns of thought, and fixed habits, which are the consequences of them, arise from education and the circumstances men are placed in. It is a necessary effect of the principles of association that the mind grows callous to new impressions continually; it being already occupied with ideas and sensations which render it indisposed to receive others, especially of an heterogeneous nature. In consequence, we seldom see any considerable change in a person's temper and habits after he is grown to man's estate; nothing short of an entire revolution in his circumstances and mode of life can effect it.

TO GET RID OF A VISITOR.

A late writer says:—"I once had a constant and troublesome visitor, whom I tried many ways to get rid of. First, I essayed smoke, which he bore like a badger; then I tried fire, which he endured like a salamander; at last I lent him five dollars, and I have never seen him since!" American paper.

STANZAS.

How beautiful the child, with his sweet smile,
His eager voice, his trust unfearing guile,
His tears, dried as they fall;
His looks, where wonder and delight are rife,
Still offering his nascent soul to life,
His kissing lips to all!

Spare, mighty Lord! spare me, and all I love
Friends, brethren, kindred, even foes who move
'Gainst me in triumph wild
From e'er beholding summer reft of flowers,
Beeless the hive, birdless the leafy bowers,
The house without a child!

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1842.

THE business of Parliament continues to progress as slowly as the tardiest legislator can reasonably desire, and, from all appearances, at present, there is no prospect of the session being brought to a close before the commencement of the autumn. The Tariff, to be sure, with its long train of schedules, has, at length, brought its Alexandrian length through committee; and commerce, which was said to languish and decay under the doubt and uncertainty in which the import duties were so long allowed to remain, may, now that this obstacle has been removed, order its wings, and be off to the remotest corners of the earth. Every conceivable article of merchandise, from the smallest to the largest objects—from a needle to an anchor—has undergone the most deliberate and minute consideration, and the philanthropist, whose heart is large enough to embrace the universe, although, perhaps, he may chance to overlook the country of his nativity, and who prefers the task of reclaiming the American savage, to that of improving the condition of his fellow-creatures at home, is at liberty to set off, whenever he chooses, with his cargo of pot-metal, penknives, strings of beads, and pieces of broken looking-glass, in the full conviction that no change in the export duties can possibly interfere with his humane speculation. Corn and Croton oil, Memel timber and straw-plaiting, Continental asses and home-fed lamb, all have undergone a most complete revision, and are now placed upon a footing of perfect commercial equality, and nothing now remains to be done, to ensure national prosperity, but to open shop, and re-commence business with a proper degree of enterprise. In the mean time, the summer is literally melting away, and everything, hard and soft, in nature, both in the metallic and vegetable worlds, bears testimony to the softening influence of the season. The obdurate sovereign, that erewhile used to boast of enduring the trying ordeal of the furnace without concession, now cravenly yields to the "sweating" process, and, in its "yellow fever," has become more contemptible than a handful of consumptive-looking fourpenny pieces. Even ice loses its frigidity, and the once terrible Jack Frost is little better now than a Guy Faux, and is consumed in such immense quantities all over the town, that setting fire to the Thames is no longer regarded in this age of miracles as a species of arson beyond the contemplation of the law. In the Legislature the intensity of the heat is no less powerfully felt, and, as a natural consequence, too much "corruption" becomes the prevailing complaint, and usurps the place of more agreeable, if not more important, subjects. We regret that the remainder of the session is likely to be occupied with nothing better than investigating the disgusting details of contested elections; but, as some ultimate good is likely to flow from the inquiry, we follow the example of the Parliament, and submit with a wry face. In the Lords a number of important changes are contemplated in the criminal law, some of which, especially those that relate to the rules of evidence, and the competency of unbelievers to give testimony in courts of justice, are regarded with some alarm and apprehension by a considerable portion of the community as a dangerous innovation, rather than a desirable improvement; and, consequently, considerable excitement prevails with regard to this important question. We have great confidence, however, in the wisdom of the Legislature, and doubt not that its love of justice will lead to a proper issue. We hope, next week, to be able to render a better and fuller account of "the business of Parliament."

THERE is too much truth in the assertion that law and justice are two very different things; and that though the forms of the first are intended to give effect to the principles of the last, yet those high and noble principles are too often borne down and overwhelmed by the burden of human codes and statutes. Justice is made ineffectual by the very means taken to give strength to her voice and edge to her sword; either to defend or punish we too often see her powerless. The search for justice must be made through an intricate and nearly endless labyrinth, to the heart of whose mystery none seem to have the clue; while the few who pretend to possess it, and who are therefore taken as our guides, appear to be more interested in misleading us than in conducting us to the feet of the divinity in whose name they act, and whose name, alas! they so frequently take in vain. We might pass over the sophistries of advocates and counsel; but we do expect from courts and tribunals, from what should be the fountain of justice itself, a freedom from petty prejudices, whether of country or class, and some respect to the common sense of mankind in the decisions they may come to. We need not say how often we are disappointed in this expectation; but it is not from any narrow spirit of nationality we feel bound to admit that our sense of justice has been far more frequently outraged by the decisions of the French courts of law, than by the decisions of our own. Putting aside the prosecutions of the press in that country, which have been for many years so many outrages on justice, and the trials of political offenders, which have been but little better than mockeries of it, if we look at the criminal trials of France we shall find much to censure, but which this is not the place to specify; and lastly, if we go to her civil tribunals, we are met by a sad want of that high and exalted motive which the difference between man and man as individuals, but considers only the justice of the questions referred to its decision. Impartiality between Tyrian and Trojan certainly is not to be found in the civil courts of France, when the contending parties are a citizen of her own soil and the inhabitant of another country. French justice is not blind; and when national prejudices are thrown into the scale, she is very apt to give short weight. This may seem strong language, but it is fully warranted by the scandalous decision of the civil tribunal of Boulogne, on the 10th instant, in the action brought by Mr. Barry, the agent of three of the leading London morning journals, against the French Post-office, for damage sustained by the detention of a letter.

It is well known that the London morning newspapers spare no expense to give the public the earliest foreign intelligence, the greater portion of which comes by way of France; it is obvious, therefore, that any interference with this communication by the French authorities is highly injurious to these journals; even the delay of one day may be fatal to an express that has been brought hundreds of miles.

It is difficult to define what motives can have actuated the French Government, but its jealousy of this English enterprise and despatch has lately been marked and repeated. To pass by the case in which the post-office prohibited the employment of a courier to convey an important despatch, for which an action was brought against the authorities, memorable alike for the splendid advocacy of Berryer and for the unjust decision of the court, we come to the immediate subject of our remarks, the action for damage sustained from the detention of a letter by the post-office. In both cases this establishment has acted with a bad spirit; it will neither suffer the journals to carry their own letters, nor will it carry them itself with anything like fidelity. Thus a letter with the Paris post-mark of April the 2nd, arrived at Boulogne on the next day, but was not delivered to Mr. Barry, the agent of the journals, till the 4th. It was, in fact, kept back for four-and-twenty hours; and who can calculate the injury of such a delay, to one of minutes are of consequence? Mr. Barry, as the agent of the morning journals, therefore enters an action against M. Blanquart, Director of the Boulogne post-office, for compensation; and to show the injustice of the decision of the civil tribunal, we have only to quote the principal "considerations" of the fiat, which are actually contradictory to each other:—

Considering that the delay in the delivery of a letter can in no case be assimilated with the loss of a letter, inasmuch as the ultimate delivery of the letter is ample proof of its having been duly posted;

"Considering that considerable injury may result from delay in the delivery of a letter confided to the Post-office, and that the law prescribes that the person who by fault or negligence inflicts an injury on an individual is compelled to repair it:

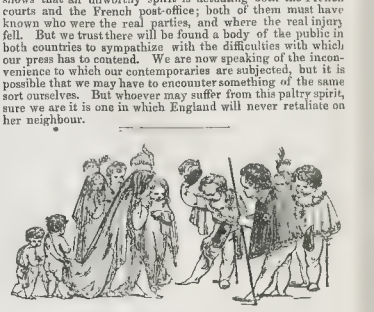
"Considering, nevertheless, that there must be a real damage to be appreciated, in order to apply articles 1382 and 1383 of the civil code;"

"Considering that Barry has not proved that he sustained personal injury of any importance by the delay in the delivery of the letter of the 2nd of April, and that by a fact to which he was no party, the confidence in him had not been shaken;"

The court, after having deliberated according to the law, and judging in premiere instance, admits the intervention of the Director-general of the Post-office, and exempts M. Blanquart from the action; declares Mr. Barry's demand ill-founded, and not receivable in his facts and conclusions, and condemns him in the costs.

The very first clause is a sophism, for in this peculiar case the delay of a letter is the same as its loss; the lapse of a few hours may render it worthless. The next clause allows that injury may result from delay, and allows the justice of compensation; and in the teeth of this reasonable concession, the decision goes on to affirm, that because Mr. Barry does not prove a direct personal injury, or loss of confidence, "by a fact to which he was no party," he is not only not entitled to compensation, but mulcted in costs! Why, an agent seldom does incur direct personal loss from what affects his employers. To set aside the liability to give compensation by such a quibble, shows that an unworthy spirit is actuating both the French courts and the French post-office; both of them must have known who were the real parties, and where the real injury fell. But we trust there will be found a body of the public in both countries to sympathise with the difficulties with which our press has to contend. We are now speaking of the inconvenience to which our contemporaries are subjected, but it is possible that we may have to encounter something of the same sort ourselves. But whoever may suffer from this paltry spirit, sure we are it is one in which England will never retaliate on her neighbour.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen received an address of congratulation on Monday morning from the Eton scholars, which was presented in the Grand Hall by the two senior scholars, Messrs. Browning and Hulse.

On the same day her Majesty and the royal suite were escorted from Windsor by a party of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards to the Slough station of the Great Western Railway, and were conveyed by a special train to the Paddington terminus, where the royal equipages were waiting.

Her Majesty held a Court and Privy Council at Buckingham Palace after her arrival.

At the Council the Queen made a declaration, signifying approbation of the marriage of his Royal Highness Prince George of Cumberland with the Princess Alexandrina Mary, daughter of his Serene Highness the Duke of Saxe Altenburg.

A proclamation was ordered to be issued respecting a new coinage of half farthings.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Counts Mensdorf, and attended by the Countess of Dunmore, Lord Rivers, Lord Charles Wellesley, and Sir Edward Bowater, honoured the performance of the French plays with their presence on Monday evening.

It is strongly rumoured that her Majesty and Prince Albert intend to honour the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos with a visit at his magnificent mansion at Stow

A grand entertainment is to be given to Sir Robert Peel and the rest of her Majesty's ministers, at the Goldsmiths'-hall, on the 29th instant.

Sir Charles Metcalfe, the late governor of Jamaica, is daily expected from the West Indies.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Counts Mensdorf, and attended by the Countess of Dunmore, Lord Rivers, Lord Charles Wellesley, and Sir Edward Bowater, honoured the Italian Opera with their presence on Tuesday.

The Morning Post contradicts the rumour which has prevailed for some time past, that it was the intention of the Queen Dowager to pass the forthcoming winter in Italy.

The Queen and Prince Albert honoured the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland with their company at dinner on Wednesday evening at their house. Her Majesty and the Prince left Buckingham Palace at eight o'clock, accompanied by his Excellency Count Mensdorf, and the Counts Hugh, Alphonso, Alexander, and Arthur Mensdorf, &c.

The state apartments at Windsor Castle are now open to the public every day in the week, Friday excepted, from eleven to six o'clock; and, during the residence of the Court, the apartments will be closed on Tuesdays and Fridays

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, and their Serene Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Meiningen, and the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen, attended by the Viscountess Barrington, Hon. Miss Anne Hood, Mademoiselle de Knas, Earl of Denbigh, Sir David Davies, and the Preceptor to the Hereditary Prince, left Marlborough-house soon after ten o'clock on Wednesday morning for the station of the South-Western Railway, and left town by a special train for Southampton, to embark in the afternoon in a steam-packet for Ryde.

The Queen received addresses on the Throne on Wednesday at Buckingham Palace, from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and from the Corporation of the City of London.

The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London had afterwards an audience of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and presented an address of congratulation to his Royal Highness.

The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London, after presenting addresses to the Queen and Prince Albert, attended at Clarence-house, St. James's, and presented an address of congratulation to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

MARRIAGE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE ROYAL OF HANOVER. Her Majesty has signified her approbation of this intended alliance, the Royal Marriage Act, we presume, rendering such a step necessary, as the Prince Royal is in the direct line of succession to the throne of Great Britain. The lady to whom his Royal Highness is about to be united, is the Princess Alexandrina of Saxe Altenburg, who has lately completed her twenty-fourth year.

ALMACK'S.—The votaries of fashion who patronise these aristocratical réunions are about to form several dress quadrilles, some of which, we hear, are already arranged. It is said this novelty will be introduced to-night, and the report appears deserving of credit, for the Ladies Patronesses have strictly limited their vouchers to 600; and the demand for the entrée has been such, that their "books" are nearly full of applications.

One of the most numerous and respectable meetings ever congregated in the French capital, of British residents, took place last Tuesday afternoon, for the purpose of voting an address to her Majesty on the late atrocious attempt of Francis. This address was moved by Earl Leven and Melville, and seconded by Lord Aylmer. Another address, to Prince Albert, was moved by Lord Roden, and seconded by Colonel Fox. And, finally, one to the Duchess of Kent, by the Right Hon. Henry Ellis, and seconded by Sir William Curtis, Bart. The three addresses were signed by the Marquis of Westmeath on behalf of the meeting, who was charged to deliver them to Lord Cowley to transmit them to England.

A subscription to raise a monument in Père le Chaise to the memory of Sir Sidney Smith is now in progress in Paris. Lord Cowley, Lord Leven and Melville, Lord Aylmer, &c., head the list.

ABSTINENCE OF ANIMALS.—Animals endure hunger in proportion to the nature of their food. In birds, for example, the granivorous die in the space of forty-eight hours, while those which feed on insects will hold out for a short period longer. But those which can least bear abstinence are such as live on fruit, a peculiarity that is owing probably to their stomach, which digesting more speedily, has more frequent need of aliment. This quick digestion is, however, attended with one advantage, which is, that being reduced to an equal degree of inanition by abstinence the animal if assisted will recover and resume its strength sooner than others. With the granivorous species this is not the case. Debilitated to a certain point, if nothing but the seeds, on which they usually fed, be given to them, they can never be restored—their stomach having lost in part its power of digestion. With the carnivorous, on the contrary, digestion is retained to the last moment; and hence it happens that receiving the kind of food which is suited to them, an instant only is necessary to their recovery. The cause of this difference is this, flesh, from its affinity to the animal, becomes speedily incorporated with it, and its juices are highly nutritive, and the assistance it gives is instantaneous. With seeds the case is the reverse; to be digested they must remain some time in the stomach, where they require to be previously softened and saturated. This operation is tedious, and suppose, besides, a vital action in the gullet—a motion and force which destroys. If two sparrows of the same age, and in equally good condition, be reduced, by want of nourishment, to such a degree of weakness that neither of them be able to take what is offered, and some bruised seeds are forced down the throat of one, and a little minced flesh down that of the other, in a few minutes the latter will be quite well, while the former will die in about two hours. Granivorous birds, although seeds are their chief nourishment, add thereto fruit, flesh, insects, &c. Carnivorous birds, whether they live on flesh or insects, are uniform in their food, and have no recourse to seeds. Piscivorous birds are most subject to hunger; hence they are supplied with large gullets or pouches, in which they accumulate their provision. Birds of prey endure hunger for a considerable period, and so do quadrupeds. If the garden spider, if confined under a glass, cemented down, will exist many months without food; and although its body will become shrivelled, it will, immediately food is restored to it, regain its wonted plumpness and size.—Indicator.

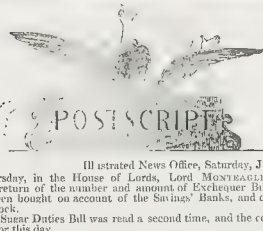
FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Saturday evening about seven o'clock, as an elderly man, named Liddell, in the employment of Mr. Baxter, soap-manufacturer, of Lambeth, was driving his master's horse and chaise up Carlisle-lane, the animal took fright, and, unfortunately, threw Liddell with great violence into the road. Several persons ran to the unfortunate man's assistance, and he was instantly conveyed to the surgery of Mr. Burroughs, in the Westminster-road, when that gentleman and his assistant paid the utmost attention to the case; but such were the dreadful injuries received, that the unfortunate man died in about half-an-hour after the accident had happened.



Illustrated News Office, Saturday, June 18.

Thursday, in the House of Lords, Lord MONTEAGLE moved for a return of the number and amount of Exchequer Bills which had been bought on account of the Savings' Banks, and converted into stock.

The Sugar Duties Bill was read a second time, and the committee fixed for this day.

The Earl of RADNOR moved for a return of the quantities of corn admitted into this country under the Acts of 6 and 7 Geo. IV.

In answer to questions by Lord HOWDEN,

The Earl of ABERDEEN said that the recent accounts from Syria were in some degree more favourable than those that had previously been received; but that there was still much in the state of that province that rendered interference necessary.

The LORD CHANCELLOR brought in a bill, which was read a first time, to regulate the practice of county courts.

The following bills were adjourned:—

In the Commons, Mr. HARRIS took the oaths and his seat as member for Newcastle under-Lyne.

On the motion of Mr. O'CONNELL, the following members were nominated as the select committee on the Belfast election

Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Edmund Denison, Mr. Cripps, Mr. East, Mr. Liddell, Mr. Elliee, Mr. Protheroe, and Sir Benjamin Hall. The motion having been agreed to, Mr. O'CONNELL next moved that the committee have power to inquire into the charges of treating and bribery at the said election.

Sir R. INGLIS said, in answer to a question by Mr. HAWES, that it was his fixed determination to bring the subject of church extension before the house in the course of the present session.

Mr. W. O. STANLEY moved for the appointment of a select committee to consider the various petitions that had been presented in reference to the Southampton election. With an amendment suggested by Mr. HODGSON HINDE, the motion was agreed to.

Sir JOHN EASTHOPE moved, pursuant to notice, for leave to bring in a bill to abolish Church Rates. Motion refused.

Mr. FERRAND brought forward his promised motion "That the house will, on Tuesday, the 21st day of this instant June, resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, for the purpose of taking into consideration the following resolution: That it is the opinion of this house, that immediate measures be taken to alleviate the deplorable distress and destitution which now afflict many of the working classes in the manufacturing districts; and that an address be presented to her Majesty, beseeching her Majesty to employ for the temporary relief a sum of money not exceeding one million sterling, and that this house will provide for the same." The hon. member showed, with much energy and feeling, the distress of the manufacturing workpeople, and eulogised the benevolence of her Majesty in having issued her letter on their behalf; but, as the funds to be derived from this source could not meet the demands on them, he thought the house was called on to interfere.

Sir ROBERT PEEL opposed the motion, not because he did not deeply sympathize with the distress of the manufacturing population, but because any grant must involve taxation, and taxation would affect all the consuming classes. A grant of public money, moreover, would have the effect of checking the exertions of private benevolence.

After a protracted debate the motion was negatived by 196 to 6.

The report on the Customs Duties was brought up and agreed to.

The reports of the committees on the Dean Forest Poor Bill and the St. Briavel's Small Debts' Bill were respectively brought up, agreed to, and the bills ordered to be engrossed.

The report of the committee on the Assessed Taxes Committee Bill has also received, and the bill ordered for a third reading

Mr. F. MAULE then moved for amended returns from the Sheriffs depute and substitute of Lanarkshire, respecting certain fees exacted by Sheriffs of Scotland, which, after some observations from Sir J. GRAHAM, were ordered.

The other orders of the day having been disposed of, the house adjourned at half-past twelve

FRIDAY.

The House of Lords was engaged chiefly with the debate arising on the third reading of the Income Tax Bill, on a resolution proposed by the Marquis of Lansdowne, to the effect that a judicious alteration in the duties upon corn, sugar, and timber, would have been preferable to a tax upon income. This was negatived by a majority of 60, and the Opposition, by repeatedly moving the adjournment of the house, succeeded for the night in preventing the further progress of the bill

Adjourned at three o'clock.

In the Commons several petitions were presented against the Poor Laws. Mr. C. BULLER gave notice that on Monday he should bring forward the subject of the gold coinage, which was at present so very annoying to the public. The order of the day for the second reading of the Poor Law Amendment Bill was then read; and Mr. S. CRAWFORD moved that it be read that day three months. A debate ensued, and was continued to a late hour; when the house divided—For the second reading, 280; against it, 81. majority, 199.

The Dean Forest Poor Bill was (after a division) read a third time and passed. Adjourned at a quarter to one.

COURT.

HER MAJESTY'S DRAWING-ROOM.—The Queen held a Drawing-room on Thursday afternoon, at St. James's Palace. Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived from Buckingham Palace, attended by her usual suite, and escorted by a party of Life Guards. The Counts Mensdorf accompanied her Majesty and his Royal Highness from Buckingham Palace.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, attended by Lady Georgiana Bathurst, arrived by the garden entrance, and was received by the Vice-Chamberlain, who conducted her Royal Highness to the Queen's closet.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent was attended by Lady Anna Maria Dawson and Colonel Sir George Couper, Bart

The Queen and Prince Albert, and their illustrious relatives, attended by the royal suite, entered the Throne-room, when, after the presentations to her Majesty took place in the Foreign Diplomatic circle, those of the general circle succeeded, and lasted until a late hour.

The Queen gave audience to the Lord Chamberlain, and Colonel Walton, Field Officer in Waiting.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the royal suite, returned to Buckingham Palace after the Drawing-room, which was one of the most brilliant of the season.

Her Serene Highness the Duchess Ida of Saxe Weimar, accompanied by Prince Gustavus and the Princesses of Saxe Weimar, and attended by her suite, left Marlborough-house, the residence of the Queen Dowager, soon after eight o'clock on Wednesday morning, for the Custom-house, and embarked in the Columbine steam-packet for the Continent

ROYAL VISITORS.—The King and Queen of the Belgians will arrive at Woolwich, by the Oriel steam-vessel, early on Monday morning.

DOMESTIC

The Queen has nominated Colonel Sir Robert Henry Sale, Knight Commander of the Bath, serving with the rank of Major-General in Affghanistan, to be a Knight Grand Cross of the said Order.

The Rev. George Tomlinson, who was nominated on the recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Bishopric of Gibraltar, has been accepted by her Majesty

It appears that the Dean and Chapter of Westminster Abbey "have given orders for a portion of their ornamental fund to be laid out upon a splendid painted glass window, to be put up immediately in the south transept."

Professors Jacobi and Bessell have been presented by the King of Prussia with 3000 dollars, to enable them to be present at the meeting of the British Association at Manchester.

Lord and Lady John Russell will leave Belgrave-square the second week in the ensuing month, on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Minto, at Minto Castle, Roxburghshire.

THAMES ROYAL YACHT CLUB. The first below-bridge match took place yesterday; and the cup was won by Lord A. Paget's new iron cutter the Mystery, which was the favourite at starting.

On Friday afternoon the annual aquatic contest amongst the members of the University belonging to their subscription boat club for the club silver medals, took place from Westminster to Putney. After a spirited race between five four oared boats, the following crew were declared the victors: Mr. Ritchie, Trinity College; Mr. Cobbold, St. Peter's College; Mr. Phillips, Christ College; and the Hon. G. Denman, Trinity College. Mr. Egan, Celtic College, steerer.

The election for Town Clerk of the city will take place on Thursday next; the salary to be continued at 2000*l* as before.

MALIBRAN.—Sefie Cerito has received from the Queen Dowager an exquisitely enamelled brooch set with brilliants of great value, as a testimony of her approbation of the fair dancer's performance of Le pas Styrien.

Count Matuschewitz, so well known as a first-rate diplomatist, and ma also for his love of British field-sports, died at St Petersburgh on the 2nd inst.

The Society of True Highlanders celebrated their annual festival yesterday, by playing a grand match at the national game of shinty, in the Copenhagen fields, and afterwards dining together at the Copenhagen House.

DREADFUL RIOTS IN GALWAY—CALLING OUT AND RETREAT OF THE MILITARY. (From the Dublin Pilot of Wednesday.)—Extract of a private letter from Galway (Thursday, June 14) "Nothing can exceed the dreadful excitement here at present, in consequence of the high price of provisions. During the whole of yesterday the town was perambulated by large bodies of fishermen, labourers, women, and boys. There was scarcely a store in the town, in which potatoes were thought to be kept, that was not broken open. The military and police were called out to check the people, but were cobbled, by overwhelming numbers, to retreat to their respective barracks. At night the whole town was illuminated to celebrate the triumph of the destitute population. Though their conduct cannot be justified, still it must be admitted that they had considerable provocation, as potatoes were raised in the morning to the enormous price of eightpence per stone. The great majority, however, through the want of employment, would be unable to purchase potatoes were they even to be had at one penny per stone"

By the kindness of a correspondent of ours at Galway, we have been favoured with a very spirited sketch of the riots there, which we have placed in our artist's hands, and hope we shall be able next week to present to our readers a graphic representation of the affair.]

LIGHT GOLD COIN.—BANK OF ENGLAND, JUNE 17, 1842. The public are informed that Light Gold Coin, in amounts from 5*l* to 30*l*. will be received in the Rotunda until the 5th of July next; after which period, as that office will be required for the payment of dividends, arrangements will be made to receive it elsewhere, in such amounts as may be found practicable. And until further notice, amounts from 30*l*. to 500*l*. will be received in the Hall, and from 500*l* and upwards in the Bullion-office.

The calculation of the Income-tax still occupies much of the attention of the clerks in the Consol-office of the Bank of England.

In the price of Consols a fall of full ¼ per cent. occurred to-day. The decline probably would have scarcely been felt to the extent noticed, but not rumours been afloat relative to the bad state of the health of the King of the French. The market left off weak and flat, with a bulkish sum of money. Consols for the Account closed 91¾ to ¼; Bank Stock, 167 to 168; Exchequer-bills, 2½d., 4½s. to 4½s. premium; ditto, 2d., 40s. to 42s. premium; and India Bonds, 21s to 23s. premium

TRIAL OF FRANCIS FOR ATTEMPTING TO ASSASSINATE HER MAJESTY.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, FRIDAY.

The trial of John Francis for attempting to shoot her Majesty on Constitution hill, took place to-day at the Old Bailey

The Attorney General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Adolphus, and Mr. Waddington, were counsel for the prosecution. Mr. Clarkson was counsel for the prisoner

At ten o'clock Lord Chief Justice Tindal, Mr. Baron Gurney, and Mr. Justice Patteson, entered the court and took their seats immediately afterwards the prisoner was placed at the bar; he appeared dejected and considerably altered since his examination at the Home-office.

The indictment having been read, the Attorney-General stated the case—the facts of which are so recent and well-known, that they need not be repeated, as they will be found in detail in our third number, pp. 49, 50, and 51.

Colonel Arbuthnot was first called, and his evidence corroborated what had been stated by the Attorney-General. The colonel's principal evidence was—Between six and seven o'clock we were coming down Constitution Hill, when about half way down the hill I observed the prisoner, and on the carriage reaching him, he took a pistol from his side and fired it in the direction of the Queen. As quickly as I could I pulled up my horse, and gave the prisoner into custody. The prisoner had before this caught my attention, as appearing anxious to see her Majesty. He was standing about three yards to the right of the pump on Constitution Hill, near the Palace. In an after cross-examination, respecting the pistol being loaded with ball, the colonel said, my opinion is that it was loaded with something more than powder or wadding, from the sharpness and loudness of the report. That is a mere matter of opinion. I do not think that powder only would have made such a sound. A blank cartridge is a mere evaporation of powder. This was the report of a pistol well rammed down and charged.

Henry Allen, private of the Scots Fusilier Guards, was next examined, and deposed to the same effect. On cross-examination he said I have had experience in firing with ball and blank cartridge, and from what I could judge I should say the pistol was loaded with ball That is my impression from my experience. A piece fired with ball makes a sharper sound than a blank cartridge.

Colonel Wylde's evidence was to the same effect; and he also said that a wadding would decidedly wound the skin or face, or the eye, and it would be very likely to set fire to the clothes of the person at whom it was discharged. From the report, there must have been in it some very strong wadding to compress the powder, or a bullet. This of course is only a matter of opinion.

William Trounce, the policeman, was examined, and deposed to the same points. Other evidence was produced as to the purchase of the pistol, and powder and flints. Mr. Pearson detailed the affair on the previous Sunday, when the prisoner presented the pistol at the Queen, and afterwards put it in his pocket.

The evidence for the prosecution being concluded, the jury retired for a short time; on their return, Mr. Clarkson addressed them in defence of the prisoner. The learned counsel, in alluding to the pistol not being loaded with ball, said, every one must deplore the act the prisoner had committed; but that offence, he contended, did not amount to the charge of high treason made against the prisoner. He admitted the intention was the act, in law, but if the intention was not proved, of course the charge failed altogether. The Attorney-General had said that the case would be proved in everything but one little particular; under such circumstances, he (Mr. Clarkson) called upon the jury to protect the life of the prisoner from being sacrificed by any insinuation that was not borne out by the evidence. Mr. Clarkson, after commenting on other points of evidence, concluded by observing—he admitted that the prisoner had committed a mischievous and wicked act, for which he deserved and would no doubt receive severe punishment, but he was there to uphold the law, and to contend that the charge of treason had not been made out. The country had rung with the details of the prisoner's crime—it was no fortune that a cry had been raised that Oxford should have been executed, and that the prisoner must be executed. Still, however, he hoped that the jury would dismiss those matters of prejudice from their minds, and that they would do justice to the crown and the prisoner.

No evidence was called for the prisoner, and the Solicitor-General replied. His principal argument was against the prisoner's motives. He said the doctrine of asking for a motive for a crime was a most dangerous one. If it were admitted, many crimes would pass unpunished; and if it were dangerous in ordinary cases, how much more dangerous in such cases as this? Who could tell the motive of Eaches? Of his guilt there could be no doubt; yet who could tell his motive? The Solicitor-General told the jury, in conclusion, that if they had any doubt, to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt.

Chief Justice Tindal then summed up, and directed the attention of the jury principally to this point: If it should appear satisfactory to them, that the pistol was loaded with a bullet, there could be very little doubt as to the guilty intent of the prisoner; therefore, the first question to be considered was, whether the pistol was loaded with a bullet or any other destructive substance. There was a second question to be considered, which was whether, although the pistol was only loaded with gunpowder and wadding, it was fired so close to her Majesty, as to be calculated to do her severe bodily harm, then also an overt act would be made out. If the jury were satisfied of neither of these positions, then their verdict must be in favour of the prisoner. The learned judge then read his notes of the evidence at length.) With regard to the identity of the prisoner there could be no doubt. It was clear that he was the person spoke to by all the witnesses, that he was seized with the pistol in his possession, which pistol he had just discharged. The learned judge concluded by telling the jury, if they should feel convinced that the prisoner had committed the offence with which he stood charged, it would be their duty to bring in a verdict of guilty, without regard to consequences; but if they should be in possession that the scales of justice hung even, then they would give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt

The Clerk of the Arraigns—Gentlemen of the jury, please to consider your verdict. The jury having consulted for a few minutes in the box, the foreman said My Lord, I think that we shall require more.—Lord Chief Justice Tindal: Certainly, gentlemen. The jury then retired at twenty minutes to four o'clock to consider the verdict, and returned into court at five minutes after five, and brought in a verdict of guilty on the second and third counts "We think there is some doubt on the first."

Lord Chief Justice Tindal: Do you find him guilty of the first overt act, that the pistol was loaded with a bullet? We do not—Do you find him guilty on the second overt act, that the pistol was charged with some destructive substance? We do. It is your opinion, therefore, that the pistol was loaded with something else besides wadding and powder? It is—I wished distinctly to ascertain your opinion on that point. The prisoner, who turned pale when the verdict was delivered, was called on. The Clerk of the Arraigns John Francis, you stand convicted of high treason. What have you to say why the court should not give you judgment to die according to law? The prisoner, who seemed dreadfully affected, returned no answer.—Silence was then proclaimed, and the three judges (Chief Justice Tindal, Mr. Justice Patteson, and Mr. Baron Gurney) having put on their black caps, Chief Justice Tindal proceeded to pass sentence of death upon the prisoner in the following terms. John Francis, a jury of your countrymen have, after a patient investigation, found you guilty of a crime of the deepest and the most dreadful nature known to the laws of this country—I mean the crime of high treason; and for that crime I have now to pass upon you the judgment of the court. It is needless, at present, to enlarge upon the nature of your offence, for the heart that could imagine so dreadful a crime must be callous to every consideration of virtue and humanity. Let me beseech you to apply yourself for the short time that you have to remain in this world, to endeavour by your contrition and penitence for the dreadful crime which you have committed, to obtain the pardon of that Almighty God, who, by his interposition, prevented you from completing the horrid crime which you had imagined. It now only remains for me to pass upon you the sentence of the law, which is, that you, John Francis, be taken from hence to the place from whence you came, that you be drawn from thence on a hurdle to the place of execution, and that you be hanged by the neck and cut down alive; that your head be afterwards severed from your body, and that your body be divided into four quarters to be disposed of in such manner as to her Majesty shall seem fit, and the Lord have mercy on your soul.

At the conclusion of the sentence the prisoner fell fainting back into the arms of the gaolers, and he was led away sobbing most piteously.

* In our next we shall give an accurate portrait of Francis

FRANCE. There is no political news in the French journals of Wednesday. The National states that several of the wine-growers of Bordeaux, having been unable to pay their taxes, have been distrained upon, their cattle and furniture having been seized in preference to their stock of wine on hand.

SPAIN. The Spanish Ministry was not formed up to last evening, the 11th inst., "but," adds the Bayonne telegraphic despatches of the 14th inst., which communicated this news to the French Government, "it was affirmed that Count Almodovar and Senores Landero, Ramon, Calatrava, Labolada, Cortina, and Vidl were to compose it, under the Presidency of Gen. Rodil."

PORTUGAL.—LISBON, June 7th. The general elections are just concluded; and the result is, that the Ministry will have a very considerable majority. It is also said the Duke of Palmella will permanently accept office.

MODERN SCHOOL OF ART IN GERMANY.

THISBE LISTENING AT THE WALL.

Many of our readers have seen the exquisite lithographic engraving of "Thisbe Listening at the Wall," for it has arrested the eye of many a passenger, as it gleamed in its graceful simplicity from the windows of our print-dealers. We have here given a reduced copy of it, and may be pardoned for saying, that we believe our artist has preserved the spirit and character of the original. It is one of the prizes distributed to the subscribers to the Art-Union of Germany; and while we see such productions appreciated, we think that those who assert that those Unions are not calculated to disseminate a discriminating taste in art, are not quite supported by the fact. It is true, that the prizes of the German Union are chosen by a committee, and certainly better taste could not have been exhibited than in the choice of this picture. Our own Art-Union, which is formed generally on the foreign model, leaves this nice point to the free judgment of the holders of prizes: this is defended on the ground that thereby better chances are given to the productions of young, and, it may be, rising artists, while the selection of a committee would probably be made from the works of men of established reputation. There is something gratifying to the vanity of individuals, in the liberty of making a free choice, but we suspect that it is as often an embarrassment as a privilege. Many would be glad to have the trouble taken off their hands, especially if the result proved to be such a gem of art as the "Thisbe." Even as far as the artists themselves are concerned, we somewhat doubt the policy of leaving taste yet unformed and uncultivated, to patronise powers equally crude and immature. We, therefore, on the whole, incline to the German plan of a committee of selection, and another glance at "Thisbe" confirms us. It is engraved from a painting by Steinbrück, and is published at Berlin. It represents Thisbe listening to the friendly crack in the wall, having, as we may imagine, been arrested by the voice of her lover while filling her pitcher at the fountain. The water running over the brim of the vessel, tells that she has lingered for some time at the opening, for to those to whom sight is denied the mere sound of words is welcome. Her attitude is beautifully expressive: her left hand is raised as if to chide even the murmuring of the stream for disturbing the silence she would fain command; her face wears a sweet expression, while her dress is rich in that "sweet neglect" so much admired by old Ben Jonson, who, under all his roughness, had an exquisite feeling for the beautiful. The whole subject displays that careful and correct drawing for which the German school of art is so justly celebrated. We honour the genius that could evoke a picture so sweetly natural from the old classic fiction of the lovers of Babylon.

In connexion with this subject we may extract from a contemporary exclusively devoted to art, a short notice of the prizes given by the Art-Unions of Düsseldorf and Berlin, in the years 1839 and 1840. From an examination of the engravings mentioned we augur favourably of their effect on art, especially if the idea at present entertained of exhibiting all the prize pictures of the German Art-Union in London is carried into effect.

"In 1839 the Art-Union of Düsseldorf presented to subscribers an engraving of Professor Keller, from a picture by Bendeman, entitled 'Girls at the Fountain.' The title, which might admit of a much less refined illustrations than exists in this beautiful engraving, is not worthy of the work; for, in the composition, the fountain is a mere accident, the whole force of the theme being settled in the expression of the countenances of the two girls, which involves a tale of the heart. The engraving is in line, and in the perfection of that style.

"In 1840 the same Art-Union presented to its subscribers an engraving by Felsing from a picture by Kohler, entitled 'Poetry.' The subject is made out by a figure in a sitting position, winged and draped, and writing in a book the inscription she is invoking. This figure is also in line engraving, and is as much superior to ordinary allegory as good poetry is to bad. In 1841 this was followed by the 'Queen of Heaven,' engraved also by Felsing, from a picture by Deger, exhibiting the most exalted feeling for religious painting.

"In 1839 the Berlin Art-Union presented its subscribers with 'Die Lurley,' an engraving by Carl Begas, from a picture by Mandel. The subject is from one of the legends of the Rhine, in which a maiden is described as luring by night passengers out of their way by the sweetness of her music. The figure is on a cliff, supposed to overlook the Rhine, and a traveller is seen ascending the rock. The figure is admirably drawn, and is characterised by much of the beauty of the greatest works. The same Society, in 1837, gave to its subscribers 'Das Trauernde Königspaar,' engraved by Luderitz, from a picture by Lessing, and enforcing the moral, that no 'flesh' is exempt from sorrow 'Das Königspaar,' a king and queen, are, seated lamenting the evils of humanity, from which their high estate cannot secure them."

The last, let us add, is a beautiful painting, and worthy of all admiration.

THE HENLEY REGATTA.

THE REGATTA AT HENLEY.

TUESDAY.

The announced regatta at Henley-on-Thames, which had been looked forward to with a great degree of sporting interest, turned out, we regret to say, but a sorry day's sport, not from any want of attention in those on whom the management devolved, but in consequence of a dispute which arose as to the right of the Cambridge gentlemen to shift any portion of their crew. This was strongly objected to on the part of the Oxonians, who were of opinion that the holders of the prize ought to confine themselves to their own crew; and the stewards and the umpire having been called upon, decided that the Cambridge were justified in changing, on the ground that the members of the Universities were also members of the rooms in London. The decision was far from satisfactory, and two of the Oxford clubs, the University Boat Club and the Oriel Club, were withdrawn, and the entries for the day's sport were left to consist of four challengers for the Grand Cup in two heats (thegentlemen being divided in consequence of the narrowness of the stream), and four boats for the second heat, similarly arranged.

First Heat for the Challenge Cup.—Cambridge University Boat Club.—Cambridge 8. Mr Ridley, stroke; 7. The Hon. G. Denman; 6. Mr. Royds; 5. Mr. Cobbold; 4. Mr. Yorke; 3. Mr. Watson; 2. The Hon. G. L. Denman; 1. Mr. Tower; Mr. Egan, steerer. King's College 8. Mr. Lante, stroke; 7. Mr. Lee; 6. Mr. Kennett; 5. Mr Lambe; 4. Mr. Coulson; 3. Mr Harrison; 2. Mr. Snell; 1. Mr. Stock; Mr. Lewis, steerer.

A pretty start, but the race won easily by the Cantabs.

Second Heat. The Etonian Boat Club. 8. Mr. Bethel, stroke; 7. Mr. Bethell; 6. Mr Shadwell; 5. Mr. Rogers; 4. Mr. Walter; 3. Mr. Lambert; 2. Mr Oddie; 1. Mr. Stapylton; Mr. Shadwell, steerer The Oxford London Aquatic Club.—Messrs Maberly, stroke; Powis, Powell, Walsh, Lovesay, Simpson, Cox, Stuart, Churchill, steerer.

This was a sharp and spirited conflict, and won by half a length by the Oxonians.

The Grand Heat. Cambridge University Boat Club. Oxford London Aquatic Club.

The gentlemen did not start for this until nearly half-past eight in the evening, but it compensated for the lateness of the day and the tediousness of the fore part.

It was a sharp, splendid, and beautiful race, and brought down shouts from a vast assemblage. They started level, and in about half a minute, Oxford had slightly the lead. In another minute they were scull and scull, and went in this way at an almost incredible speed to the winning-post. It was generally considered a dead heat at first sight, and then a report was in circulation that Oxford had won, but the umpire, Mr D Bishop, being referred to, pronounced the Cambridge crew to have won by a "foot."

Stewards' Challenge Cup.—This was with four-oared boats, and at the time of starting two of the crews had retired from the conflict, leaving the London St. George's Boat Club and the Henley Dreadnought to try their fortunes as challengers.

Dreadnought—Messrs. Page, stroke; Ewhurst, Forrest, Ive; Tagg, steerer. St. George's Boat Club—Messrs. Bannister, stroke; Burke, Thackaway, Hodding , steerer.

A good race; they were our and our half a mile, and then the St. George's gave a chance away by steering very badly. Both crews rowed hard, and the Dreadnought won by a length.

THE STEWARDS' CHALLENGE CUP.

This was the whole of the sport of the day, and it will be seen in the course of the above that Mr. Viols was substituted for Mr. Penrose in the great Cambridge task of last Saturday, and as he had been in the room's boat, this was, no doubt, the knotty point at issue. We understand Mr. Penrose withdrew in consequence of a domestic calamity, and that Mr. Viols is duly qualified.

The sport on Wednesday was first-rate, the weather exceedingly fine, and the attendance exceeded, not only in number but in condition, the races of any previous season. The disappointment attendant upon the withdrawal of the Oxford boats, and the necessary confusion upon the general disarrangement of the list, had been got over, and the bridge, the towing-path, the stands, and the beautiful hills which rise in succession on the Berks shore, were covered with spectators. It was the Derby of the aquatics. The trial races had been gone through, and the expectant people were anxiously anticipating, in the struggle for the respective valuable prizes and honorary distinctions, a scientific and gratifying exhibition. At three o'clock, the judges having taken their places in the grand stand, and D. Bishop, Esq., the umpire, having taken his seat in the cutter, manned by picked London watermen, preparations were made for the first race, for the Stewards' Challenge Cup, value 75 guineas.—The Dreadnought and the Midge were the opposing parties, and the boats were manned thus London. The Midge (University qualification).—Messrs. Maberley, stroke; Powis, Porock, Stuart, Churchill, steerer.

Henley. The Dreadnought Cutter Club Messrs. Page, stroke; Outhwaite, Forest, Ive; Tagg, steerer.

It was a very indifferent race. The Midge took the lead, kept it, and won very easily.

The next prize was the District Challenge Cup, for four-oared boats, now extended to amateur clubs belonging to any of the towns on the banks of the Thames, from Windsor to Oxford (both inclusive) established at least one year previous to the time of entering, or members of any University Clubs. The competitors for this were the following:—

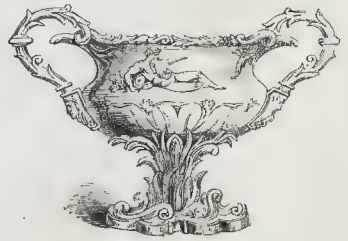
Windsor. The Windsor and Eton Boat Club. Messrs. W. Long, stroke; Muckhouse, G. Long, Dodd; E. Long, steerer.

Oxford. The Dolphin Boat Club.—Messrs. Bucket, stroke; Leach, Bassom, Cowley; Jackman, steerer.

Oxford.—The Isis Boat Club.—Messrs. Williams, stroke; Venables, Hadlowe, Sherratt; Chamberlain, steerer.

A very excellent race took place, in which it was clear that the whole of the crews were first-rate, as amateurs. The Windsor and Eton, by dint of superior power, got the lead, and kept it, winning by half a length, or a trifle more, and the Isis was about the same distance in advance of the other boat. The grand race, the "Derby" of the day, was yet to come, and the sporting interest was very considerable

Just before five o'clock, preparations were made for this great event, the holders being as we have described, and the antagonist party, the winners of the race, amongst the challengers.



THE GRAND CHALLENGE CUP.

The grand Challenge Cup, value 200 guineas, open to any crew composed of members of any of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, or London, or schools of Eton or Westminster, or the officers of her Majesty's army or navy, or to any club established at least one year previous to the time of entering.

The crews were—

London.—The Cambridge Subscription-rooms Boat Club.—Messrs. Beresford, stroke; Selwyn, Jones, Ritchie, Lonsdale, Uppleby, Shadwell, Yolman; T. Egan, steerer.

Cambridge.—The University Boat Club.—Messrs. Ridley, stroke; Hon. G. Denman, Royds, Cobbold, Viols, Watson, Hon. L. Denman, Tower; J. Pollock, steerer.

Both crews bent forward on the signal being given, and started away together. The University boat appeared, after a few pulls to be leading, but it was but a trifling spirit at the moment of going off. The London Subscription-rooms Boat Club won by a third of a length only, amidst loud and deafening plaudits.

The Dreadnought rowed over the course for the Town Cup, which closed the sports of the day.

HER MAJESTY'S FIRST TRIP BY RAILWAY.

On Monday her Majesty the Queen, for the first time, returned from her sojourn at Windsor Castle, accompanied by her illustrious consort, Prince Albert, Count Mensdorf, &c., by way of the Great Western Railway. The intention of her Majesty to return to town by railroad was first intimated to the authorities at Paddington on Saturday afternoon, and in consequence preparations on an extensive scale were ordered to be made for the transit of the Royal pair from Slough to the Paddington terminus, which were carried into effect with the greatest secrecy. Immediately after the departure of the day mail-train from Paddington at a quarter past ten o'clock, the Royal train, consisting of the Phlegethon engine and tender, drawing the Royal Saloon in the centre of two Royal Saloon carriages, preceded by a second-class carriage, and followed by three carriage-trucks, started from the terminus at Paddington for Slough, which station they reached shortly before eleven o'clock. Previous to the departure from Paddington, the Royal Saloon, the fittings of which are upon a most elegant and magnificent scale, were tastefully improved by bouquets of rare flowers arranged within the carriage. At Slough the Royal party, on their arrival at the station a few minutes before twelve o'clock, in six carriages, were received by Mr. C. Russell, the chairman; Mr. F. P. Barlow, one of the directors; and Mr. C. Saunders, the secretary of the railway company; and conducted to the splendid apartments at the station designed for the reception of royalty. Her Majesty, however, during the delay necessarily occasioned by the placing the carriages of the attendants on the trucks, &c., proceeded to the line, and examined the Royal Saloon, inquiring very minutely into the whole of the arrangements, and precisely at twelve o'clock the train left Slough for Paddington, Mr. Gooch, the principal of the locomotive department, accompanied by Mr. Brunel, the engineer, driving the engine.

THE QUEEN'S FIRST TRIP BY RAILWAY.

At Paddington, by eleven o'clock, the centre of the wide space apportioned for the arrival of the incoming trains was parted off for the reception of the royal and illustrious visitors, and covered by a crimson carpet, which reached from one end of the platform to the other; the whole of the arrangements for the reception of the royal party being under the superintendence of Mr. Seymour Clark, the superintendent of the line, assisted by Superintendent Collard of the company's line. Captain Hay, the assistant-commissioner of metropolitan police, and Superintendent Lincoln, and a large party of the D division were also present. Before twelve o'clock large numbers of elegantly-dressed ladies, consisting of the families and friends of the directors and officers of the company, were ranged on each side of the part apportioned for the arrival of the royal train, and at five minutes before twelve o'clock her Majesty's carriage, drawn by four horses, arrived from the Royal Mews at Pimlico, and a few minutes afterwards a detachment of the 8th Royal Irish Hussars, under the command of Captain Sir G. Brown, arrived from the barracks at Kensington, for the purpose of acting as an escort to her Majesty, &c. Precisely at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock the royal special train entered the Paddington terminus, having performed the distance in twenty-five minutes, and on her Majesty alighting she was received with the most deafening demonstrations of loyalty and affection we have ever experienced. His Royal Highness Prince Albert alighted first. Her Majesty, on being handed out of the Royal Saloon, in a most condescending manner returned the gratulations of the assemblage present. The cheers were reechoed by the numerous persons who crowded the bridge over the terminus leading to Paddington-green, and lined the avenue towards the Junction-road, along which the royal cavalcade passed. Her Majesty, &c., reached Buckingham Palace shortly before one o'clock, around which a large assemblage of respectable persons was awaiting her arrival, by whom she was loudly greeted.

Death of Dr. Arnold, of Rugby.—We announce, with sincere regret, the death of the Rev. Thomas Arnold, D.D., headmaster of Rugby school, which took place at Rugby, on Sunday morning last, after a few hours' illness, of a disease of the heart. Dr. Arnold was well known as one of the most distinguished writers and profound classical scholars of the day. He had latterly devoted the whole of his time unoccupied by scholastic duties to his lectures on Modern History and to his History of Rome, and was contemplating a retirement, in the course of a few years, to his favourite residence at Fox-how, in Westmoreland. Dr. Arnold had, we believe, attained the age of fifty-two. He was born at Cowes, Isle of Wight, and was the son of the late William Arnold, Esq., collector of her Majesty's Customs of that port. He was educated at Winchester school, and from thence went to Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He was afterwards Fellow of Oriel. He married a daughter of the late Rev. John Penrose, and has left behind him a numerous family, to whom, and to his many sincere friends, his premature death will be felt as an irreparable loss. In politics Dr. Arnold was a Whig.

THE PRESENTATIONS TO HER MAJESTY.

THE QUEEN'S DRAWING ROOM.

Her Majesty's last Drawing Room for the season was held yesterday at St. James's Palace. Our engraving may furnish our fair readers with an idea—though, of course, only a faint one—of the immediate ceremonial of reception—but of all the details of this brilliant conclusion to a series of dazzling court assemblies, we refer to our column of Court and Fashionable News.

PASTIMES OF THE PEOPLE.

THE GREAT EIGHT-OARED CUTTER MATCH BETWEEN THE MEMBERS OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY CLUBS.

Saturday last was a grand day for the lovers of aquatic sports in the metropolis. From early dawn, Old Father Thames presented a most animated appearance, and the long-looked-for trial of skill between the rival universities created perhaps a higher degree of interest than any previous event of the kind. The present match was the sixth in which the two universities had met, and the fame of the sons of Isis had been somewhat tarnished by four successive defeats on the London river. The first match, rowed at Henley, in the year 1829, being the only one in which they had conquered their rivals of the Cam.

The odds have been throughout in favour of the Cantabs, 5 and 6 to 4 being freely offered during the last few weeks; and so well did they maintain their position in public favour, that several bets of 5 to 2 in large sums were paid in the course of the morning.

The brightness of the afternoon added much to the beauty of the scene, and both the Surrey and Middlesex shores were densely crowded with persons anxious to view the interesting struggle. The bridges also were thronged with spectators, and numerous elegant vehicles, ranged close to the footpath, contained parties of ladies and gentlemen displaying the light blue and purple favours of the rival schools of learning. The attendant cutters and "lesser fry" were unusually numerous, and the river altogether presented one of the most interesting sights that could possibly be imagined. The Admiralty shallop, with their watermen in scarlet liveries, and the cutters of the Leander and University Clubs, manned by their respective members, were in attendance, and added much to the gayness of the scene. The friends of both parties were in excellent spirits, and the Oxonians were freely backed at the odds quoted. The cutters were both new, having being built expressly for the purpose; the Cambridge boat by Messrs. Searle, and the Oxford by Mr. King, the boat-builder of that city. In shape they were, as nearly as possible, alike, measuring respectively 52 and 53 feet long, that of Oxford having that advantage.

The respective crews were as follows:

	Oxford.		Cambridge.
1.	Mr. M'Dougal, now	1.	Mr. Tower, bow
2.	" Menzies, sen	2.	Hon. Mr. L. Denman
3	" Breadon	3.	Mr. Watson
4	" Brewster	4.	" Penrose
5.	" Bouche	5.	" Cobbold
6.	" Cox	6.	" Royds.
7.	" Hughes	7.	Hon. Mr. G. Denman
8.	" Menzies, jun., stroke	8.	Mr. Ridley, stroke
	" Shadwell, coxswain		" Oldham, coxswain

W. Harrison, Esq., commodore of the Thames Yacht Club, kindly undertook the office of umpire, and accompanied the match in a beautiful cutter, manned by eight picked watermen.

Precisely at half-past three, both crews made their appearance afloat. The Cantabs excited universal admiration, and were looking in excellent condition; while an appearance of anxiety seemed to mark the whole of the Oxford crew, who, in other respects, looked well. The start was under the direction of Mr. Searle, jun., and the choice of place having been won by the Oxonians, both boats were speedily in trim, the Oxford on the Middlesex, and the Cambridge on the Surrey side. At a quarter to four o'clock the signal was given, and the rival crews went to work in dashing style. For some moments no advantage was perceptible on either side, but in passing Honey and Archer's premises the Cantabs had the lead, and continued to improve their position until they had cleared Lambeth Palace. In rounding the point off the Penitentiary this temporary advantage was lost, and the Oxonians, who laboured manfully, went through Vauxhall-bridge a good boat's length a-head of their opponents. At the Red House their relative positions were about the same, and the friends of the Cantabs were still sanguine that their position would be changed. The Oxonians improved their lead, and cleared Battersea bridge nearly five boats' lengths a-head of their rivals, amid the deafening shouts of the thousands who were assembled upon it. It was now evident, that unless the Cantabs made a grand effort, there could be no chance of regaining their lost ground. This feeling seemed, indeed, to animate the crew, and in passing Wandsworth-meadow they laid down to their work in such gallant style, that the distance between the boats was materially lessened. The Oxonians were not beaten, however, and cheered on by the thousands assembled on either side of the river, they kept the lead gallantly, and went through Putney-bridge nearly three boats' lengths a-head of their opponents.

Both crews were much distressed; but the Oxonians had the advantage, probably from the excitement of an unlooked for victory, as the odds had been laid so heavy against them.

The Oxford boat was preceded throughout by a cutter, manned by gentlemen connected with the University, and steered by Noulton; while the Cambridge had the assistance of a similar boat manned by several members of the University Club. Both crews, on disembarking, retired to Avis's, where a splendid dinner was served to upwards of 100 gentlemen, friends of the rival parties.

Many reasons are assigned to account for the defeat of the favourites. The prevailing, however, is, that they have suffered from over-training. The match was conducted with great fairness; and we did not hear of the slightest complaint being made by either party, if we except that of allowing the steamers to precede the wager boats, which several times produced an inconvenient swell. Both crews will meet again at the Henley Regatta on Tuesday and Wednesday next, to contend for the Challenge Cup, now held by the Cambridge. The cutters used on Saturday were forwarded to Henley in vans, by Messrs. Searle, on Sunday afternoon.

It is now nearly twelve years since the rival schools first contended for pre-eminence in aquatic science. During that period they have met only five times; but on one occasion, about seven years since, the students of St. John's College, Cambridge, met those of Queen's College, Oxford, in a cutter match at Henley, when the latter came off victorious.

Sunday, September 25. Bishop of Salisbury, at Salisbury.
Sunday, September 25. Bishop of Lincoln, at Lincoln.
Sunday, December 18. Bishop of Oxford, at Oxford.

GREAT AGRICULTURAL MEETING AT BRISTOL. Considerable bets have been made that the receipts on the Great Western Railway will exceed 20,000*l.* from the 12th to the 18th July next. Prince Albert and several foreign princes will be present

AN EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCE. We have learned that the silver plate which was recently stolen from the shop of Mr. M'Donald, jeweller, Tron ate, has been recovered in a very extraordinary manner. A few days ago a communication from England reached the city, stating that, by applying at the mail-coach office, the parties would find a box, addressed to "Mr. Anderson," containing the treasure taken from Mr. M'Donald's. The English mail was duly waited on as soon as it arrived, and on Tuesday it brought the box in earnest, which was opened in the presence of Captain Millar and Mr. Macdonald, and found to contain everything that had been missing, with the exception of a few old coins, and some articles of trifling value, which it would have been impossible to identify. The box had come, in the last instance, from Liverpool. It is difficult to account for this restoration, unless it may be that the possessors of it, who might or might not be the actual housebreakers and thieves), or their friends, were "in trouble," and the return of the property might be expected to settle the business. It would have been difficult to have disposed of it in an unmelted state, from the extensive publicity which was given to the theft over the kingdom, by means of the police. It is also pretty plain that the deed has not been done by any of the local Glasgow thieves. In the meantime, the two stranger Jews, named Isaac and Jacob Tobias, who were apprehended on the night of the housebreaking, are detained in custody. They have been twice examined, and were transferred on Thursday from the South to the North prison.—Glasgow Courier.

AN ANCIENT INN SIGN. An inn sign, 1800 years old, has just been discovered in Pompeii, in the Via Fortunæ. It is a painting in fresco, and represents Bacchus and Faunus pressing grapes brought to them by a young slave, while a boy is directing the flow of the juice into an amphora imbedded in the ground. It is distinguished by the superior correctness of its drawing, and beauty and freshness of colour. It is 2½ feet by 1½

The murderer, John Cumming, the seaman of the Hastings, who murdered the second class boy at Malta, and who was under sentence of death by a court-martial, has been brought to London, from her Majesty's brig Weazle, by a warrant from the Marshalsea.

FANCY NEEDLEWORK.—Cowper, the most captivating of poets, and who has dedicated the best efforts of his genius to our firesides, thus eulogises the little instrument from which arises so many of the grandest results of ornamental industry:

"For here the needle plies its busy task,
The pattern grows, the well-depicted flower,
Wrought patiently into the snowy lawn,
Unfolds its bosom; buds, and leaves, and sprigs,
And curling tendrils gracefully disposed,
Follow the nimble fingers of the fair;
A wreath that cannot fade."

Mr. Mitchell, of Red Lion-court, has just published an elegant little work on this interesting subject, from which we extract the following:—

"LACE. Decidedly the most captivating innovation upon the olden forms of needlework, is this simulated appearance of lacework. It is also capable of very great variety, and has considerable depth, boldness, and relief. I have no doubt that in this department the art has more to achieve than in any other.

"Lacework is, for the most part, copied from Berlin patterns, and is of recent vogue. Black Chantilly silk is the recognised materiel, used sometimes in cross-stitch pattern; the edge being finished with wool and in cross-stitch. If you wish it to look like pearl-border, take two threads direct beyond the pattern: it forms a pretty finish to sofa pillows, carriage-bags, &c &c."

A ball to celebrate the election of vestrymen for the parish of St. Pancras took place on Monday last, at the White Conduit House. The large room, which was most elegantly and tastefully decorated, was, soon after nine o'clock, filled with a most respectable company, amongst whom we noticed Sir B. Hall, Bart, M.P., and several of the most influential gentlemen of the parish. The band, under the able direction of Mr. F. Bradsell, executed the most popular quadrilles and waltzes, and dancing was kept up with great spirit till a late or rather early hour. The whole arrangements reflected great credit on Mr. C. Ripley, the honorary secretary, to whom the sole management was entrusted.

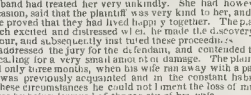
Mr. Hassard, of Dublin, lately presented a splendid table of his own manufacture to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, for the Prince of Wales, whereupon Mr. Anson, secretary to his Royal Highness, received instructions to present the ingenious (amateur) artist with a bank-note for £300. This princely donation, however, Mr. Hassard refused, saying that the gratification afforded him by the acceptance of his work was quite an ample reward. There is a mixture of romance and heroism in the man, whose father was an officer of the ill-fated 44th regiment, and served under Wolfe in America, Clinton and Abercrombie in Egypt, and Lord Wellesley in India.

BOX OF THE STAR. Private theatricals were among the amusements of the people of Montreal while Sir Charles Bagot was there. A performance took place at the Theatre Royal, with Mr. Charles Dickens as stage-manager, who, with his lady, sustained leading parts in the pieces selected. Soon after the doors were opened, says the Montreal Herald, the boxes and pit were filled with the beauty and fashion of the city, and the gay uniforms of the officers of the different regiments in the garrison, interspersed with the costly dresses and jewelled brows of the ladies fair, presented a beautiful scene. Among the audience were his Excellency Sir Charles Bagot and suite. The first play in the bill of fare was "A Roland for an Oliver." The part of Mr. Selborne by the Earl of Mulgrave; Alfred Highflyer by Mr. Charles Dickens. The Montreal Herald says the performers elicited thunders of applause and roars of laughter from all parts of the house. The laughable interlude of "Past Two o'Clock in the Morning" followed; Mr. Snobbington by Mr. Charles Dickens. This was the performance of the evening, and was most admirably acted. Mr. Dickens so disguised his person and voice, that some time had elapsed after the play began before he was recognised. The closing piece was the farce of "Is this a Post," in which Mrs. Dickens played the part of Sophy Walton.

FATAL EFFECTS OF A PRACTICAL JOKE.—A letter from Munich relates the following tragical result of a silly farce:—Three young Swiss, to amuse themselves with a fellow-countryman, named Kaeser, prevailed upon another person to pick a quarrel with and challenge him; a meeting consequently took place, and the affair went on with all the seriousness of a duel. The parties fired together, and the adversary of Kaeser fell as if he was dead. The sensibility of the young Swiss, who knew not that the pistols were charged with powder only, and that the fall was a mere feint, became so painfully excited that he immediately lost his reason. His comrades, probably alarmed at the dreadful consequence of their trick, deserted him, after putting him into a carriage and sending him to Roshac, where some of his family joined him and accompanied him to Seleure, at which town his father was to meet him. But a violent paroxysm came on, and the poor victim of the folly of others died an hour before his parent arrived.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE BRITISH QUEEN. By the British and North American royal mail steamer Acadia, Captain Ryrie, which arrived at Liverpool from Boston on Tuesday morning last, accounts were brought over respecting his Belgian Majesty's steam ship British Queen, which was nearly lost on her last voyage from Southampton to New York. This magnificent vessel, it will be recollected, left Southampton about the 5th ultimo, having on board upwards of fifty passengers, and a cargo of merchandize and specie to a large amount. She appears to have progressed favourably on her voyage until the seventh day, the 12th of May, when the ship encountered a heavy gale of wind from the N.N.W., when it became necessary to ease the steam to three-quarters of her speed. According to the log of the chief mate this happened late in the afternoon, in lat. 49 deg. 10 D. R., long. 18 deg. 15 D. R., and course S. 31. As the night came on the gale so increased that it was deemed prudent to alter her course, and bear down with the wind. In this condition she continued till the following day, when at about half-past twelve o'clock she shipped a tremendous sea, and so terrific was its force, that every timber apparently trembled again under its violence. The sea made a complete breach over her, carrying with it part of her bulwarks, fore-yard arm, part of one of the paddle-boxes, and several coal bunkers that were on deck. The commander, Captain ———, chief officer, and several of the crew, had a most narrow escape of being washed overboard. They were standing in the fore part of the vessel when the sea struck her, and were swept a considerable distance along the deck. The captain was thrown nearly into the engine-room, while the rest of the crew were dashed against the hatchways and other obstacles on the deck, and they one and all were more or less injured, one seaman in particular had his skull frightfully fractured. During the remainder of the day the vessel pitched heavily, owing to there being a dead weight of upwards of 300 tons of coals in the fore and aft holds, but the stowage could not be altered until the weather abated: as it was, a great quantity of water got down the engine-room. On the 14th, the following day, the gale ceased, and she was brought back into her proper course, in which she continued till the 21st, when it was again altered in consequence of the ice and icebergs, some of which were of immense height and thickness. Fortunately she got clear of them, and arrived at New York in safety, on the 25th day of her passage. The conduct of the commander and officers during the dangerous portion of the voyage is stated to have been most praiseworthy.

TWO SHIPS DESTROYED BY FIRE AT SEA. Accounts were received at Lloyd's, on Monday, from Penzance, respecting the burning and total loss of the brig Harmony, Captain Tesselin, belonging to Dunkirk, on the 30th of last month, on the coast of Portugal. The vessel was homeward bound, and had a valuable cargo of wine and brandy on board. From the report made by the master, Captain Tesselin, it appears that the fire commenced in the fore-part of the vessel, and from the fact of the ship having been struck by lightning on the previous day, there is every reason to suppose that was the cause. Upon the discovery having taken place, every soul on board exerted themselves to prevent its extending, but it was found impossible; for in a short time the flames reached the spirits in the hold, which compelled them to take to the boats immediately and quit the vessel. They had scarcely succeeded before the decks blew up, and she was instantaneously enveloped in flames. Within two hours after she sunk head foremost into deep water. Captain Tesselin and his crew were the following day picked up by the ship Urania, Captain Wheeghill, on her passage from Calcipali to St. Petersburgh, which arrived off Penzance, in Cornwall, on Friday last, where the unfortunate crew of the Harmony were safely landed. The vessel is reported to be insured to a large amount. On the same day (Monday), the following particulars respecting the loss of a large American ship by fire were received in the city from Havre:—The master of the packet Louis XIV., Captain Paul, which arrived at this port this morning (June 10), reports, that on the morning of the 30th of May, they passed in lat. 48 N., long. 18 47 W., the wreck of a large vessel (an American apparently), about 800 tons burden, having been destroyed by fire. The remains consisted of the keel, and about fourteen of her timbers. The fire appeared to have been recent.



LAW INTELLIGENCE

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—TUESDAY

[Before Mr. Justice Cresswell and a Common Jury.]

CASEY v. HEWLETT

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover compensation in damages from the defendant for criminal conversation with his wife

Mr. Serjeant Bompas and Mr. Watson conducted the plaintiff's case, Mr. Cockburn and Mr. A'Beckett appeared for the defendant

The plaintiff and defendant are hair-dressers, the former being a journeyman, and the latter keeping a shop in Burlington Arcade. The plaintiff first became acquainted with his wife in the course of business, she carrying on the business of a tambour-worker in hair, and being very much employed by the trade. She was possessed of considerable personal attractions and her business realized between £300 and £400 a year. The plaintiff, charmed by her attractions, was induced to offer her marriage, and on the 19th of August last year they were married. The defendant also employed Mrs Casey as a tambour-worker, and had considerable opportunities of seeing her. The happiness of domestic life was not destined long to flourish in the home of the plaintiff, for in the month of November, three months after the nuptial knot was tied, his wife took him one morning she was going to Kent to see her relations. The plaintiff believing her statement allowed her to go; but he was soon undeceived, and found that the object of her excursion was to meet the defendant, who joined her at Ramsgate. They stopped at the Castle Hotel for three days, passing as man and wife, and after words went to the Gun Hotel, at Dover. A friend of the plaintiff, to whom he had written, called upon her there, and saw her and the defendant. She represented him as a most particular friend, and said that any letters ought be sent addressed to him. On Mr. Kelly, the friend of the husband, sending her for her bad conduct, she replied that she was very much to be pitied, as her husband had treated her very unkindly. She had however, on a previous occasion, said that her husband was very kind to her, and indeed the evidence proved that they had lived happily together. The plaintiff was very much excited and distressed when he made the discovery of his wife's dishonour, and subsequently had to take these proceedings.

Mr Cockburn addressed the jury for the defendant, and contended that this was a case calling for a very small amount of damages. The plaintiff and his wife had only been married a quarter of a year when they went away with a party with whom she was previously acquainted and in the constant habit of seeing. Under these circumstances he could not lament the loss of such domestic happiness by being deprived of the society of his wife

Mr. Justice Cresswell having summed up, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff damages £150.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—TUESDAY

[Before Mr. Commissioner Holroyd.]

This day was fixed for taking an audit of the bankruptcy of Chambers and Chambers, late of Bond-street, bankers, against whom a flat was issued nearly eighteen years ago, and the case has been before the court in one shape or another nearly fifty times. Two of the creditors assignees, Mr. Drewe and Mr. Lee, were in attendance, with Mr. Hamilton, the solicitor to the flat, and they severally expressed their anxiety that the proceedings should be brought to a speedy close, and the dividend paid.

Mr. Hamilton stated, that the audit had been adjourned over from the last hearing in order to enable the creditors to attend and ascertain from them if they were satisfied with the accounts which none of the creditors being in attendance, nor the solicitor, he was bound to take it for granted that he and they were satisfied. Mr. Hamilton then proceeded to state that the bankruptcy of the house of the Messrs Chambers had been one of a most complicated nature, and for many years had been a source of trouble, but still there were some difficulties in making a further dividend. There was no other very serious difficulty in effecting sales of the different estates, with the exception of the Queen's Theatre, the sale of which was being negociated with Mr Waters, upon the subject, who, however, had lodged an appeal in the House of Lords, which would, of course, delay the issue. It would be recollected that the whole of the bankrupts debts were about £200,000, the assets realised were £170,000 and there was no new claim beyond £8000, as commuted to the bankrupts' brother

After some further observations Holroyd said he must be satisfactory to the creditors to find that they will be sure of receiving 15s. in the pound, and that they will probably obtain a dividend shortly after next term

After some further observations the meeting was adjourned

MESSRS WIGNEY'S BANKRUPTCY

BRIGHTON, Tuesday This morning, at eleven o'clock, the commissioners under this flat assembled at the Town Hall for the purpose of taking the last examination of the bankrupts. The rooms were very numerously attended by creditors

Mr. I. N. Wigney then underwent an examination, by which it appeared that the deficiencies created altogether by the bankrupt amounted to £49,357 17s. 3d. Had spent about £4000 for four contested elections The two first in 1835 and 1837, cost £2168 8s. 6d.; the last two cost £2816 The cost of contesting Lewes £1630 The principal deficiency at his brother's death was £34,586 8s. 7d. He regretted he had not struck a balance. With a deficiency of £34,000 he had carried on the business from November, 1836, to December, 1837. Carried on the bank entirely by the deposits. Debts had occurred in the bank since 1836 to the amount of £93,194 The rest of the £34,000 had been paid off by subsequent profits.

The court adjourned at half-past four o'clock till ten o'clock

BRIGHTON, Wednesday.—The examination of the bankrupt, Mr. I. N. Wigney, was resumed this morning at ten, and continued the greater part of the day The commissioners retired to deliberate on their decision, just as the last train was leaving Brighton

When the commissioners returned the bankrupts were declared to have passed their examination, the meeting having lasted upwards of eight hours

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.—WEDNESDAY

(The court sat at Nisi Prius, before Lord Abinger and a Middlesex Jury.)

RUTHVEN v. REID AND ANOTHER

The defendants in this case (Messrs Reid and Shaw) are the solicitors to the flat issued against Leaf and Yates, and the plaintiff is the well known Row street officer The action was brought to recover the sum of £28 5s. for labour and expenses incurred by the plaintiff, upon a journey to Paris in the month of December, 1840, in search of the bankrupt Leaf, who had absconded

Mr. Thesiger, with whom was Mr. Martin, appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr Erle and Mr. Rumfrey for the defendants

It appeared from the evidence that Roe, one of the officers at Guildhall, was applied to in December 1840 by the defendants to proceed to Paris after the bankrupt Leaf, and that one guinea a day and his expenses were offered him as remuneration Roe, in consequence of his other engagements, declined the offer, and recommended the plaintiff, who undertook the journey immediately, and proceeded to Paris The plaintiff was absent for thirty three days, a circumstance which was endeavoured to be accounted for by the severity of the weather, which rendered the roads in France impassable for several days, and for some time after made travelling unusually tedious. For the time he was absent the plaintiff demanded £26 for his expenses, independent of his travelling expenses and the charges incidental to his mission. The defendants paid the plaintiff £20 before the action was brought, and £20 5s. was paid into court subsequently, so that the only question in issue was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to £10 more than he had actually received

The defence set up was, that the plaintiff's charge was exorbitant, and that the sum he had received amply compensated him for the service he had performed. Several witnesses were called that it was possible to travel in France comfortably, paying all expenses, for about 20 francs, or 16s. a day.

Lord Abinger thought that if the jury believed that 16s. a day was sufficient for the plaintiff's expenses, including travelling, as he had charged additional for travelling expenses, those expenses ought not to be allowed. The question, however, was one on which the jury must form their own opinion.

After a short deliberation, the jury returned a verdict for the defendants

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The eighth session during the present mayoralty commenced on Monday morning before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen Kelly and Sir James Duke, the Sheriffs, Under Sheriffs, and the usual civic authorities.

The Recorder, in his charge to the grand jury, said the calendar before him comprised, he regretted to say, a list of nearly 300 prisoners, and amongst the crimes specified were charges of almost every description known to the law—crimes of murder, cutting and wounding, piracy, rape, forgery, burglary, and the chief of all crimes—that of high treason. The latter, happily, was not an offence of frequent occurrence, and would require from him a few observations with respect to the law, and to the particular offence which would be before them The charge, as far as he was able to collect from the depositions, would be founded on the ancient statute of the 25th Edward III., and also on a more recent statute of 36th George III., c. 7. The first statute first alluded to, it was der ired to be built to "if a man imagined or compassed the death of our Lord the King" that, he should also kill them, would equally apply to a Queen Regnant, as an addition to the construction which has been uniformly attached to a Sovereign, as laid down by Lords Coke and Hale, it had always been the custom to consider a Queen as coming within the meaning of the statute, and in the 1st year of the reign of Queen Mary a special act was passed giving her Majesty all the privileges conferred by the former acts of parliament; therefore, all difficulty with respect to that part of the case would be done away with. By a subsequent act of the 36th and 40th George III., it was enacted that when a direct attempt was made either upon the life of the Sovereign, or to do bodily injury, then the same course should be adopted, and the trial as if the party was charged with murder, or attempt to murder There did not appear to be the least pretence for presuming the discharge of the pistol to be the result of accident, as all the witnesses agreed in describing the pistol to have been de ib rately levelled. The witnesses, however, were not enabled to speak positively as to the precise direction in which the pistol was pointed, but a great deal would depend upon the situation in which the respective witnesses stood, and the opportunity they would have of witnessing the act They must take all those matters into their serious consideration, always bearing in mind, as he had before stated, that the intention of the party constituted the offence, and that the fact of the pistol not doing any mischief was circumstance with which he had nothing to do whatever. Again say I think it a case which you will feel justified in sending for further investigation, and with these observations I remit you to your room to proceed with your duties."

In the New Court, Robert Holloway, 16, and John Brown, 13, were convicted on clear evidence of stealing a quantity of beans, cards, cutlery, &c. the property of Mr. C. Russell, a cutler at Hampton-wick. The court sentenced them to six months' hard labour, with an order that Holloway be once wh pped in jail—Prisoner: I don't like to be whipped I was once whipped, and it did me no good, I'd rather be transported.—Mr. Comme sioner Bullock· Not this time —Holloway then stooped down, and took off his shoe, which he threw across the court with great force, and it struck a gentleman sitat next to Mr. Stocqueler, the clerk of arraigns, and just under Alderman Thompson, who ordered that the prisoner should be placed in solitude.

OLD COURT.—TUESDAY

The Recorder sat from nine until five, and disposed of a number of cases in relief of the gaol delivery, but none of them contained any feature of public interest. The proceedings in the New Court were equally uninteresting.

WEDNESDAY.

James Greenland, aged 25, wheelwright, was indicted for having committed a rape on the person of Jane Matilda Arnold

Mr. Clarkson conducted the case for the prosecution, and Mr. Phillips defended the prisoner.

It appeared from the evidence of the age of 13 years, that she was a sensible and intelligent girl, apparently much above her station in life, and was a nursery-maid in the service of Mr Ball, of Duke street, Grosvenor-square. The prisoner was a servant in the employ of Col Yorke of the Guards, who lodged in the house of Mr Ball. On the night of the 26th May last, as the prosecutrix was going to bed, the prisoner took hold of her and dragged her into his room, and then accomplished his purpose. As soon as she recovered the intent of the prisoner, she screamed loudly, but he seized her by the throat, and he did so tightly that she could not cry out, and could hardly breathe. She had never been into the bed room of the prisoner but once before this affair took place, and that was when another girl was making the bed.

Mr. Phillips addressed the jury for the prisoner, and concluded by calling the following witnesses: -

Jane Bright deposed that she was in the service of Mr. Ball About a fortnight before this occurrence she heard the prosecutrix, Jane Arnold, go into the bed-room of the prisoner at about 12 o'clock at night She mentioned the circumstance to the prosecutrix the next morning, but she did not say anything to her intimating that she had witnessed any thing improper

I had as many sovereigns as James has given me kisses." She further added, that she had been into his bed-room while he was dressing

Another servant, named Hannah Sturgeon, gave evidence to the same effect, which the prosecutrix, on being recalled, strenuously denied.

Colonel Phillip James Yorke deposed that the prisoner had been in his service about two years. He had previously been in his regiment, and had always conducted himself steadily and with propriety

The learned judge summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of Guilty

The learned judge then addressed the prisoner as follows — The crime of which you have been convicted has often been attended with great aggravation. You, an inmate of the house, bound to respect the modesty of every female in it, committed this violence upon a girl of tender years. I think the defence of to-day has aggravated the case. It is impossible to give credit to it A very short time ago this was a capital offence, and your life would have been forfeited. It is no longer a capital offence, but the enormity of the crime is such that the legislature has imposed a punishment next to that of death The sentence that I must necessarily pass upon you is, that you be transported for the term of your natural life.

Francis Beard, aged 26, a Post office letter-carrier, was indicted for having, while employed in that capacity, stolen a letter, containing a bill crown, the same being the property of Lord Lowther, the Postmaster-General

The case was one of the ordinary description, and the charge was early brought home to the prisoner

Baron Gurney having summed up, the jury returned a verdict of Guilty, but at the same time strongly recommending the prisoner to mercy, on account of his previous good character.

Baron Gurney said it was absolutely necessary that the immense amount of property passing through the Post-office should be protected; and therefore, upon a conviction for such an offence, the court had no alternative but to pass a severe sentence, in order to be remembered that a disposition to rob those not to commit the like act. The prisoner was then ordered to be transported for life

Robert Peck, aged 25, was indicted for the manslaughter of Mr. Carroll, a police constable

Mr Bodkin and Mr. Chambers conducted the prosecution, and Mr Phillips appeared for the prisoner.

The circumstances of this case have already been fully given upon the trial of a man named Smedley, who was also indicted for being accessory to the death of the deceased It will be remembered that a disturbance took place in Bethnal-green, and that the deceased, in the execution of his duty as a police-constable, endeavoured to put an end to it, and took Smedley, who was the principal party causing the affray, into custody. The mob attempted to rescue the prisoner, and made use of the most violent language towards the police, and the prisoner and Smedley were proved to have both kicked and struck the deceased, who received such severe injury as to occasion his death a few days afterwards

The jury found the prisoner guilty of an aggravated assault, and Mr Baron Gurney ordered him to be imprisoned in a gaol to hard labour for two years

THE CHARGE OF HIGH TREASON —Just before Mr. Baron Gurney left the bench, the Grand Jury came into court with a number of bills, and among them a true bill against John Francis for high treason

POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE.—TUESDAY —The Lord Mayor having received several well-executed communications from gentlemen, complaining that numbers of men were in the habit of bathing in the Thames, in a certain place in the city, exposing themselves to public observation, and that no sort of decency was observed by the bathers when steamers crowded with persons of both sexes passed along, sent for the water-bailiff in order to issue directions that orders for the prevention should be brought in custody to the Mansion-house to be dealt with severely.—The water-bailiff said that in the course of every warm summer complaints were made of the conduct of bathers but he had not heard of or seen any such scandalous exhibitions as had been described

MARLBOROUGH-STREET. On Monday Mr. F Pridham appeared before Mr. Mahby to answer the charge of having committed a very violent assault on Lieutenant-Colonel Baron Osten, under the following peculiar circumstances —The case excited so much interest that the court was crowded, and amongst those who were present we noticed Lord Wriothesley Mapo, General Brotherton, the Hon. R. Rawley, Sir F Gerard, Sir F. Goodricke, Sir V. Cotton, the Hon. Mr Cavendish, Mr Angerstein, Le Hon. J. Lowther, M P., Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Polhill, Mr. Hood, Mr. Grey, &c.—Baron Osten, a gentleman far advanced in years, appeared with his head bound up, and was attended by Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Hobler as his professional advisers.—Mr Clarkson having sworn the interpreter, and the usual formalities having been gone through, he said I am Colonel in the Hanoverian Hussars, and have been 26 years in the English army. I live at No. 13, Dover-street On the 1st of June last I was engaged in my room writing, between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, when I received a visit from the prisoner's only servant first came up, and said a gentleman wanted to see me. As soon as the door was opened the defendant entered, with a sabre, which, in its sheath, was about 4 feet long. The defendant came into the room in a swaggering manner, stamping on the floor violently. This conversation then took place, as near as I can recollect —"Baron Osten?" "Yes, my name is Sir, that is my name. Pray, Sir, what is your name, and your business?" instead of making me a direct answer, the prisoner said, "Do you recollect Dr. Pridham?" I said, "Yes, unfortunately I do, but you are not Dr Pridham." Mr Clarkson: Look round the court, Baron Osten, and see if Dr Pridham is present, if so, give him into custody directly. Baron Osten: I see not Dr Pridham here—Examination resumed —The prisoner answered "No, I am his friend, here is my card, at the same time throwing a card on the table, and stamping with his stick. I come to ask you, in my friend Pridham's name, whether you ever traduced his character, or said anything of that sort, at Pratt's Billiard Club, or anywhere else, or whether you said he had been a marker at a billiard-table?" I answered, "I do not actually recollect saying Dr. Pridham was a marker, but I had been told he was a billiard-marker, that reports to that effect existed, and that I had every reason to believe they were true." I added, "I am not in the habit of going to other people's houses naming, at the same time, a gentleman who had mentioned circumstances of a similar nature. He then asked me, "Whom have you named these reports to?" I answered, "That is immaterial to you. I can have no further communication with you, I beg you will leave my room immediately;" at the same time I rang the bell, and as soon as my servant entered, I told him to be in attendance at the door. The servant had hardly quitted the room and closed the door, before the prisoner addressed me again, and asked me, "Had you not a conviction, that these reports were false when you paid the money for the bill?" I answered, "I do not actually recollect saying Dr. Pridham was a marker, but I had been told he was a billiard-marker, that reports to that effect existed, and that I had every reason to believe they were true." I added, "I am not in the habit of going to other people's houses naming, at the same time, a gentleman who has

THE FASHIONS.

Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, Paris, June.

Dear Mr. Editor,—I take the earliest opportunity of mentioning that our élégantes are seen at the promenade, in a very pretty walking dress, "a redingote en Pekin rayé," with small bouquet glace blanc, the corsage and sleeves buolonnés, divided by passementeries, and a trimming in similar style of quadruple rows in front, descending from the corsage, en tablier. The cannail associates very well with this costume, particularly that made in silk glacée a deux nuances, with a worked laced edging; the gorge de pigeon garnished with ruches decoupées, cut out of the same material, is a lovely addition to the summer toilette; it is, however, sometimes exchanged for the embroidered muslin scarf.

The mouchoirs Nankin have become great favourites for the toilette (en négligée) for the carriage or for riding; they are very much adopted, their lightness renders them so exceedingly convenient. Adieu, Monsieur, au revoir, JULIE.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No I.

Mr. MUNTZ, M.P.

If fortune has blessed the reader with a seat in the Legislature, or cursed him with a Chancery suit, or visited him with a pressing invitation to meet certain of her Majesty's Judges at Westminster, or cast his lot as a reporter, a lawyer's clerk, or a cabman, or any other learned profession that necessitates his attendance in the venerable locality dedicated to law making and law expounding, it is "lots to blanks" but he has seen the subject of the present sketch—Mr. Muntz—the hairy and independent member for Birmingham. As our legislators do not carry their M.P. embroidered on their collars, after the fashion of the A division, many may have encountered a tall figure striding down Parliament-street, between four and five, with a stick in his dexter hand much more deserving to be called a

"Giant pine,
Prop of my godlike steps,"

than the lanky gooseberry bush pulled up by the roots with which Henry Phillips did the classically ridiculous as Polypheinus in Acis and Galatea: they may, we repeat, have encountered such an apparition, and not been aware that they had met and stared at rather an enlarged unit of the collective wisdom of the nation. Perhaps our sketch may apprise them, for the first time, of the fact, if they can recognise the honourable and hirsute member uncovered, in the act of presenting a petition. Mr. Muntz is one of those physically remarkable figures that arrest the eye of the stranger, as it wanders over the common-place forms that occupy the benches of the House, wondering, in his first simplicity, that legislators should, after all, be so much like ordinary men. He is a salient point, a break in the uniformity of smooth chins and every-day broadcloth; and once seen he is not easily forgotten. The reader will have inferred that Mr. Muntz is in person tall and muscular, and beyond this we cannot assist him, for, with the exception of his eyes and nose, his countenance is completely shrouded with that covering of hair which has given him a sort of notoriety. His features may be good or bad, but their beauty and defects are concealed. His style of dress is also peculiar, and his lower habiliments are as loose as his beard and whiskers are ample. He indulges in a vast superfluity of both extremities. The lip and chin could hardly be more plentifully clothed, but a single breadth of stuff would make his trousers perfectly oriental. Another peculiarity is less common and more valuable than any eccentricity of person and dress—that is his magnificent voice, which is clear, deep, and powerful; there is no difficulty in hearing him; he is almost the only member who can, without apparent effort, make himself perfectly audible through the impatience or reluctance of the house. This quality is by no means common, and many speakers do not even make an effort to be heard beyond their right and left hand neighbours. Half the speeches during the discussion of the Tariff have literally and truly been "perfectly inaudible in the gallery." The voice of Mr. Muntz would have made the fortune of an actor.

In politics the hon. gent. must be considered an extreme radical; but we believe he is perfectly honest and sincere in his opinions. His first appearance in public life was during the sway of the Birmingham Political Union; but it was not till the retirement of Mr. Attwood from Parliament that he obtained a seat in the Legislature; he has not, we believe, sat more than two parliaments. He is connected with the manufactures of the country, and may be considered a tolerable authority on questions connected with them; for this reason, his assenting to the policy of Sir R. Peel, with regard to the imposition of the property-tax, was not unimportant, though in giving it he anticipated a difference of opinion with many of his constituents on the subject. He is proprietor of some rather extensive rolling-mills in the large town he represents, and his son, we understand, has filled the office of Mayor for the same place.

Mr. Muntz does not speak often in the House, and when he does his style is rather the conversational than the oratorical. On the whole, we do not know that Birmingham could send up a better member of those opinions; certainly it could not furnish a more remarkable man.

THE BELLES LETTRES.

The evil days of tariff and income-tax discussion have exerted an evil influence over the department of the Belles Lettres, and just as we had some hopes of seeing these brought to a close, the whole world has been frightened from its propriety by the proclamation condemning it to all manner of uncertainty about its sovereigns, and which though dealing with our gold, has by no means produced the confidence and repose of the golden age. All this has pressed heavily on literature; men's minds are untuned to poetry, and not very well disposed towards prose, except in the shape of parliamentary debates, which, we suppose, do find readers somewhere, for they are regularly printed. The weather, too, is unpropitious; the very idea of an epic in twelve books, or a bulky octavo, induces incipient perspiration. We have reason to congratulate ourselves, therefore, at the little that presents itself to the glance we have cast over the literary world for the past week, for criticism with the thermometer at eighty-five is severe work, and not likely to be approached with that spirit of goodnature which we hope, with due regard to justice, always to maintain.

The presses of Colburn and Bentley (now divided) continue to send forth an occasional novel, and Bulwer, in "Lver, ot the ill omened Marriage," has again ventured into verse. We may probably turn to this collection of poems again, for they are not to be passed over with a mere cursory remark; but has he not thrown his best poetry into his prose? The "Romantic Biography of the Age of Elizabeth, by the Benedictine Order of Glendalough," edited by Dr. W. C. Taylor, and published by Bentley, may mislead many by the gravity of its title, reference to prefaces not being a universal practice. The "Benedictine order of Glendalough" is an order not to be found in the Catholic church; it is ex generis and akin to those "Monks of the Screw" who flourished and drank in the days of Curran and Grattan. Our modern monks are a society of collegians from Dublin, who, in an excursion through the county of Wicklow, determine to draw on the College library, and give the world a taste of the quality of that historical lore that had so much delighted them in its calm retreats. The present brace of volumes are the result. The reader will find much curious matter connected with the most interesting periods of history among their contents; Francis I., Queen Elizabeth, Mary Queen of Scots, the Cardinal de Lorraine, Dr. Dee and other eminent or notorious characters appear in the pages of the authors. Beyond this we cannot go in our analysis.

Thomas Hood has published a letter on the Copyright question in the last number of the Athenæum, in which he treats the subject more suo. The letter is long; but here is an extract:—

"Apropos of cheapness, it seems never to have occurred to the sticklers for it, that an article may become unreasonably reasonable—that the consumer may be benefited overmuch. For example, there have been certain staring shop announcements to be seen about London, in which the low price of the commodities was vouched for by the ruin of the manufacturer—broad proclamations that the 'Great Bargains in Cotton' had shut up the mills, and that the 'Wonderfully Reduced Silks' had exhausted not only the bowels of the worm but those of the weaver. But is such a consummation a favourable one, and ought it to be wished, whatever the fabric? Is it really desirable to see our authors publicly advertised as 'Unprecedented Sacrifices?' Or would anybody, except Mr. Wakley, or some useless Utilitarian, be actually gratified by reading such a placard as the following

"UNEXAMPLED DISTRESS IN GRUB STREET!
"GREAT REDUCTION IN LITERATURE!
"PROSE UNDER PRIME COST!! POETRY FOR NOTHING!!!

"It is certain, nevertheless, that new works, and especially periodical ones, have been projected and started, during the Rage for Cheap Literature, at rates so ruinously low that they might afford brown bread and single Gloster to the publishers or to the writers, but certainly not for both. Then, a few months since, I was applied to, myself, to contribute to a new journal, not exactly gratuitously, but at a very small advance upon nothing—and avowedly because the work had been planned according to that estimate. However, I accepted the terms conditionally; that is to say, provided the principle could be properly carried out. Accordingly, I wrote to my butcher, baker, and other tradesmen, informing them that it was necessary, for the sake of cheap literature and the interest of the reading public, that they should furnish me with their several commodities at a very trifling per centage above cost price. It will be sufficient to quote the answer of the butcher:—

"'Sir,—Respectin your note. Cheap literater he blowed. Butchers must live as well as other pepel and if so be you or the readin publics wants to have meat at prime cost, you must buy your own beasteses, and kill yourselves, &c., JOHN STOKES.'

"And, truly, why not cheap anything, or everything, as well as cheap literature? Cheap beef, cheap beer, cheap butter, and cheap bread. As to books, the probability is, that distant re-issues would be at reduced rates; but even supposing them to remain at their original prices, why should Mr. Thomson of 1843 have his 'Waverley' any cheaper than Mr. Thomson of 1814?"

We have much satisfaction in also quoting the following remarks from our contemporary the Athenæum, and we give full accordance to the spirit in which they are penned

"In addition to the knighthood bestowed upon Mr. Bishop, and announced by us last week, her Majesty has been graciously pleased to bestow a like honour on Mr. George Hayter, Mr. C. Ross, and Mr. William Allan. It is in no narrow or envious spirit that we must pointedly remark, that while three painters and one musician have been thought worthy of such distinction, Literature and Science are passed over, as though they had neither mark nor value in this country. In short, titles seem to have been bestowed on the principle of Sir Robert Peel's invitations to that memorable party, at which his Majesty the King of Prussia was desirous to meet "our most distinguished men, in the several departments of art and science" (see ante p. 132, and our authors, and philosophers, and scholars must continue to find abroad that recognition which is so strangely denied them at home. That they do find this, is evidenced by the late proceedings of the King of Prussia, with reference to the new order of merit he has recently instituted, and of which Baron von Humboldt is appointed chancellor. Here painting is recognised, Professor Cornelius, the distinguished artist in Fresco, being nominated vice-chancellor—and music not forgotten, since M. Lantz and Dr. Mendelsohn-Bartholdy have been enrolled among the chevaliers—but English literature and science are also thought worthy of distinction; Sir John Herschel, Mr. Moore, and Professor Faraday, having likewise between placed on the Prussian roll of honour. It is vexatious that to prove justice even-handed, we should have to look beyond the barriers of our own island. While on the subject of 'stars, ribbons, medals,' and such gear, we may record, that the King of the Netherlands has recently presented M. Eugène Sue, the well known French novelist, with a medal of his newly-founded Order of the Lion; and that according to the Diario di Roma, his Holiness the Pope has bused himself in the restoration of the Order of Constantine, founded by Pope Sylvester, "as a reward for merit in the sciences and literature.' M. Raoul Rochette, Secretary of the Paris Académie des Inscriptions, is one of the new knights."

COMIC NURSERY TALES.—BLUE BEARD. By F. W. N. BAYLEY, Esq. (Author of the "New Tale of a Tub.") With Illustrations numerous and humorous. London: Orr and Co.

The first glance at this elegant little book almost inclined us to take up the cudgels with Mr. Bayley, for ruthlessly destroying, as we imagined, one of the most pleasurable associations of our childhood, by his sly, philosophical, and inimitable burlesque of BLUE BEARD; the best remembered, perhaps, of our nursery tales. We feared the intense interest with which in our pinafore days we remember to have mused upon the mysterious chamber and the still more mysteriously stained key, was lost to us for ever. Our disappointment was, therefore, the more agreeable to find that our old friend was only presented to us in a new guise—that the whole version of the story was adhered to, only that it was thrown into rollicking, burlesque rhymery, such as Ingoldsby and others run riot in over olden legends and more modern plays. The "dear familiar tale" is, in fact, told pleasantly enough—but our chief praise is for the illustrations, and these are of their kind unmitable. It is admitted of Blue Beard that he

Was not an especially handsome man:
He didn't beat young Adonis hollow,
Nobody ever called him Apollo,
And people would hiss us
If we said Narcissus
Was formed of the pattern he did follow!

No such thing: it would never do—
He wasn't a beautiful boy to view.
And as great historians ought to be true,
We tell our youth,
In the spirit of truth,
That this gentleman's beard was terribly blue!
Blue was his beard, and blue was his name,
For his father and mother,
For want of another,
Had christened him BLUE BEARD for "that same."

His beard, we said, was thoroughly blue,
And nothing that woman or man could do—
Shave without, or invention within,
Could change the colour of Blue Beard's chin!
Rowland's Macassar, or Fox's dye,
Each it was vain for him to try;
Meche's razors, or Warren's jet,
Another colour he could not get!
He lathered it once, with intense delight,
Hoping that soaping would make it white;
And then again he lathered it back,
Hoping that soaping would make it black;
Then he shaved it again and again,
But it wouldn't do, the thing was plain,
Uncommonly plain, that it wouldn't do,
For the beard continued undoubtedly blue!

Want of space prevents our extracting "the Courtship, Speed, and Wedding." We must even pass the honey-moon, and not pause to peep into the fatal closet with Mrs. Bluebeard, but let our author depict her husband's rage when he found, on inquiring for his keys, that his spouse had failed to obey his parting injunction.

"Odd's bodkins!" cried he—he was fond of them both—
That is bodkins and odds—
And he'd put them together to make up an oath—
That might rise to the gods
On the wings of the storm, in most blood-thirsty fashion,
Whenever he felt in a thundering passion,
"Odd's bodkins!" with voice of a Stentor, roared he,
"Explain, ma'am, to me,
What the reason I see
A red stain of blood on that bright little key!"
Lady Blue Beard fell on her knees that so shook,
And she turned on her fierce lord the tenderest look,
And she said, what she said need not exactly the truth,
But still in the innocent manner of youth,
"As you ask me to say
Oh, don't scowl, my lord, pray,
In that terrible way!
How the blood met the key or the key met the blood—
I suppose one or the other will be just as good
All I know is—.....I fear
You mean something bad by that terrible leer—
But do now—do—don't,
There, I know now you won't!—

All I know is—that yes, that as true as I'm here,
With my heart like to freeze,
As I shake on my knees,
That—I haven't—no—haven't the slightest idea!"

One more extract to explain the sisterly devotion of sweet "sister Anne," and we must close this little book, which we cordially recommend to all our readers who love the vis comica.

"Sister Anne! sister Anne!
That horrible man
Is about to cut me off in my prime,
And when I civilly ask him what time
He thought I might live,
Ten minutes was all that the monster would give.

"So while I'm devoting my soul to prayer,
It's lucky, my darling, that you're up there.
Oh, lie down, love, on the castle top,
Your sharpest eye to the telescope pop,
Keep the telescope close to the nail,
Balance it, love, on the 'sliding scale;'
And, sister Anne,
If you should twig a man,
Do bring him as near as the telescope can!
And see if my brothers are coming this way.
For I expected them both to-day;
And I should be
In the greatest glee
If they killed my husband before he killed me"

Sister Anne saw at once time was not be lost,
So on to the castle her body she tossed;
On to the battlement nearest the sky,
And she clapped the telescope close to her eye,
And she kept looking out, while her sister down stairs,
Was momently interrupting her prayers,
By sending a question, of desperate prying,
Up to the place where Miss Annie was lying,— Lying, and looking with all her might,
First straight forward, then left, then right,
All from the top of the Baron's abode,
As far as the telescope reached down the road.

"Sister Anne, Sister Anne, pray what do you see?"
"See? not the ghost of a soul!" said she.
"Sister Anne, on what does your eye now fall?"
"Alas! dear sister, on nothing at all!
Nothing at all the landscape strows
But the sun that shines and the grass that grows;
And it's very provoking that no one old pass
Just now between the sun and the grass."
"Sister Anne, is nobody coming, my dear?"
"You've exactly guessed it—there's nobody here!"

It would be an injustice to the skill of Messrs. Vizetelly, brothers, did we fail to notice the elegance and taste with which this little volume is got up. In such matters they stand unrivalled.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The presence of Mendelsohn at the Philharmonic Society has been the musical event of the week. Every arrival of this distinguished composer on our English shores is welcomed with a warmth of homage and enthusiasm commensurate with the greatness of his genius and honourable to the enlightenment of the land. Mendelsohn is one of the first men of his age. His style of composition may be said to combine all the strength and fervour of the wilder German school, with the smoothness and polished harmony of works wherein inspiration and high wrought description have yielded to softer imagery and classic beauty of design. In all his writings the spirit of poetry is visible, and has a pervading presence in every composition that has swelled the measure of his fame. Himself a fervid admirer of Beethoven, he often grasps the wondrous glories of the style in which that great magician wrote, with something of a sympathizing power, and with an imaginative grandeur alike impressive and sublime. Anon, in gentler melodies he has spotted all the graces of his muse; or, turning from the flowers of musical literature, to tread again upon higher paths and with more ambitious purpose, he has filled his mind with the majesty of sacred harmony, and worked out the stately solemnities of religious adoration, and with all the eloquence that genius can give to song. It is then no marvel that he should be regarded every where with an enthusiasm, which grows none the colder because it is generally coupled with esteem. The latter tribute is chiefly paid to his personal conduct and demeanour.

PORTRAIT OF MENDELSOHN.

Mendelsohn is a man of remarkable modesty and extreme gentleness of manner. Mild, quiet, and affable, he is said when apart from the absorbing influences of the poet's calling—for he who writes the poetry of music is a poet sure—to rejoice in the domestic affections, and, happy in the home circle with his wife and children, to be as proud of their presence as of the loudest applause of the world. His personal appearance would go far to indicate such a frame of mind. He is cheerful, placid, and of undisturbed aspect, with a certain tone of thoughtfulness over his countenance, which bespeaks the activity and exercise of the faculties within. It is a beautiful sight to see him conduct a full orchestra. We shall never forget the impression he produced at the great Birmingham festival, on the occasion of the production of his famous Hymn of Praise. The magnificent band followed him as if under a spell, which his genius alone kept unbroken. With every action of his wand the sounds and harmonies seemed marshalled in a grand and solemn order, which no intrusion could disturb. The eyes of the musicians were all, as it were, focussed within his own, he communicated with them as if by electricity made them sympathize with the spirit, catch the impulses, and partake of the emotions of all that was to be interpreted before the thronging multitude, who were listening with blended awe, excitement, and admiration, to every feeling symbolized, and every thrill invoked.

It was immediately after this great occasion that Mendelsohn returned to the Continent, but the sensation that had been created at Birmingham did not die, and the moment it became known that he had again paid England a visit, and was to conduct one of his own compositions, a new one too, at the Philharmonic Society, all London was on the qui vive to obtain an opportunity of hearing and seeing one who had so greatly signalized himself in every department of his art.

The consequence was that the audience of Monday evening comprised almost every person at all distinguished in the musical world, either as an artist or an amateur. The expectations from a new work by so illustrious a master were fully realized; the symphony was listened to with delight, applauded with enthusiasm, and pronounced (we believe, without a dissentient voice), a composition of transcendant power and exquisite beauty. It appeared to us to possess all the characteristics of Mendelsohn's genius; a grand simplicity of form, great clearness of design, an unceasing flow of charming and expressive melody, and the most rich and beautiful orchestral effects. To analyse a work of such magnitude would demand repeated hearing, but a composition of such vast proportions and varied details can at first leave only a general impression, however delightful, on the memory. A bold and martial air pervades the music; it is full of fire and animation, but never gay; while it breathes many wild and melancholy strains, and there is a sad solemnity in the close which seems to tell the termination of a tragic history. One movement is strongly and decidedly redolent of the Scottish Highlands. We hear the clang of the pibroch, mingled, as it were, with the tread of many feet and the eager cries of a host marching to battle; and the final movement produces a similar impression, though its warlike notes are blended with the wailing sounds of grief and mourning. The former of these movements produced an extraordinary sensation, and was so long and loudly applauded, that Mendelsohn, modest and unpretending as he is, could not misunderstand the unanimous call for its repetition. On the whole, this symphony is probably the most charming orchestral production that has appeared since the symphonies of Beethoven.

The concert was admired in every respect. Every article of the programme was excellent, and every piece, vocal and instrumental, was excellently performed. The other symphony was Haydn's—the eleventh of Salomon's set; and the overtures were Beethoven's Coriolan and Weber's Ruler of the Spirits. Thalberg played twice, with his usual unrivalled degree of power and brilliancy.

The pianoforte fantasias of this distinguished master were most warmly applauded. That on themes from "Il Don Giovanni" was exquisite, the pianist keeping up throughout his wonderful "running accompaniments," and occasionally executing such tours de force as almost electrified his auditors. Part of his fantasia from "La Sonnambula" was encored, with but few dissentient voices, although the solitary sibillation that was kept up for some seconds afterwards, seemed likely, at first, to create a greater "sensation" than might have been expected from so contemptible a demonstration.

The vocalists present exerted themselves with great success, but the instrumental performances naturally constituted by far the greatest attraction. Miss Birch was not, we thought, in very good voice, but she got through the scena from Spbor's "Azor and Zemira" very creditably. It is a pity, however, that she does not sing with a little more spirit and energy. Messrs. Phillips and Mario came in, together with the lady, for a fair share of applause.

Weber's fine overture to the "Ruler of the Spirits" concluded the concert, which, we think, may very safely be designated as the best of the season. The rooms were fully attended, and every piece was thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

RUBINI.

Rubini, in spite of all reports of his intention to absent himself, is once more amongst us, and has been crowned with a "triple popularity" for his acceptance of an engagement in England after he had refused all the other musical capitals in the world. His reception at Her Majesty's Theatre on Tuesday night was enthusiastic in the extreme. Every part of the theatre was crowded to excess, and the boxes presented one of the most brilliant assemblages of rank and fashion that has ever been seen within its walls. Her Majesty was present, and half the rank and fashion of the metropolis besides. A laughable contretemps preceded the éclat of the great singer's appearance.

When the villagers in "La Sonnambula" first stood aside and gazed at the wing it was thought for a moment that Rubini was entering, and Galli, who played the notary, and who was the real party that appeared, was received with a thunder of applause, which was rather cruelly changed into a shout of laughter, as soon as the mistake was discovered. But Rubini entered soon after in all the glories of an opera villager, and was received with an enthusiasm which even he, knowing how high he stands in the favour of the public, could scarcely have anticipated. Bouquets were at once in requisition, flying from every direction to the feet of the primo tenore, who picked them up and bowed, and bowed and picked them up, while Persiani, who was Amina, assisted him in collecting his glories, and forced into his hand an immense bunch of flowers. His value was more obvious than ever on this occasion. It was at once felt by the audience that there was something better than they had been accustomed to hear during the previous part of the season—something which they had long been accustomed to during seasons gone by. At once, without an effort, his voice filled the house, and that artistical management of it, those brilliant embellishments, told with renewed effect, and at the end of almost every air acclamations were repeated, and bouquets were in fresh requisition. At the end of the first act he and Persiani were rapturously called to appear before the curtain, and at the end of the opera the compliment was repeated, while his air in the second act, "Pasci il guardo" was unanimously encored.

We may possibly, before Rubini makes his final farewell to the public, present our readers with his portrait, and a memoir of his professional career. Now, however, we are content to copy one of those admirable caricature busts by Dantan, in which the strongest likeness is preserved with the extravagance; and which, if it be everywhere laughed at by our friends in their good humour, will be only so on account of the ludicrous truth and spirit of the burlesque resemblance of "The first tenor of his age."

THE PRIMO TENORE OF HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

MADEMOISELLE RACHEL.

In presenting to our readers a portrait of Rachel, we would fain refer to the parts she has promised to sustain during her short sojourn among us. The character of Ariane (or, as we would call it, Ariadne), in which this great tragedian is to appear to-night (Friday), is in the tragedy by Thomas Corneille, a poet, who, though far below the level of the great Pierre Corneille, has always held a high place in French literature. The play, after an interval of many years, has been lately revived, for the sake of Mdlle. Rachel's personation of the heroine, a part eminently fitted for the display of her peculiar powers. She appeared in it for the first time at the Théâtre Français only a few weeks ago, and her performance made an immense impression on the public. We observed at the time that the principal Parisian journals—the Courrier Français, the National, the Constitutionnel, the Quotidienne, and others spoke of it in terms of the highest eulogy; and the Journal des Débats, which has all along exhibited the very reverse of partiality towards Mademoiselle Rachel, admitting in its elaborate critique her great talent and success in the character. This journal says, that if Mademoiselle Rachel had been sustained by the poet, Ariane would have been her best part after that of Hermione. It is true, that the younger Corneille is not so great a poet as Racine, nor is Ariane so fine a tragedy as Andromaque; but the piece has much dramatic merit, and the character of the heroine is full of that intense and overwhelming passion, in the expression of which Rachel so infinitely transcends every other living actress, either on her own stage or on ours. We are induced to make these remarks by the circumstance, that, her engagement being limited to six nights, it is understood she will not repeat any of her parts; and we wish to make our theatrical readers aware, before its performance, that Ariane is one of the most remarkable and striking of her characters.

MADEMOISELLE RACHEL.

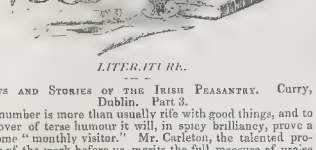
THE DRAMA.

HAYMARKET—IRISH ACTORS.

Strange as it may appear, there is no species of representation which affords so much delight or occasions so much side-splitting risibility to John Bull as the personification of the merry, rollicking, uproarious, blundering, and ingenious denizens of the "sister isle." Whatever faults of character may be ascribed to them by our more phlegmatic fellow countrymen—and whatever prejudices may be entertained (as is by some asserted) against them amongst us—certain it is that on the stage their faults and our prejudices are no longer apparent, and the Irishman there developed "all in his glory," on the full tide of his frolic, and his impudence overwhelms our antipathies, and bears with him no inconsiderable portion of our regard. What a bold roystering incarnation does he present of infinitely various attributes—of simplicity leavened with shrewdness of guile—nearly almost the offspring of asininity, so ill sustained, so deficient in Machiavelism of virtues, half savage, perhaps some of them, but too deeply ingrained in humanity to be despised or repudiated by civilization—of gravity more frequently superinduced by the perils or the sorrows of others than his own, and of gaiety ever springing and irrepressible, that, like the warriors who hurl back on their foes the missiles which were flung to destroy them, makes the very calamities which Fortune showers on him the means of self-sustainment against her attacks, and of mockery of her power. "A brave man struggling against the storms of fate" is no doubt a very interesting as well as a noble object of contemplation; but a merry one under similar difficulties is (as the patronage afforded to all representatives of the Irish character attests) an object, if not equally interesting, infinitely more amusing and attractive. The strong heart, like the strong man, may be broken or ground by the iron pressure of external circumstances; but though many shudder at, few love to witness its fate; while crowds will follow the track of the merry juggler who comes out of all perils unscathed; in whose favour Nature's laws seem suspended, and with respect to whom it is seen that what is death to others is mirth to him. There are feelings too of a much deeper character, and fountains of much purer sympathy, mingling in the inducement which leads crowds to witness the theatrical representations to which we refer. However, we had taken up our pen to it to advert to a circumstance of no more exciting interest than the appearance of a new candidate for fame, as an Irish actor, on the boards of the Haymarket Theatre on Tuesday night, and the digression into which we finish a passing fit of moralization has led us, will oblige us materially to abridge our intended remarks on that head, as well as to postpone to a future occasion a comparitive history of the merits and peculiarities of other stage delineators of Hibernian frolleries, in addition to that of the gentleman who under the euphonious name of the new aspirant to fill the throne of Power, and is every inch a genuine Patlander. The richness of his brogue he enunciates to perfection, the weakness of his "whoop," he intonates beyond comparison, and of the humour and fun he seems as redolent as any admirer of "ould Ireland" could desire. The part he enacted was Dr. O'Toole, in the humorous farce of the Irish Tutor. The first appearance of an actor in a character sustained by so able a master of his craft as Power was certainly a difficult essay, and, considering the difficulty, Mr. O'Neill might feel very well pleased with his success. The audience were particularly gratified and loud in their applause, and, at the close of the performance, obliged Dr. O'Toole to appear before them to receive their gratulations and make his obeisance. However, it would be exaggeration to assert that the comparatively unpractised debutant, labouring under the want of complete ease and self-possession which long experience on the stage alone can give, was as completely efficient and faultless as Power. There was wanting that ability to make points tell, by dwelling on them and holding them out, as it were, to the perception of all within the theatre, which longer practice would afford. Mr. O'Neill seemed to have entertained an acute perception of the fastidiousness of a London audience, and seemed therefore willing rather to make moderate hits, than by attempting too much to run the risk of incurring ridicule or giving offence. He is by no means a servile imitator of Power, and introduced into the representation some peculiar features successfully ludicrous. He danced his Irish jig surprisingly well, and seemed to have throughout an exhaustless fund and a thorough appreciation of fun. Whether his performance in other characters will justify the approbation which his début obtained, time alone will determine, but, on the whole, we pronounce his performance intrinsically to be more than respectable, and, considering the difficulties of his position, highly creditable.



LITERATURE.

TRAITS AND STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY. Curry, Dublin. Part 3.

This number is more than usually rife with good things, and to the lover of terse humour it is will, in spicy brilliancy, prove a welcome "monthly visitor." Mr. Carleton, the talented producer of the work before us, merits the full measure of praise which the British press has honourably awarded regarding the writings of this favoured son of Erin. Did our limits permit, this week, we would gladly avail ourselves of the pages before us for supplying our readers with a sample, not only of the sterling quality of the work, but the spirit of exciting humour which more or less characterizes the "free-will offerings" of the Irish peasantry.

THE EVERGREEN. Sherwood, London. No. 7.

We are well pleased with the taste and arrangement evinced in the getting up of this work. It is really what its title implies, a miscellany of fact and fiction, yet withal so worthy that we gladly express our hearty commendation in its favour; teeming, as it does, with evidence of vigour, and sparks of rich and rare genius. The illustrations are good, though somewhat in the "sear and yellow leaf" of age.

THE QUEEN'S VOYAGE; OR THE FOLLIES OF SCOTLAND. Gilling, London.

We are favoured with this emanation of the muse in a play of fancy that, at least, cannot fail to amuse. The author spares neither age nor sex in his merciless application of the power to wield a poet's whip. Each and all receive their due amount of castigation, and more; but we leave our readers to judge of its merits, otherwise, according to their own will and pleasure.

THE GARDENER AND PRACTICAL FLORIST. Part I. Groombridge, London.

Though a wide field in this instance has been chosen, and though numerous the labourers, yet the work before us, we doubt not, will meet the favour of those for whom it has been called into existence; nor will the popular reader digest the contents of "The Gardener" without benefit.

AIRD'S SELF-INSTRUCTING FRENCH GRAMMAR. Cunningham, London.

This little unassuming tome will be found the more deserving general patronage the better it becomes known. Mr. Aird, though a young aspirant to fame, is no theoretic teacher; but gathers his "examples" and mode from the "school" of experience. We have glanced over the pages of this grammar, and at once express our unqualified approval of the work. Such of our readers as seek intimacy with correct French—the language regulated as it ought to be—will but consult their own benefit when they study the "laws" laid down by Mr. Aird.

THE HERBERTS. By the Author of "Elphinstone." 3 vols. 8vo. Saunders and Otley, London.

We have seldom perused a novel, of late years, boasting like claims to merit with the work now on our table. In the "Herberts" there are, indeed, but few attempts at the mawkish sentimentality of modern novel writing; and the work, instead of being got up to sell, appears rather designed to instruct, by the strength of its morale and the number of teaching facts to which it layeth claim. Unnatural stiffness, and worked-up display of plot, have been, very wisely, banished from the narrative of these volumes; and, instead of the namby-pamby schoism of every-day romance writing, we have a work really possessing and maintaining claims to originality and vigour, as its characterising features. The incidents are painted distinct and natural. Interest in the readers will rise from the attentive perusal of "The Herberts" without acknowledging that they have seen all the characters here defined, full of bloom and activity in the living world. Hence our opinion of the work is considerably enhanced; and hence we consider it but a duty to acknowledge our opinion of its merits, as a work of fiction, teeming with truthful colouring and substantial reality. As we hate plagiarism, and love originality, and natural romance, so do we esteem a novel of this stamp the more. There is, likewise, a benevolence of opinion charactered throughout the work, which is worthy of note; and which cannot fail to prove its strongest recommendation to those who seek to keep pace, in their reading, with the march of mind and the spirit of the age in which we live. We detest the want of heart which so many of our "new novels" evince, and therefore concede our need of approbation, the more readily, to the author of "The Herberts." It is a work, we trust, destined to deserve favour, and to win and to wear lasting laurels.

COLLECTIONS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE GEOLOGY, HISTORY, ANTIQUITIES, AND ASSOCIATIONS OF CAMBERWELL, AND THE NEIGHBOURHOOD. By DOUGLAS ALLPORT.

This is a spiritedly got up publication, combining at once the usefulness of research, in its origin, and the beauty of illustrative engraving, in its embellishment. The author has spared neither labour nor study, nor time nor expense, in his desire to render the work before us complete, and interesting to the local and general reader. The geology, statistics, and history of Camberwell receive, each, their full measure of attention and care, as evinced in the arrangement and compilation of this work. Public institutions, their origin, history, and objects, and antiquarian records, enlist the labour of the talented compiler; and severally engage the attention of the reader, in accordance with their claims to age and importance. The engravings are highly finished, in the best style of art. This book will be of immense advantage to those desirous of learning particulars regarding the locality to which it is intended to confine its delineative claims.

PROGRESS OF SCIENCE.

Unitarians may now suspend their clamour for a time, and the most rigidly practical cannot, with any show of reason, exclaim against the no-results which follow from the congregation of the learned. Can anything be more useful than an exposition of the best means of promoting the growth of fat? Anything more practical than the manufacture of cheese? The Parisian savans, at the last meeting of their Academy of Sciences, listened with exemplary patience to a long essay from a M. Romanet on the feasibility of establishing joint-stock cheese manufactories in France, after the model of the Swiss, who manage the matter in the wise. It appears that until recently, in Switzerland, the trade in Gruyere cheese was monopolised by the wealthy; for, be it known to the unlearned in such matters, that it is quite necessary, to secure the quality of the article, that the cheese should be large, and that the milk should be coagulated the day it is drawn from the cow. The small proprietor, therefore, was shut but from the advantages arising from the manufacture of this article, which is one of considerable export. Some ingenious person, however, at length hit upon a mode of enabling the peasant to compete with the wealthy proprietor. Cheese dairies were established, and an account was kept of the quantity of milk furnished by each person, and the proceeds were apportioned accordingly. This plan is in general operation in Switzerland, and M. Romanet wishes to promote its adoption in France. The Academie could scarcely lend its aid to a more useful and philanthropic project. M. Dumas' paper, read at the same meeting, was on a subject having close relation to the foregoing, namely, "On the Food of Herbivorous Animals." This philosopher states, that the quantity of fat in healthy animals does not depend upon some peculiar process in digestion, as is generally thought, but upon the quantity of fatty matter in the food taken in. Upon an analysis of hay and Indian corn, he found—at least so he says—the hay to yield two per cent. of fatty matter, and the corn nine per cent. Further, M. Dumas asserts, that herbivorous animals always make less fat than the amount of fatty matter contained in their food, but the milch cow affords a larger quantity than any other animal, and that the quantity of butter that she supplies would, if weighed, be found equal to that contained in her food!—teste M. Dumas.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—The substances which have been used for the purpose of rendering metallic plates and paper sensitive to the influence of light, are very different in their constitution; and consequently light, in acting upon them, produces very varied results. When some classes of salts are used, the original colour is merely darkened; in other classes it is entirely removed; while some species, which are originally colourless, assume a dark brown, blue, or black appearance. The greater part of the preparations already used in photography are of mineral origin; but latterly substances have been employed, having in their constitution organic bodies, either alone, or united with a substance of a mineral nature. In the researches on the action of light on vegetable colours, very recently instituted by Sir John Herschel, he found he could produce colours—such as yellow, green, blue, red, pink, and a variety of others, never before obtained by the influence of light. During the course of his experiments, he found that certain salts, such as the ammonia-citrate of iron (a salt of a vegeto-mineral character), were very readily acted upon by light; but that, unless it was aided by certain metallic solutions, the effect was scarcely perceptible. When paper, washed over with a solution of ammonia-citrate of iron, is exposed to light for a short time with any body, such as a piece of lace, in contact with it, the part covered by the lace is left of its original colour, but the part on which the light is enabled to act becomes darker, according to the time it is exposed: if the exposure is only of a very short duration, there is not the slightest appearance of darkening produced. It is, in this state, to be acted upon with a neutral solution of chloride of gold, which immediately darkens the part exposed to light, and removes the original brown colour of the ammonia-citrate from the parts to which light has had no access. In this state, however, it is still sensitive; therefore, means must be adopted to remove the sensitive compound. In order to accomplish this, it must be washed in distilled water, dried between folds of blotting paper, and then combined with a solution of sodide of potassium, which must be allowed to remain on the paper for a minute or two, and then washed off with distilled water. After the picture is dry, it is no longer acted upon by light, or indeed by any substance which does not destroy the texture of the paper. The necessary solutions are prepared in the following manner:—Take 100 grains of the ammonia-citrate of iron, and dissolve them in 900 grains of distilled water. Prepare a solution of gold in nitri-hydrochloric acid (the aqua regia of the shops), taking care to perfectly neutralize any excess of acid by means of soda. The solution ought to be of such a strength as to resemble sherry wine in colour. The most convenient proportion of sodide of potassium is one ounce to the pint of distilled water.* By this process, pictures, exhibiting the smallest objects with perfect accuracy, may be produced. This species of paper is found to be the best for taking positive copies of pictures produced by the calotype process, as, with very little attention to the even texture of the paper, a surface may be obtained which will be free from spots, or defects of any kind.

LIGHTHOUSES.—A return has been made to the House of Commons by the Corporation of the Trinity House, of the receipt and application of all moneys received as tolls for lighthouses in the year ending 31st December, 1840, pursuant to Act of Parliament. The net revenue during that period was £134,717, the charges £102,655, and the surplus £32,062. From this surplus has been deducted payments for repairs, insurance, wages, salaries to superintendents, &c., leaving a clear surplus of £28,465, which has been applied to the "charitable" and other uses, purposes, and intents, for which the Corporation of the Trinity House has been established and maintained.

* These solutions, excepting the sodide of potassium, ought to be kept in a dark place, and in bottles with glass stoppers.

ANGLING.

We have often thought that angling alone offers to man the degree of half, business, half idleness, which the fates have fixed in their needlework or knitting which, employing the hands, leaves the mind at liberty, and conceding the attention so far as is necessary to remove the pain of sense of a vacuity, yet yields room for contemplation, whether upon things heavenly or earthly, cheerful or melancholy. Quarterly Review.

THE TROUT

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News

There are a great number of varieties of the beautiful fish, which have been thought by some naturalists to be of distinct species; others again, who have had most favourable opportunities of studying their changes, have come to the conclusion that they are all of one species. There is not any fish which varies so much in colour, form, and size; the difference is to be met with even in the same river; one part will produce trout will flesh of a yellowish pale colour, whilst another will yield only ill-fed fish, whose flesh is white and comparatively worthless. They are so very abundant, that trout fishing is more a nuisance pursued by the angler than any other; he is a good fish and affords capital sport when hooked.

Trout spawn in the latter end of October in some rivers, and in others in November, which I think is most general, and is then out of season until March or April; during the winter months he is long, lank, and sickly, but when spring approaches, he seeks the swift, gravelly streams, and gains new strength as the season advances, and his food becomes more plentiful. There are some barren trout that will remain in season all the year.

In the latter end of May, or beginning of June, they may be said to be in perfection, at which time the May or drake-fly is on the water, and they will scarcely take any other bait: the best way to take them is by dibbing or dapping. The natural green or grey drake, in a live state, are the flies generally used for this purpose; the green drake is the best. If you use a single hook, it should be a No. 8, whipped with pale yellow silk to about a yard or a quarter-half of it. In Derbyshire little or no silk is to be perceived, in order to carry your flies. If you use two flies, set a double hook, No. 10 or 11, and pass a hook through the back of each fly. Great care must be taken to keep out of sight of the trout, as he is a very shy fish, and will leave off feeding as soon as he sees you approach; you must not imagine that because he does not dart off in a moment he does not see you: he will be warily watching you, motionless, and pursue a hurried start off should he think there is any danger. The best rule for fishing is to "fish fine, and a long way off." If possible, endeavour to get under the wind of your baits, let your fly fall gently on the water; if there is a high wind, and you give it a run properly, you will be almost sure to hook him.

For artificial fly fishing, which you will practise with more success when the drake-fly is not on the water, you should have a hackle of red hen tied on three yards and a half, I should recommend four yards, and fish with three flies, thrown as far as you can to let your flies fall gently on the water: the art of throwing the fly cannot be properly conveyed by written directions unless by the water side from an adept, will do more good than a long letter of theory without practice. Always take care, however, to keep the point of your rod well up, and in the act of throwing, let your flies form a circle over your head; if you bring them back too soon, crack, and your end fly is gone to grass. Some routine fishermen will use only certain flies in certain months, and I think it will be proper to mention a few of them, though you should always bear in mind that a good deal depends upon the colour of the water:

Flies for March.—The March brown, the cowdung fly, claret fly, and the blue dun.

April.—Stone fly, sand fly, orange dun, and green tail.

May.—Black and red palmers or hackles (these are capital flies for nearly all the season) little yellow May-fly, fern-fly dark blue dun, and oak-fly.

June.—Green and grey drake, and little black gnat.

July.—Sand-fly, the orange dun, red tail, grouse hackle and wren's-hackle.

August and September. Oak-fly, summer-dun, and July flies.

October.—Same as in March.

The minnow is a very favourite bait for the trout, and is used with most success in March and April. It will, however, be found to be a killing bait at any time of the year, when the water is clearing after a flood. All sorts of minnow tackle may be bought at the fishing tackle shops, as may also artificial minnows; but the fresh minnow is the best. Holland quotes the north country anglers' method of baiting: he says, "I have a gilse-hook (No. 9 or 8) at the end of the line, but wrapped no further on the end of the shank than to make it secure and to leave more room to bait. An inch or very little more, from the shank end of the gilse hook, I wrap on a strong hook about half the size of the other. I put the point of the large hook in at the mouth of the minnow, and out at the tail, on the right side of the minnow, hitching it half round as I put it in, then I put the other hook in below the under gnap, so that it keeps the minnow's mouth and colour." Care is to be used in putting rightly in the hook near the tail, else it will be indispensable to let the fish run out when he has taken the bait. Trout will also take the worm freely when the water is very clear, the dew worm and brandling are the best I can be used. Your worms should be well scoured before you use them. If you have time, and purpose to keep them long, put them in an earthen pot with some good moss which should be changed every four or five days; and if your worms turn sickly, put in about a table spoonful of milk or cream which will revive them. My next will contain a description of the grayling and chub.

A DISCIPLE OF ISAAC WALTON.

THE GRAND STAND AT ASCOT.—The receipts at the Grand Stand (which has now been opened to the public for four seasons) during the race week amounted to £2000. The money received for admission during the four race days, was as follows: Tuesday, £521 10s.; Wednesday, £59 10s.; Thursday, the Cup day), £1,357 15s.; and Friday, £16 12s.; making an aggregate, including £200 received for the rent of the refreshment rooms, &c., of £2,225 7s. The first year the stand was opened (in 1859) the receipts were £1,912 2s.; in the following year, £2369 15s.; and last year, £1892 18s. The erection was completed at an outlay of £10,000 in 100 shares of £100 each. Five shares are paid off every year from the money received, so that in the year 1870 the whole of the receipts, and up to that period, a portion, increasing every year (after deducting the necessary expenses for repairs, &c.), will be appropriated to the race-fund; thus enabling the stewards to give such additional prizes to be run for as will ensure the entries of the very first horses in the kingdom.

AN HONEST BEGGAR.—Some time since a beggar entered the George and Dragon inn, Honley, and called for a mug of beer. While drinking it, a carrier asked him a bit of paper for his tobacco pipe with, which he instantly pulled out of his waistcoat pocket, but while in the act of handing it, he observed some printing on it, which, after examination, proved to be a £5 note. The beggar, elated with the discovery, called for the landlord, and with the honesty of a true Englishman, deposited it in his hands, with directions "to deliver it to none but what could tell naan and nummer." The poor fellow had pocketed it in the streets the day previous, thinking it was merely a bit of paper. Leeds Mercury.

ENOUGH FOR THE PRESENT.—It has been stated that the Welsh coal fields extend over 1200 square miles, and that there are twenty-three beds of workable coal, having an average thickness of ninety-five feet. Each acre will yield about 180,000 tons, being at the rate of 5,000,000 tons per mile. If from this we deduct one-half for waste, and the minor extent of the upper beds, this will afford a supply of coal equal to 32,000,000 tons per square mile. Let it be conceded that 5,000,000 are equal to one-third of that consumption in England, then each square mile of the Welsh coal-field will meet a proportionate consumption of a hundred years; and as there are from 1600 to 2000 square miles in this district, it would supply England with coal for 2000 years after all the English mines were exhausted.

BATHING.—Last week seventeen persons were drowned while bathing in the river between London-bridge and Battersea, besides many others below bridge and in the canals. Since last Sunday eight more have perished. Surely a code of regulations could be laid down, not only to increase the comfort and cleanliness of the people, but also to prevent the frequent sacrifice of life, and the indecent exhibitions which are daily made.

The Frankfort Journal announces a decided novelty having occurred at Coburg. The riding school of that town has been converted into a temporary theatre; and on the night of the representation of "Peter and the Carpenter," the edifice, but indifferently constructed, fell in with a tremendous crash just at the rising of the curtain. Thirty lives have been lost, and many persons wounded. The scene was most distressing and appalling.

FLORICULTURE.

THE RANUNCULUS.

It may be said there are two varieties of this plant the wild, and garden species. The wild flower, our common buttercup, is found both in marshy and mountainous districts, the garden flower is a native of the Levant, but has been cultivated in Britain nearly 200 years. The raising of this plant from seedlings is very simple: the soil should be a sandy, lazelly loam, mixed with a third part of old manure; it should be exposed for six or eight months, and be turned at least twice during that time. The border should be so arranged as to be open to the full. The seed may be sown rather thickly, and but a slight distance beneath the surface in pots filled to the brim with mould. The pots should be well watered, and kept in the shade. The seed will come up in a month. When the grass is withered, take up the roots and preserve them in bags or boxes of dry sand. Plant them in the following February, six inches apart each way. In June they will bloom profusely; and when the flowers are about half-blown, shade them from scorching suns like the present by white calico or netting, and from heavy rains by a covering of mats. When the seed-pod turns brown, they should be gathered and preserved entire until the time of sowing.

Other varieties.—Finish planting out as soon as possible; for if deferred, the strength of the sun is very prejudicial to recently removed plants. Pansies should now be propagated; and if you intend saving the seed of tulips, fix a piece of glass horizontally over each pod. Tie up carnations, pinks, dahlias, &c., and shade choice kinds of carnations, picotees, and pinks.

BOCCACCIO'S HOUSE.—The house of Boccaccio, at Certaldo, was purchased in 1822 by a Florentine lady, named Medici Tornzoni, in order to preserve it from dilapidation, as a relic of departed genius. A curious circumstance is said by Professor Roselini to have happened some years previously to this purchase. An old woman who tenanted the premises, was busy weaving in a small room next to the sitting apartment, when the repeated shaking of her loom brought down part of the wall, and laid open a small recess hollowed in the thickness of it, from which a large bundle of written papers tumbled down. The old woman, through ignorance, or superstition, or both, thought it a pious duty to consign the whole of the manuscripts to the flames. Probably many interesting autographs of Boccaccio have thus been lost.—Gallery of Portraits, Boccaccio.

FIRE AT HITCHIN.—FOURTEEN HOUSES BURNED DOWN.—A fire of a most destructive nature happened at Hitchin, in Hertfordshire, on Sunday afternoon last, which in the short space of two hours, consumed fourteen houses and other premises. On the alarm being raised the flames were discovered raging in a house in the occupation of a labouring family named Walker, in Holly lane, a neighbourhood inhabited chiefly by the working classes of the town. After much laborious exertion the fire was mastered, but by that period fourteen dwellings, the habitations of nearly fifty families, were entirely destroyed. No account has been obtained as to the origin of this disaster. The property is not insured.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

PROBABLY, in the whole annals of Newspaper History, the triumphant success of "THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS" is without a parallel; it has received from the public a welcome, warmer and wider than we could have anticipated even in the buoyant enthusiasm of our first ambition. From the length and breadth of the Empire we have received the most flattering testimonials and offers of support from the most distinguished writers, of whose kindly services we shall, from time to time, be proud to avail ourselves.

To our brethren of the Metropolitan and Provincial Press, who have greeted our appearance with so much warmth and cordiality, with so many hopes for our success, we tender our warmest thanks.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"THE PROGRESS OF ILLUSTRATED LITERATURE.—Of the marvels of the day, as far as decoration is concerned, the LONDON NEWS has, assuredly, a claim to the first rank whether as regards the general excellence of its illustration and its profusion, or the cheapness with which it is tendered to the public. The first three parts of the newspaper are now before us, crowded with cuts, illustrative of all the passing events of the day, and giving, in addition, the usual letter-press of a weekly newspaper, at a rate which, but for the most extensive public patronage, could not by any possibility pay the proprietors for the liberality with which they have produced it. As an example of this, we may cite the number which was issued on the 3rd of September, adorned with a taste and profusion of no limited order. It is, without exception, the newspaper which is more calculated for a family, where the younger branches are more numerous, than any other of the periodical journals, from the utter absence of all matter which can offend the most delicate, and the varied nature of its contents. Amongst which, in addition to the news of the day, we have political characters, theatrical sketches, topographical information, and graceful verses, all of pure literary merit, and adapted to give that useful kind of information, which is so often needed by young people or provincial readers, as a commentary upon the facts which the pages of the daily press bring before their view."—Morning Post.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The fancy, facetiousness, spirit, and indeed elegance of this publication place it without a rival as a newspaper candidate in families and among the young. Sparkling, amusing, attractive in the highest degree from the variety of its letter-press and its unprecedented display of pictorial embellishments, it derives a further recommendation from the good taste with which it is conducted, and its studied avoidance of whatever should create a blush, or induce an impure sentiment. It is precisely the weekly periodical for the drawing-room table and 'evenings at home.' Its inexhaustible novelty is a perpetual charm, while its gaiety, its variety, its unexpected crowding of illustration, inevitably rivet the imagination and the eye."—Morning Advertiser.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The high excellence to which the art of engraving on wood has arrived has been, during the last dozen years in particular, applied with much success to the illustration of many publications. But embellishments of first-rate excellence have been almost exclusively confined to publications, either not limited to appearance on a special day, or to such as are issued monthly. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, the first number of which we have just now lying before us, is an exception. It is a regular weekly newspaper, of 16 large pages, and, from its careful and judicious selection, its low price, (considering its size and the number and beauty of its illustrations), and withal the moderate tone of its politics, admirably suited for what is appropriately termed a family newspaper. The embellishments are in the finest style—such only as we have been accustomed to see illustrating the higher order of monthly and other publications. The expense attending a publication of this kind must be great. Here we have a newspaper of 48 columns, paper and typography of the best description, and the whole embellished in the way we have described for the small sum of sixpence."—Stirling Journal.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The selected and original matter are right good, and to ladies who would be desirous of procuring materials for a scrap-book, the ILLUSTRATED NEWS will be invaluable. The proprietors have undertaken a mighty work, and must have secured men of the first-rate talent. They deserve encouragement, and will, we hope, succeed."—Athlone Sentinel.

"We have been favoured by a specimen copy of the first number of this new periodical, which is as original in its design as spirited in execution. We wish it success, and are not surprised to see by its second number that it has at once jumped up to the position of second in circulation of the weekly metropolitan press."—Maidstone Gazette.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—This is the title of a new journal published in London, the first number of which we have just been favoured with; and it is certainly as unprecedented a specimen of newspaper printing as it is an unique feature in the newspaper press. Here, for the small sum of sixpence, is an excellent summary of all the news of the week, original articles written with talent and judgment, and no less than thirty splendid wood-cut engravings of subjects of passing interest, in a style which, twenty years ago, could have been scarcely equalled on copper. We have a spirited view of the conflagration at Hamburgh, the city of Cabul, the great fortress of Ghuznee, seven or eight splendid illustrations of her Majesty's Fancy Ball, besides a number of humorous and characteristic sketches. Considering the enormous expense such a publication must involve, our only wonder is, how it can be sold for the money. It is indeed a splendid proof of the proficiency in the arts in the nineteenth century, and we hope such an important undertaking will be duly patronised by the friends of taste, intellect, and the fine arts."—Mona's Herald.

"The pictorial art has at length allied with journalism. We have before us the first number of a new paper, entitled THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, which combines the ordinary features of a political journal with the novel accessory of pictorial embellishment. The wood engravings are numerous and spirited, having for their subjects the most striking circumstances of the day."—Cheltenham Chronicle.

"It is, decidedly, the most unique thing of the kind ever attempted, and we are sure it must command an extraordinary circulation—it at least deserves it."—Drogheda Argus.

"As an amusing record of passing events, addressed not only to the mind by its letter-press, but the senses by its broad and palpable delineations of character and scenery, we hail the happy idea, and heartily recommend it, especially to families, as an agreeable pastime for the young, or as fitted to adorn the drawing-room table. We wish it every success."—Kelso Chronicle.

"THE ILLUSTRATED NEWS will doubtless have an extensive sale in every town throughout the United Kingdom; and such indeed must be requisite to reimburse the liberal proprietor for the expenses of his national undertaking."—Leamington Chronicle.

"We have received a copy of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, an admirably got up paper, which, besides a great quantity of excellent matter, contains a large number of well-executed engravings, including a representation of the City of Hamburgh on fire; her Majesty's Bal Masque; her Majesty and Prince Albert in their splendid costumes as Queen Philippa and Edward III.; groups of the principal nobility in their magnificent dresses; views of Cabul and Ghuznee, &c., which are very interesting, and should procure for the ILLUSTRATED NEWS an extensive circulation."—Mayo Constitution.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—This is a novel and interesting newspaper. It has taken an entirely new field for a newspaper, being interspersed with beautiful engravings, to the number of thirty weekly. It is, we believe, the first attempt that has been made to give a regular series of illustrations in a weekly newspaper. Those in the first number are beautiful—excellent specimens of the high state of perfection to which the art has been brought. They are worth the whole price of the paper."—Dundee Chronicle.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—This is a new candidate for popular favour, of great attractions and merit. It is an entirely new experiment in the newspaper world—namely, the attempt to illustrate the passing events of the day, by a succession of beautiful wood-cuts. The first number, now before us, contains thirty-engravings of great beauty. The publication, we think, cannot but succeed. It deserves and must command success."—Leeds Times.

"We have received the first number of a newspaper which has just made its appearance under the title of THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. We generally look at the first number of a periodical with some misgivings, because, in the majority of cases, it is fraught with promises and hopes, which its merits give but little assurance of being realized. The publication before us, however, is of a different character; it seems to be got up with a talent and spirit of enterprise which we think must ensure its success, and which most certainly deserve it. The paper, which is a miscellany of politics, arts, and literature, consists of sixteen folio pages, and is embellished with upwards of thirty excellent engravings, most of which are illustrative of some event of present interest. They comprise representations of the destruction of Hamburgh; of the Versailles Railway, of Cabul, of Ghuznee, and eight of the Queen's recent Bal Masque. The literary deparment of the paper displays talent in every way correspondent with its pictorial merits; the editorial articles bear the stamp of cultivated taste and sound judgment, and the selection of matter is made with that proper attention to instruction and good morals which, if the same line of management is adhered to, must make the paper an acceptable and useful acquisition to families. The mechanical execution of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is equally entitled to praise; the typography is excellent, and the composition is singularly free from errors. Upon the whole, we can warmly recommend the paper to the patronage of the public, and, in so doing, we consider we are but doing justice to one of the most spirited undertakings that we have ever seen attempted. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is to be published every Saturday, and, although it abounds in beautiful engravings, costs but sixpence. We can scarcely pronounce an opinion on the politics of the paper, but it professes "an unconquerable aversion to the very name of party," and declares that it is determined to test all measures "by a reference to their practical utility." We suspect, however, that its affections lean towards that which we consider the better side—namely, that which is guided by those principles of Whiggism upon which the British Constitution is founded."—Guernsey Star.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—We have been favoured with the first number of this truly enterprising journal; among the many which, in the various departments of newspaper literature, are in existence, in this period of our history, THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS' proprietors have marked out a new track in the diversity, and it must be at very considerable labour and expense—have produced a publication of combined instruction and amusement. The number before us (a large octavo), contains upwards of thirty wood-cut engravings of excellent design and execution, numbering many large illustrations, the principal of which are those of the leading characters and dresses at her Majesty's Bal Masque; the fort of Cabul, and Ghuznee; Meudon, the seat of the late Versailles railway catastrophe, &c. &c. The typographical matter, both in selections and original, are equally deserving, and evince the engagement of first-rate talent. We bid it welcome, and though it disowns the name of party, we discover the Conservative will, in the main, have its support, because it is the most honorable, and therefore the best entitled to it."—Erne Packet.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.— We, this morning, were favoured with a number of this publication. It is admirably well got up, and promises to be a most useful and entertaining journal."—Tipperary Constitution.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 7] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

THE RENEWED POOR LAW COMMISSION.

As the legislation of the session progresses with heavier labour and more rapid strides than it has done under any previous administration for many years before—as it marches, indeed, amid the difficulties of the present critical condition of the country, at an almost alarming pace—as it sweeps along with the current of power, and bears down the barriers of opposition—we watch earnestly and with anxious interest for something like the realization of those sanguine promises which, at the last election of representatives of the people, politicians of all parties were heard proclaiming to the poor. Nor can we—while on the alert to find for them in every propoundment of Parliament some new element of happiness—refrain from expressing our bitter dissappointment at the continued rebuke which our hopes received with each fresh demonstration of legislatorial indifference or tyranny—and how completely we feel the futility of the best exertions of humanity upon some points, if upon others of more widely borne and universal grievance there is manifested only obstinacy to continue instead of wisdom to redress the wrong.

Within the past few days a determination has displayed itself on the part of government to extend over another five years of cruel and grinding miasrule, the fearful powers and responsibilities of the New Poor Law Commission.

The Tories proclaim this dangerous intention in the House of Commons by the voice of Sir James Graham—the Whigs echo it with a consistency that only covers them with shame—the Radicals oppose it with a hopelessness as distressing as it is discouraging and weak—and the legislature carries it, to work out the policy of the Minister and recoil in wretchedness upon the poor.

There is as much insincerity as wickedness in a majority of the votes which are recorded in favour of the renewal of this hateful commission. The Whigs may hold to it, for it is part of a system of bad political economy which their philosophers have always preached; but the conservatives (with few exceptions), who swell the ministerial majorities against the people upon this loudly discussed question, break faith most dishonourably with their constituents, and betray pledges which it was incumbent upon them most steadfastly to have confirmed. We had an opportunity, at the late election, of listening to the vows made by candidates who are now returned to parliament and voting against the poor,—from hustings in nearly every quarter of the empire where the action of the poor-laws had been most oppressively exercised and most acutely felt. Everywhere they reprobated the "heartless Whig commission;" everywhere they inveighed against the dreadful clauses of cruelty which the act contained—everywhere they appealed, as well as their eloquence would allow them, to the sympathies and the sufferings of those whom they addressed—everywhere they identified themselves with promises of protection and relief under a Conservative administration, and everywhere they bound themselves to work out some purer measure of humanity, and destroy and obliterate the crying grievances of the recent law. It is both sad and humiliating to contemplate so large a share of reckless public dishonesty, as is indicated—first, in the want of truth and principle which could record such promises before those who trusted them—and next, in the secure and nonchalant treachery which could manifest itself, without a compunction or a blush, as soon as the diplomatic hypocrisy was over, and the point of deceit was gained The whole press finds this too glaring and difficult an iniquity to gloss; the more bold and sincere of its advocates for the people repudiate its baseness at once; and, in spite of the prejudices of party or the claims of political allegiance, the brightest talent of Conservatism itself is brought to bear with threatening and terrific energy against the continuance of the Poor Law Bill. We rejoice in this fact, although we cannot help being led by it to the inference, that in matters of stringent public honesty the press is becoming more respectable than the parliament.

The New Poor Law was undoubtedly the most tyrannizing in complexion, the most brutal in spirit, the most remorseless in operation, of any of the enactments of cruelty, in which legislatures put humanity and christianity to shame. We admit the abuses of the old law—which was however beautiful in its foundation—and should still be regarded, in its beginning, as one of the purer glories of the Elizabethan reign. But we would not willingly have seen even the sad corruptions that had crept over it with time—so palsy its action that theoretical economists should crush it at a blow, and set up in its stead the monstrous crime which has been distressing and demoralizing the people, ever since its horrid machinery has been allowed to work. Still less—although that miserable result was achieved under the late reign—would we have it said, for the honour of our country, that a cruelty was perpetrated under the sway of Victoria that had laid the wisdom of Elizabeth in the dust.

It is bad enough to enact a wicked law for ever so brief a period; it is a thousand times worse to renew it when that period has expired, and when, during that period, its operation has proved its wickedness beyond dispute. Surely we need not recapitulate the miseries which the first Whig commission heaped upon the heads of the poor. And the Tories are seeking to renew it. Are these two great parties only to alternate with each other the crime of oppression? Will both delude the people with promises, and both legislate to betray? We had hoped that the career of the Whig administration would have taught the Conservative a better lesson. We remember, previous to the advent of the present government, seeing in a paper, violently Tory, the following vigorous diatribe against the poor-law bill of the Whigs:—

Ye looked for a law for your poor—to retrieve them
From the sheiterless doom—and starvation to death!
A boon and a blessing to raise—to relieve them,
With peace in its promise, and balm in its breath!
A law—by humanity governed and guided,
For the crushed of misfortune and lowly of birth,
For the friendless, the aged, and sick unprovided,
Who tread (hapless mortals!) the dark paths of earth.
Hollow mockers!—God's vengeance light on them!—they've given
Life's bitterest load to the weakest to bear:
And the rulers of earth have rebelled against Heaven—
Its justice—its mercy—its love—and its care.
Spain is rivalled, alas! in her fierce Inquisition—
Its impress of terror—its torturing toil,
When England empowers a heartless commission,
To build up (oh! sorrow) bastiles on her soil!
Bastiles! British bosoms with fury are swelling,
And pour forth a curse of the soul—on the time
When sin hung a roof over poverty's dwelling,
And gave to her poor men the prisons of crime!
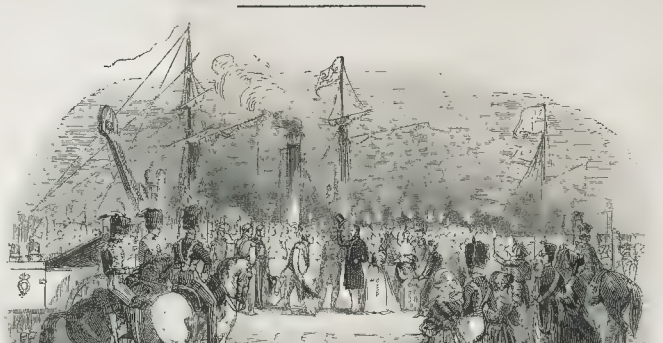
When age—deep distress—anguish—pain—destitution—
First learned—in the tomb sweetest solace to see;
And a blemish was cast on the bright constitution,
That kept ancient England so fair and so free!
Bad law!—All domestic affections 'twould smother,
And close out the heart from its fountain of tears;
Sever husband from wife—and the child from its mother,
And shut up the soul and the sunshine of years!
Would trail—slimy serpent—to England's bosom,
And nestle its warmth there alive and alone,
Her sympathies crush, and her feelings abuse 'em,
And tear out her bright heart, to leave there a stone!
Oh deep curse of England! Alas! for the hour
That bore on its dark wings thy tempest of woe,
When the lust, and the pride, and the madness of Power,
Laid sweet Pity prostrate, and Sympathy low!
When love drooped its head on the bosom of Sorrow,
To freeze by the cold hearts whose feeling had fled;
And Hope had no sun that would shine on the morrow,
To light up the temples where Mercy lay dead!

We heard with pleasure the essence and sentiments of these verses declaimed to the people at the late election by Conservatives, and we now turn with disgust from the votes which have been recorded by ci-devant orators of the hustings, in favour of Sir James Graham's renewal of the Commission, which was the oracle, the focus, the "lion's mouth" of the tyranny of the entire law. Whatever of amelioration boards of guardians could accomplish—whatever the Gilbert unions could do in the kindly spirit of their excepted independence—whatever individual humanity would have suggested or active Christianity have achieved—this renewal of the Commission abolishes and sweeps away. It has only one redeeming feature of mercy—it modifies (alas! modifies only) the bastardy, the separation, and the out-door relief clauses. It goes thus far and no farther. It stands, as it were, upon the threshold of the temple of Justice without the courage or the humanity to enter within.

We cannot conscientiously conclude without still thanking the few Tories who have had the manliness to stick to their pledges, and oppose their leader, as well as the Radicals who have maintained their principles in resisting the crying evil which the governing power is attempting to thrust upon the governed.



ARRIVAL OF THE KING AND QUEEN OF THE BELGIANS AT WOOLWICH.

On Monday morning, at half-past eight o'clock, the Royal Marines, under the command of Lieut. Colonel Powell, marched to the Royal Dock-yard, and were stationed at the landing-place, to form a guard of honour for the reception of their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, who were expected to arrive about that time. Colonel T. A. Parke, C.B., commandant, and Colonel Mercer, and all the Royal Marine officers in the garrison not on duty, were also present in honour of the occasion.

Shortly afterwards a field battery of four light six-pounder guns, under the command of Captain Stanway, arrived, and were drawn up on the west side of the landing-place, to fire a royal salute. About the same time, the officers and men of the 73rd Regiment, under the command of Colonel James Frederick Love, C.B. and K.H., arrived, and were drawn up in a line leading from the entrance to the Dock-yard, past the Royal Marine barracks, as the route by which their Majesties intended to proceed to Buckingham Palace was in that direction, through the village of Charlton and the Blackheath-road, to the Green Man, where the horses would be changed. Almost at the same time a detachment of the 8th King's Royal Irish Light Dragoons (Hussars), under the command of Lieut. Brown, arrived, and were drawn up on the wharf wall, to form an escort to the Green Man, where another detachment would relieve them, and escort their Majesties to Buckingham Palace.

At half-past nine o'clock the royal standard was hoisted on the flag-staff in the Dock-yard, and from the mainmast of the William and Mary yacht, and the Geyser, Alban, Black Eagle, and the other Admiralty steam-vessels in the river opposite the Dock-yard, hoisted their signal colours, and presented a gay and animated scene. The royal standard was also hoisted at the mortar battery, and the Royal Artillery attended, and were formed on each side of the line of road by which their Majesties were expected to proceed. At half-past ten o'clock, the arrival of one of the trading steam-vessels from Ostend communicated the intelligence that their Majesties would not embark at that port until nine o'clock this morning, and that, consequently, they could not be expected at Woolwich before half-past eight o'clock in the evening, at the earliest. On the communication of this information to the respective commanding officers, the troops were marched back to barracks, under orders to hold themselves in readiness at eight o'clock P.M.

In the course of the afternoon, a communication was received from the Admiralty, that the Ariel steam-vessel, Master Luke Smithett, Commander, was telegraphed, rounding the North Foreland, with the Belgian flag at her mast-head, at half-past three o'clock P.M. It was then ascertained, as near as possible, that their Majesties would arrive at Woolwich at about ten o'clock at night. The field battery was then ordered to the depot, and the troops informed that their attendance would not be required at that late hour.

At precisely a quarter to ten o'clock, a steam-vessel, with four lights upon the most prominent parts, made her appearance in the distance, and, as she rounded the lower part of Woolwich Reach, a splendid blue light was exhibited as a signal, and exactly at ten o'clock the Ariel came alongside the Dock-yard basin, with their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians on board, with their suite, having one luggage and three travelling carriages on board. Captain Sir Francis A. Collier, Knt., C.B. and K.C.H., in full naval uniform, decorated with his various orders, immediately went on board and was introduced to their Majesties. Lieutenant-General Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B. and G.C.H., with M. Van de Weyer, the Belgian Ambassador, followed, and welcomed their Majesties. Lord Sydney and Lord George Lennox, Lords in Waiting, also went on board to attend on the King and Queen of the Belgians, and accompany them to Buckingham Palace. In a few minutes afterwards their Majesties landed, after, in the kindest manner, parting with the commander of the vessel, and were received, even at that late hour, by a large concourse of spectators, who uncovered their heads, which was acknowledged by his Majesty walking to the carriage with his hat in his hand, and repeatedly bowing to the ladies and gentlemen assembled. Four of the royal carriages were in attendance, and the one in which their Majesties were seated was escorted by Lieut. Brown, and a detachment of the 8th Hussars; and, after leaving the Dock-yard, the royal cavalcade proceeded down the lower road through Greenwich for Buckingham Palace, where they would arrive about eleven o'clock. So far as the light afforded an opportunity of judging, their Majesties looked remarkably well, and her Majesty smiled and appeared pleased with the novelty of landing lighted by a number of lanterns having an appearance of an illumination. Their Majesties were repeatedly cheered by a great crowd on leaving the Dock-yard.

ANOTHER SUPPOSED MURDER AT ISLINGTON.—In the neighbourhood of Islington, on Monday, a report was circulated, that a female had been cruelly murdered by her husband, who had also attempted to perpetrate self-destruction, and subsequently had effected his escape. The following particulars may be relied upon as accurate:—It appears that a man named Joseph Carter, a coal-porter, in the employ of Mr. Curtis, coal-merchant, of Thornhill Wharf, Chalk Road, lived with his wife, about thirty years of age, in a cottage situated in Mr. Buckingham's rope ground, lying between the Chalk-road and Maiden-lane, and but a few yards from Messrs. Randall's tilekilns. Shortly before five o'clock in the morning, a man, named John Munden, who was going to work, and several persons in the neighbourhood, were alarmed by hearing loud cries proceeding from the rope ground. On entering, they found the man (Carter) looking down a well on the premises, upwards of 150 feet deep, and having 50 feet of water in it, declaring that he believed his wife had thrown herself down it, and he was induced to think so, as he had closed the flap himself on the previous night and now found it open. He further stated, that he had awoke about ten minutes before and missed her from his bed, and had been searching all over the place for her, but could not find her. The alarm was raised, and the police called in, and the drags procured from the Thornhill Arms; during which interval the husband (Carter) ran into the house, and endeavoured to cut his throat with a razor, but was prevented. The drags were procured, and lowered into the well, but from its extreme depth the ropes had to be considerably lengthened. After some difficulty the body was raised, by the assistance of the police and two other men, and as soon as it came in sight, Carter rushed out of the rope-ground, and has not since been heard of. On the body being brought to the surface, it was found to be quite warm, and presented a shocking spectacle. She was attired in her night clothes; and on examination, a terrible gash, at least three inches in length, and apparently inflicted by some blunt instrument, was found passing entirely up the back of her head in a horizontal direction. The only other bruise was a severe one on the arm, but which might have been caused by her rapid descent, and in striking against the sides of the well. The wound in the head is such, it is stated, that it is impossible she could have received in her descent.

On Friday morning last, at six o'clock a hostile meeting took place on Wormwood-scrubs, between Archibald Finyerson, Esq., residing at Hampstead, and Henry Charles Minter, Esq., residing in Baker-street, Portman-square. Mr. Finyerson, accompanied by his seconds, arrived on the ground a few minutes before six o'clock, followed by Mr. Minter and his seconds; both parties were attended by a surgeon. The seconds on both sides immediately commenced measuring the ground, a distance of sixteen paces, after which the hostile parties took up their positions and fired, neither taking effect. The seconds interfered, and used every endeavour to procure a reconciliation, but without effect. Mr. Finyerson insisting on another exchange of shots. The pistols were re-loaded, and the parties again occupied their positions, when they fired, Mr. Finyerson receiving the contents of his antagonist's pistol in the pistol-arm near the shoulder, after which Mr. Minter advanced, and both parties shook hands and quitted the ground, the ball having been previously extracted. The wound, though extremely severe, is not of a dangerous description.

THE SHRIEVALTY.—The gentlemen who will be proposed to fill the offices of Sheriffs of London and Sheriff of Middlesex, for the ensuing year, are Alderman Hooper and Mr. Jeremiah Pilcher, the extensive oil and lead-merchant, of Southwark, whose name has been for several years before the Livery. Mr. Hamilton, the bookseller, of Paternoster-row, has, we understand, declined to stand as a candidate for the office this year.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—Prince Joinville was to have embarked on Sunday last at Toulon, on board the Belle Poule frigate, of which he is the commander, and will join the squadron under Admiral Hugon.

The King of the French, whilst the Bourse of Saturday was reporting him to be seriously indisposed, was presiding at Neuilly at a cabinet council.

Marshal Soult took up his summer residence on Monday at Meudon, the royal chateau having, as last year, been placed at his disposal by the king.

The Cour Royale has reversed the judgment of the Correctional Police, which ordered the suppression of the Temps, on account of informality in the names of the responsible publishers. The Royal Court has also diminished the fine of 80,000f. to 20,000f., and has relieved the journal from the additional fine of 10,000f. imposed on it by the inferior court. M. Heberl, the Procureur-General, who, in his conclusions, had demanded the suppression of the Temps, will, it is stated, appeal to the Court of Cassation against the decision of the Cour Royale.

The Marseilles papers of the 16th contain an account of the burning of an American merchant vessel, the Louisa, which might have been attended with serious results to the numerous ships crowding the port. The fire was the work of an incendiary, the steward of the vessel, a native of Manilla, who, having been put in confinement for robbing the captain of nearly 800 Mexican dollars, in revenge threw phosphoric matches amongst some inflammable materials. The villain subsequently threw himself into the river, but was taken out, landed, and sent to prison for trial. Fortunately the fire was discovered in time, and the vessel was towed by a steamer out of the port, when it was got under in an hour, the damage being confined to the hold.

A Cabinet courier arrived on Sunday morning from St. Petersburgh, with despatches for the French government, which were instantly taken to M. Guizot at Auteuil.

The Paris papers of Monday, with letters from our correspondent in the French capital, have arrived. In the latter is enclosed a copy of a telegraphic dispatch received in Paris, which stated that an insurrectionary movement took place in Barcelona on the 16th instant; that the insurgents attacked the prisons, but that they were charged by the troops (cavalry) and dispersed, and that tranquillity had been completely restored.

The Moniteur publishes the following telegraphic dispatch:—

"Bayonne, June 20, half-past 9.

"The Charge d'Affaires of France to the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

"Madrid, June 17.

"The official Gazette announces this morning the formation of the new ministry:—General Rodil, Minister of War and President of the Council; Count Almodovar, Foreign Affairs; Zumalacarregui, Minister of Justice; Ramon Calatrava (Senator), Minister of Finance; Capaz (Senator), Minister of Marine; Torrez Solanot, Minister of Interior.

"The Chambers will not assemble before Monday (20th)."

Considerable fluctuations took place in the French funds on Monday last, without any known cause.

The rain recommenced in Paris on Monday, and fell heavily during several hours.

The provincial journals are full of accounts of the ravages occasioned by storms in various parts of France.

SPAIN.—Our private accounts from Madrid are of the 13th instant.

The Patriota of that evening states, that at six o'clock P.M., the negotiations having for their object to find the two members wanting to complete the administration, were still pending. The portfolios of Justice and Marine were the only two that had not yet been disposed of, the others having, as we already announced, been accepted by Messrs. Rodil, Almodovar, Landero, and Calatrava.

It was apprehended that some disturbances would take place in Madrid on the 13th, on the occasion of a bull fight; but the spectacle, which had attracted a number of spectators, passed off without any disturbance.

INDIA.—The following is an extract of a letter from an officer of the 50th Native Infantry, dated Saugor, April 19, 230 miles from Cawnpore:—"We are all on the alert here. An insurrection has broken out about forty miles from this. Five companies, a wing of irregular cavalry, with two nine-pounders, have been sent out to quell it, but it does not appear to make much progress. The day before yesterday Captain Rolfe and three privates got wounded; one private and one horse killed. The country all round is up in arms, and we have barely sufficient troops here to protect the city of Saugor and magazine. A requisition for troops has been made out, and on their arrival we shall be able to adopt more effectual measures. I only hope all will be settled ere the rains set in. The thermometer in camp is 125. The commissioner, who is out with the troops, wrote in to say the insurgents were in full march to plunder the city, but they have not yet made their appearance, but have burnt two villages only seven miles off. April 20.—The remains of poor Captain Rolfe, of the 3rd Native Infantry, who was wounded three days back were brought in this morning."—Times.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.—By the arrival of the Belgian steamer, British Queen, papers from New York, &c., have been received. The following are the most important items:—NEW YORK, June 7.—The prevailing opinion in America is, that Lord Ashburton's mission will be brought to a favourable and amicable conclusion, though but little is said on the subject in the Journals.

Yesterday was a day of great excitement in the financial and rascally circles of Wall-street. About ten o'clock in the morning it was discovered that James S. Schermerhorn, who has been Secretary of the Ocean Insurance Company for years past, had proved a defaulter to that institution in the sum of upwards of one hundred thousand dollars. Upon being informed of the discovery, he confessed the whole affair, and the manner in which he had succeeded in defrauding the institution of this large amount of money. He has a family, and four children, who have hitherto lived in affluence, and we understand that he was about erecting a splendid mansion in the upper part of the city as a private residence. He attributes his conduct entirely to the rascalities of Wall-street, and dabbling in stocks. The capital of the company is 350,000 dollars, and we understand that he has confessed that his defalcations reach nearly to 150,000 dollars.

Garrett Van Dyne, the aged porter of the Long Island Bank has been robbed, or his pocket picked of 24,000 dollars, in bank notes and checks, while proceeding from Wall-street to Brooklyn. Mr. Van Dyne is upwards of 80 years of age, and has been in that institution many years.

MOVEMENTS.—Lord Morpeth, we believe, is at this time at the White Sulphur Springs, Virginia; he intends to spend the summer at Saratoga, Niagara Falls, and Upper and Lower Canada. Charles Dickens and Lady are in the city; they leave to-morrow in the George Washington for "merrie England." Dickens' portfolio is filled with curious and graphic incidents which he has met with on his tour; and it is his intention, as soon as he reaches England, to publish a book containing Boz's bewilderments in the United States. Dr. Lardner is at Albany delivering lectures.

CANADA.—The intelligence from this portion of the British Empire is by no means important. The Governor-General was in excellent health, and so were the members of his family. He is evidently becoming very popular with the loyal portion of the Canadians.

Within the last few months a very extensive emigration has taken place from the United States to Canada, of persons natives of Great Britain, but who have resided for many years in the United States. Several thousands of these individuals have reached Canada since the opening of navigation.

The Montreal Herald of June 2, publishes a highly interesting letter addressed to Lord Ashburton, on the growing and great importance of the corn and flour trade with England, by way of the river St. Lawrence. It appears that last year this trade amounted to 4,000,000 dollars.

Fifteen hundred emigrants arrived in Montreal on the 1st and 2d days of June.

The prospect for grain crops this year in Canada is unusually good.

The Canadian papers all unite in abusing Captain Barclay's book about Canada.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The House of Lords did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

In the House of Commons, after a variety of less important business, Mr. C. BULLER brought under the notice of the house the recent proclamation respecting light gold. A long discussion ensued upon the question, in the course of which speeches were delivered by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY.

On the order of the day that the house resolve itself into committee on the Poor-law Bill, Colonel SAWYERS opposed the Speaker leaving the chair, and moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed to that day three months.

Mr. WAKLEY seconded the motion, and supported it by a speech of considerable length

Viscount COURTENAY expressed the opinion that the continuance of the commission was essential to the working of the Poor-law Bill.

Mr. LAWSON supported the motion of the gallant Colonel.

Sir R. PEEL claimed for the Queen's Government collectively the responsibility of this measure, which was calculated, in its opinion, to promote the permanent welfare of the industrious classes, and even of the paupers of the country. He had supported the new Poor-law Bill from the beginning, under a deep sense of the evils engendered by the old system. The Right Hon. Baronet then adduced evidence of these evils, and expressed a decided opinion in favour of the general good conduct of the commissioners, of their usefulness to the public, and of the necessity of prolonging their powers until all the old tendencies to abuse in administering to the poor had been effectually counteracted and subdued.

The house was then divided—

Majority	—171

Mr. FERRAND then moved that the Speaker leave the chair that day week.

Mr. FIELDEN seconded the motion.

Mr. M. PHILLIPS expressed the delight it would afford him to have the assistance and advice of the poor-law commissioners, if in his own neighbourhood he should be called on to take a part in the administration of the poor law.

Sir J. GRAHAM pointed out the inconvenience of delay, which was the obvious and avowed object of the present motion.

After some further discussion the house divided—

For the amendment	18

Majority against the amendment ..	—237

The original motion was then agreed to, and the house went into committee.

The CHAIRMAN then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again this day.

The Perth Prisons Bill was read a third time and passed.

The report on the Railways Bill was brought up with amendments, and ordered to be received.

The Justices Jurisdiction Bill was read a third time, with a supplementary clause, empowering the justices, under certain circumstances of pressure of business, to divide the beach, and hold the sittings in two courts.

The report on the Customs Acts was brought up, and ordered to be received.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

In the House of Lords the Earl of CLARENDON presented a petition from certain inhabitants of the Cape of Good Hope, praying for a representative constitution, in analogy with that of Great Britain.

After some conversation, in which the Earl of Ripon stated that the subject would occupy the attention of his noble friend the Secretary for the Colonies, the petition was laid on the table.

The renewed discussion on the income tax then took place, and occupied considerable time. The Marquis of CLANRICARDE undertook the function of master of the Opposition. His lordship moved that the bill be read a third time that day three months. We content ourselves by giving the division.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

In the House of COMMONS, some conversation took place on the subject of the currency, in the course of which Mr. GLADSTONE stated that the extraordinary demand for silver coin had arisen from the discredit of the bill-securities. This would be speedily remedied by a new issue of the lighter description of coin.

In reply to a question from Mr. HUTT, respecting the Stade duties, Sir ROBERT PEEL said, "I have within the last few days had an interview with the envoy of the Hanoverian government on the subject, and the envoy stated that the propositions of the British Government could not be accepted by the Hanoverian Government. I am not able to give any further information on the subject, except that negotiations are still going on."

In reply to Sir C. NAPIER, on the subject of Capt. Warner's invention,

Sir ROBERT PEEL said he had offered to refer the subject to officers to be appointed by the Master-General of the Ordnance, and that the public should bear the expense of the experiments. It was necessary that the Government should proceed cautiously in affairs of this sort, as there would not be a penny left in the treasury if the claims of every man should be implicitly acknowledged who thought he had made a valuable discovery.

On the motion of Lord J. RUSSELL, the Bribery Bill was read a second time pro formâ, with an understanding that the discussion should take place in committee on Tuesday next.

Mr. WARD then brought forward the periodical motion on the subject of the ballot; viz., "that, in all future elections for Members of Parliament, the votes be taken by way of ballot."

Mr. H. BERKELEY seconded the motion.

There was a debate, as a matter of course, and a division, of which we subjoin the numbers:

For the motion	157
Against it	290
Majority	—133

The Railways Bill was read a third time.

The house then went into committee on the Customs Bill.

The bill passed through the committee, on the understanding that it was, with the amendments and additional clauses, to be reprinted.

The house resumed.

Mr. SHAW obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Act 2d and 3d of William IV., c. 88, in respect to the right of voting in the University of Dublin.

On the motion of Lord ELIOT, leave was given for the introduction of a bill to amend the act for the regulation of the municipal corporations in Ireland.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

In the House of Lords, the royal assent was given, by commission, to the Property-tax Bill, the Australian Lands Bill, the Metropolitan Wood-paving Company's Bill, the Ferry-bridge and Boroughbridge Road Bill, the Charter-house Estate Bill, the Bradwell Inclosure Bill, and the Calmeton Inclosure Bill.

The amendments of the Commons to the Justices Jurisdiction Bill were agreed to. Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. WEDNESDAY.

Mr. O'CONNELL presented at the bar a resolution of the select committee on the alleged Belfast compromise: "That the chairman be empowered to apply to the house, to allow the committee to appoint an agent for each of the parties in the late contested election to assist them in inquiring into the matters to them referred." The hon. and learned member then moved in pursuance of the resolution of the committee.

The house postponed its decision until to-morrow (Thursday), perhaps to afford an interval of reflection whether the house or the tribunal appoints the agents of the parties, the thing may not assume rather too much of the appearance of a sham process.

In reply to a question from Mr. HUME,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER stated that less than three weeks ago the supply of silver was so excessive that Government was requested to take it in payment of duties.

The Drainage (Ireland) Bill passed through committee, and it was ordered that the report be received to-morrow (Thursday).

The Despard Copyright Bill passed through committee, for the purpose of being printed with amendments.

After some preliminary conversation, the house resolved itself into committee on the Mines and Collieries Bill.

Lord ASHLEY proposed an alteration in Clause 2, permitting boys of ten years of age to labour in mines alternate days, instead of restricting absolutely this description of employment to boys not less than thirteen.

After some discussion, the amendment was agreed to.

On the motion of Lord ASHLEY, a clause was added to the bill, giving power to her Majesty's principal Secretary of State to appoint inspectors to examine into the state of the mines and collieries, and the machinery used thereon.

The various clauses of the bill having been agreed to without alteration, the report was ordered to be brought up on Friday next.

The report of the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill was brought up, and Mr. BLACKSTONE moved that it be recommitted.

The house divided—

For the recommittal	19

Majority	—29

The report was then received.

The Rivers (Ireland) Bill was further considered in the report, which was ordered to be received to-morrow (Thursday).

The Perth Prison Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Dean Forests Ecclesiastical Districts Bill was considered in committee, and the report was ordered to be received on Friday.

Lord COURTENAY obtained leave to bring in a bill to remove doubts touching the law relating to charitable pawn or deposit offices in Ireland.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships sat from ten till two on appeals. The Earl of Shaftesbury then took the chair, when two private bills were advanced a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

On the motion of Mr. W. PATTEN certain standing orders were repealed, which interposed impediments to the introduction of railway bills.

Mr. H. J. BALLIE moved, in pursuance of the notice he had given, for copies of the correspondence of Sir A. Burnes with the Governor-General of India; and also of the latter with the Board of Control and the secret committee of the East India Company, in the years 1837, 1838, and 1839.

Mr. FITZGERALD seconded the motion. Sir JOHN C. HOBHOUSE opposed the motion, and said the war in Affghanistan was not undertaken without mature deliberation.—Lord JOCELYN hoped the present Government would not embark in wars of Indian aggrandizement.

Mr. HOOG was opposed to the war; and Mr. HUTT vindicated the late Government.

Sir R. PEEL said, that under present circumstances, these papers ought not to be produced. Russia had positively disavowed all intention to disturb the British supremacy in India; that declaration had been accepted by Lord Palmerston as perfectly satisfactory; and the subsequent conduct of Russia had been in complete and cordial conformity with it.

Lord PALMERSTON, Mr. HUME, and Lord JOHN RUSSELL took part in the discussion, and the house divided—

For the motion	9
Against it	75
Majority	—66

Sir JAMES GRAHAM obtained leave to bring in a bill to encourage the establishment of district courts and prisons, also a bill to continue, until the 1st of July, 1843, the exemption of certain inhabitants of parishes, townships, and villages, from liability to be rated to the relief of the poor.

Mr. GLADSTONE then moved the committee on the Customs Bill, "That it be expedient to permit foreign wheat to be delivered, under certain regulations, from the warehouse, or from the ship, duty free, upon the substitution into the warehouse, or the delivery for exportation, of equivalent quantities of flour or biscuit." The motion was agreed to.

The house then resumed, and adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Slave Trade Abolition Bill was read a third time, and ordered to be committed. The Public-house Bill passed through committee—to be read a third time on Monday. Lord LONDONDERRY presented a petition from certain coal-owners in Northumberland; and, on their part and his own, complained in strong and indignant terms of the Commissioners' report on collieries.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

Mr. SHIEL made some inquiry as to the re-instatement of Mr. St. George to the magistracy of Galway; and, not deeming the explanation made by Lord ELIOT satisfactory, gave notice that he should move for the papers therewith connected.

The house then went into committee on the POOR-LAW Amendment Bill, when Mr. LAWSON moved that the bill be divided into two parts (the intent being to preserve the Gilbert Unions). This amendment was opposed by Sir JAMES GRAHAM, Captain PECHELL, &c., and ultimately withdrawn. The committee then proceeded with the other clauses of the bill.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE WATERLOO BANQUET.

The anniversary of the ever-memorable battle of Waterloo was celebrated on Saturday by the customary banquet at Apsley-house, given by the Duke of Wellington to the officers who took part in that sanguinary but brilliant achievement of British arms.

As upwards of a quarter of a century has elapsed since that glorious victory—a victory which gave peace to Europe—it rarely becomes of additional interest, not only to those moving in the military circles, but to the nation at large.

Of the officers who still survive that celebrated battle, we are happy to say we can number some of the brightest stars of the British army.

The sumptuous entertainment given by the noble and gallant duke on Saturday, was graced by the illustrious presence of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who, with the single exception of the Marquis of Exeter, groom of the stole to his Royal Highness in attendance on the Prince, was the only personage in the party who had not been actually present in either of the actions of the 16th, 17th, or 18th of June, 1815.

Shortly after seven dinner was announced, the banquet being served up in the gallery. It is needless to observe that the entertainment was of the most princely description; and although covers were laid for eighty guests, the noble dimensions of that apartment are such, that a much more numerous circle could with convenience have been dined. The table displayed the magnificent silver plateau presented to the noble duke by the Portuguese nation; and along the centre were several invaluable vases of Dresden porcelain, filled with the choicest flowers. At the northern extremity of the gallery, the buffet presented a gorgeous display of gold plate, the shield of Achilles, designed by Flaxman, a gift to his grace from the citizens of London, forming a conspicuous object amidst the massive and costly collection.

The gallery was illuminated by an elaborately wrought chandelier, from the centre of the exquisitely carved and gilded ceiling, and at each end of the table was placed the magnificent candelabra presented to the gallant duke by the late Emperor of Russia. Numberless wax lights, in different parts of the gallery, added considerably to the coup d'œil, and imparted a rich glow to the valuable paintings which surrounded the gallery.

The fine band of the Grenadier Guards, the duke's regiment, who, during the arrival of the guests, performed in the vestibule, was stationed in an ante-room communicating with the gallery, and during the banquet played with their usual excellence the following selections of music:—

Overtures—'Les Dismans de la Couronne' .. .. Auber.
" 'Norma' .. .. Raper.
" 'Fra Diavolo' .. .. Auber.
Romance, sung by Herr Staudigl, and Chorus, from 'Das Nachtlager in Grenada' } .. .. K. Kreutzer.
Scena ed Aria 'Ah guasta penatio colsi' .. .. Saffe Pacini.
Cavatina, 'A te diro' } Roberto Devereux .. .. Donizetti.
Duetto, 'Un Tauro' }
Theme Varie 'Fausta' .. .. Donizetti.
Waltzer—'Zauber' .. .. Dobler.
" 'Wettrenner' .. .. Strauss.
" 'Victoria' .. .. Rudolph Sibold.
Quadrilles—'Les Soirées du Ranelagh' .. .. M.ard.
" 'Royal Irish' .. .. Julien.
Fantasia—'Lucrezio Borgia' .. .. C. Coote.
Capriccio—'Zanetta' .. .. Auber.
Polonaise, with introduction .. .. F. Berr.
Galop—'Cornwall' .. .. Ellen Glasscock.

At a quarter to nine o'clock the dessert was placed on the table, the beautiful service of Potsdam china, a gift from the late King of Prussia, being used on the occasion, with a service entirely of gold.

The health of her Majesty the Queen was then proposed by the noble duke, which was enthusiastically honoured, the band playing the National Anthem.

His grace then gave "His Royal Highness Prince Albert," a toast which was similarly honoured.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert then rose and proposed "The health of the Duke of Wellington."

The next toast given was the name of the Marquis of Anglesey, by the duke, to which the gallant marquis responded.

The noble host then proposed "Lord Hill and the British Army;" after which was given, "The Heroes who fell at Waterloo," drunk in solemn silence.

"The health of Prince Castelcicala, the Neapolitan Minister," was the succeeding toast, to which his excellency replied.

The other toasts of the evening were Sir Henry Hardinge, Lord Seaton, Sir Charles B. Vere, and Sir Peregrine Maitland, which were respectively acknowledged by those gallant officers.

At the table we noticed his Excellency Prince Castelcicala, the Marquis of Anglesey, Lord Hill, Sir C. Colville, Sir J. Kempt, Lord Strafford, Sir J. Lambert, Sir P. Maitland, Sir T. Reynell, Sir E. Kerrison, Sir A. Barnard, Sir G. A. Quentin, Lord Seaton, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, Lieut. General J. W. Sleigh, Sir J. Waters, Sir H. Hardinge, Sir H. W. Rooke, Sir J. G. Woodford, Sir C. B. Vere, Major General Sewell, Major General H. Wyndham, Sir Edward Bowater, Sir W. M. Gorman, Major General H. D'Oyly, Sir John May, Sir H. D. Ross, Major General Mercer, Major General Reeve, Sir R. Gardiner, Major General Freemantle, Sir H. G. P. Townshend, Col. Mercer, Col. Egerton, Col. Miller, Col. Browne, Col. Drummond, Col. Allix, Col. Garwood, Col. Stowell, Lord Sandys, Col. Wildman, Col. Rowan, Col. Ellison, Col. Ellis, Col. Clive, Col. E. Buckley. Col. H. Blair, Col. H. Webster, Hon. Col. Dawson Damer, Hon. Col. Anson, Col. Bentinck, Sir C. W. Dance, &c. &c.

At a quarter past ten precisely the company broke up; and shortly before the half hour his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Marquis of Exeter and Sir E. Bowater, left for Buckingham Palace.

The Marquis of Anglesey and the other guests took their departure shortly afterwards.

ACCESSION OF HER MAJESTY.—Monday being the anniversary of her Majesty's accession to the throne, the day was observed with the usual rejoicings. The bells of the different metropolitan churches rang merry peals during the morning. At one o'clock the Park and Tower guns were fired, and in the evening her Majesty's tradesmen illuminated their houses.

PETITION OF RIGHT.—CASE OF THE BARON DE BODE.—The inquiry before the Commissioners in this case, terminated on Saturday, when the jury found a verdict for the claimant, amounting, with compound interest, to nearly 800,000*l*. By the allegations in the petition, it appeared that, in consequence of the disturbed state of France in 1791, the Baron Charles de Bode, feeling that from his position as commander of the German Legion in the service of France, he was likely to become obnoxious to the people of that country, made a cession of the fief to his son (the claimant), who was known to be a British subject. It was also proved that the late baron and his family withdrew from Soultz, and took refuge in the Austrian camp; in consequence of which, their names were immediately inserted on the register of emigrants for the department of the Lower Rhine; and the mere fact of their names being on the register, confiscated their property. It was likewise proved that a considerable portion of that property was sold by the French government. At last the day of retribution arrived. The Allies took Paris. A convention was entered into to indemnify the British subjects whose property was confiscated. That convention was not concluded. A second was made in 1815, under which the present claim was made.

RAILWAYS.—The arbitrary regulations of railway directors which operate to the annoyance of the public continues to be the theme of newspaper controversy in several of the leading morning journals. The Rev. Sydney Smith has this week addressed a letter to Sir Robert Peel, in answer to a charge of nervousness brought against him in reference to this subject, by the Prime Minister in his place in the House of Commons, and handles the First Lord of the Treasury very playfully but somewhat severely. The frogs in the fable furnish a not unapt illustration of the kind of sport in which the worthy divine sometimes loves to indulge. With regard to the charge of inconvenience brought against the railway companies generally, an intelligent correspondent of the Times observes that, "the tyrannical regulation which prevents the friends of travellers from accompanying them to the carriage in which they are to travel operates most vexatiously, not only at the station, but, if possible, still more so at the place of destination. A few days ago I escorted a lady to the Great Western Railway station, and, having secured a ticket for her in a first-class carriage, I was compelled to take leave of her in the midst of a mob at the entrance to the platform, and to depart in total ignorance of the kind of companions with whom she was associated, nor was I allowed even to see that her luggage was secure. On the 'transit' it appears that she was very ill—in fact, fainted—in a great measure, I believe, owing to the confusion and flurry into which she was thrown by this contretemps at starting. On her arrival at her place of destination she was still very ill, and the gentleman who had come to meet her not being allowed to enter the platform, I know not how she would have obtained her luggage, but for the kindness of a fellow-traveller, a perfect stranger." The annoyance of this regulation is sufficiently obvious and ought to be amended.

Her Majesty will give a concert of vocal and instrumental music this (Friday) evening, at Buckingham Palace, for which invitations on a limited scale have been issued. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians and suite, will leave town this afternoon, to honour the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch with their company, at Queensberry Villa, Richmond.

EXETER-HALL.—THIRD GREAT CHORAL MEETING OF THE CLASSES.—The third and last meeting for the present season, of the classes instructed on the principle of Wilhelm of teaching singing, took place on Wednesday evening at Exeter-hall. Mr. John Hullah presided. The meeting was, like the former ones, most numerously and most respectably attended. Amongst the distinguished fashionables congregated on the occasion we observed Sir Robert and Lady Peel, the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, Lord and Lady Chichester, Lord and Lady Palmerston, &c., &c. The performances of the classes fully answered the most sanguine expectations formed of their proficiency, and in the singing of the psalms set forth in the programme showed a marked improvement in manner. The voices were blended in harmony, and the dissonance of earlier efforts was not observable. There were several novelties, viz., the Chorale "Sleepers, Wake" (from Mendelssohn's Oratorio St. Paul), which, although not rehearsed above once, we believe, by the pupils, was sung with finished effect. The glee "Come let us all a maying go" (Attenbury), which had only been rehearsed once, was equally well sung; and the Madrigal "the Waits" (Saville), was well performed. Several pieces were deservedly encored. Altogether the performances were effective and full of harmony and power. The whole was concluded by the national anthem "God Save the Queen."

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—The Select Committees of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the compromises alleged to have been made in respect to the petitions against the late returns for Nottingham, Reading, Harwich, Lewes, Bridport, Belfast, and Southampton, met on Tuesday last, but owing to the absence of several members the committees were obliged to adjourn without coming to any decision.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—On Wednesday the half-yearly general court of the proprietors of India stock, was held at the India House for general business. The court was made special, to consider the important subjects of the deportation of the Hill Coolies to the Mauritius, and also to take the opinion of the proprietors whether the expenses of the war in Affghanistan ought not to be borne by the British nation—not by the natives of India. The court was well attended. The chair was taken at the usual hour by Sir James Law Lushington, and the minutes of the last court were read. The Chairman acquainted the court that the dividend warrants would be ready for delivery, pursuant to the terms of the act of parliament, on the 6th of July next. —Mr. Weeding then rose to bring forward the resolution of which he had given notice, with regard to the deportation of Hill Coolies from the East Indies to the Mauritius, and which was as follows:—"That this court views with regret and concern, the apparent wish of her Majesty's government to authorise, facilitate, and invite, under the sanction of law, and at the expense of the public revenue of the colony to which they are carried, the emigration of the labouring population of India, to the island of Mauritius, for the purpose of cultivating sugar in that island. This court is of opinion that there is no superabundant population in India, and that as population is the best wealth a state possesses, it is the duty of the Indian government to take care that wealth is not impaired, and the population of India withdrawn to a foreign and a distant settlement, whilst it would interfere with one of the staple productions of our own country—sugar. That the first duty of this court is the welfare of the people of India, and it sees no reason to doubt but that under the wise superintendence and regulations of the Indian government, the people of that country may at all times find useful occupation on their own soil, to enhance their own welfare, and the prosperity of their native country. This court, therefore, recommends to the Court of Directors to abstain from sanctioning the measure which is contemplated."—Mr. C. F. Brown seconded the resolution. A long debate ensued, which ended in the motion being negatived by a majority of 54 to 22.

THE WAR IN AFFGHANISTAN.—Mr. D. Salomons then rose to bring forward the motion, of which he had given notice, relative to this important subject. After an able speech he concluded by moving "That upon the consideration of all the circumstances connected with British intervention in the affairs of Affghanistan, as they appear in the papers already laid before Parliament, it is the opinion of this court that the expense of that war ought not to be thrown upon the people of India, but that it should be borne by the Exchequer of the United Kingdom." Mr. Lewis rose to second the resolution. Major Oliphant moved the adjournment of the debate until Monday next, which after some discussion was agreed to, and the court adjourned.

Monday night an elderly woman, named Price, was found lying in a deplorable state of drunkenness in the Harrow-road. She was conveyed to the station-house, where, as customary, she was visited at various periods in the cell, and when last seen it was deemed necessary from her appearing in a complete state of stupefaction, to send for a surgeon. He arrived shortly after and pronounced her dead.

THE LATE MELANCHOLY OCCURRENCE AT ISLINGTON.—CORONER'S INQUEST.—On Monday morning, at twelve o'clock, an inquest was held at the Sutton Arms Inn, Chalk Road, Islington, before Mr. Wakley, M.P., coroner, and a respectable jury, on view of the body of Martha Carter, aged 39 years, who was found dead in a well 180 feet deep. The jury unanimously returned a verdict, "That the deceased, Martha Carter, destroyed herself while in a state of temporary mental derangement."

SUICIDE IN THE GRAND SURREY CANAL.—On Wednesday morning, about three o'clock, as two gentlemen residing at No. 7, Grosvenor-street, Camberwell-road, were proceeding homewards, along the bank of the Grand Surrey Canal, when they arrived near the tar manufactory, their attention was directed to a hat and coat lying by the water-side. They informed the police, and constables 148 and 184 P, immediately proceeded to the spot, and in a few minutes the body of a respectable gentleman, who was subsequently identified to be that of Mr. James Bicknell, a gentleman of independent property, residing in Union-road, Cobourg-road, was brought up. It appears he had left his home about eleven o'clock on the preceding morning, apparently in his usual health and spirits, and nothing was heard of him until he was taken out of the water, not far from his own dwelling. Not the slightest cause can be assigned for the commission of the act.

SUICIDE IN A WATER-BUTT.—Mr. Carter held an inquest on Wednesday at the Duke of Gloucester, Union-row, Walworth, on the body of Mr. Thomas Wrenn, aged 77, a retired innkeeper, who destroyed himself under very peculiar circumstances. It appeared by the evidence of James Miller, the deceased's son-in-law, that they resided at 7, Weymouth-street, Kent-road. On Sunday morning, at seven o'clock, Mrs. Miller went down to take in the milk, and on opening the parlour door saw the deceased's feet hanging over the edge of the water-butt. She gave an alarm, and Mr. Miller and his son forced the butt over before they could get him out. A surgeon was sent for, but he was quite dead. It appeared that for some time past he had been labouring under mental and bodily illness, and Dr. Coulthred, who attended him, had advised that his razors and knives should be put out of the way. In order to get into the water-butt, he had placed a stool by the side of it, and also a lantern. There was upwards of a foot of water in it, and he had only his shirt and drawers on. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

On Wednesday an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, at the Hoop and Toy, Old Brompton, on the body of Simon Welman Halliday, Esq., aged 77 years, of Brompton, brother of the late Sir Andrew Halliday, M.D., who was found speechless and insensible on the floor of the music-hall of his residence, and died in a quarter of an hour afterwards. Mr. Halliday was a gentleman of large fortune, and lord of the manor of Camberwell. It was said he had been treating himself medically for some time past, and his death was alleged to have been the consequence. The jury returned a verdict, "That deceased died from a strangulated rupture, produced by a natural cause."

ATTACK ON A POTATOE STORE.

THE GALWAY STARVATION RIOTS.

The foregoing illustration is intended to convey an idea of the state of desperation to which the poor of Galway have been reduced by the present calamitous season of starvation; and, although, according to present appearances, there is every reason to rely on the goodness of Providence for an abundant and early relief, yet it is calculated that more than another month of suffering and privation must elapse before succour arrives. The scene represented above is an attack on a potatoe store in the town of Galway, on the 13th of the present month, when the distress had become too great for the poor squalid and unpitied inhabitants to endure their misery any longer, without some more substantial alleviation than prospects of a coming harvest, and their resource in this case was to break open the potatoe stores and distribute their contents, without much discrimination among the plunderers, and to attack the mills where oatmeal was known to be stored. During the entire of that day the town was in the possession of a fierce and ungovernable mob, led on apparently by women and children, but having an imposing reserve in the rear of the Claddagh fishermen. The Sheriff, with a strong force of police and the dépôt of the 30th Regiment, which constitutes the garrison, vainly attempted to restrain them. They assailed him and his armed bands with showers of stones, which wounded the commanding officer of the military party in the head, and hurt several of the men. But, with singular forbearance and humanity, the gallant Thirtieth held their fire, and, as it was impossible to disperse such a mob without firing amongst them, the millers were induced to promise that meal should be retailed on the following morning at 15d. a stone.

The discontent of the sufferers had been aggravated by the unfeeling, and there was some reason to suspect the dishonest, artifices of those who had food to sell. Farmers, known to have abundant supplies of potatoes, had not only refused to part with any portion of them at the present high prices, but had actually sent into the markets and made purchases, in order to augment the scarcity. Numbers of dealers also, speculating on a rise, had stored quantities of provisions, which they refused to give out at a fair profit; and in several instances, these persons had cleared out the markets the instant they were opened, and left the poor famishing housekeepers, with their money in their hands, in the midst of apparent plenty, unable to procure even the supply of a single day.

To this cause is to be attributed the various disturbances which occurred at Loughrea and Galway; the people insisting upon the farmers retailing provisions to them out of the sack, instead of disposing of its contents wholesale to buxters and forestallers; and the magistrates generally, with proper discretion and humanity, enforcing the reasonable demands of the people.

The Claddagh fishermen, to signalise their victory, insisted upon a general illumination of the town, and ordered the joy-bells of the collegiate church to ring out a merry peal. Their requisitions were complied with in both cases. The joy-bells rang out a merry peal, and the inhabitants in general put lights into their windows. Thus, for several hours, the capital city of Connaught remained in possession of a lawless rabble, while the armed authorities of the country retired before them.

The following is the latest account from this distressed district:—"Galway, June 20. (From our own correspondent). Since the disturbance of Monday last this town has been perfectly tranquil. The fishermen took to their boats and went to sea early in the week, and provisions having experienced a seasonable reduction in price, no further commotion is apprehended. It was feared that the country people hearing of the violence committed on Monday, would not bring their goods into the market; and on Wednesday the supply was scanty from that cause. But an abundance of potatoes was brought in on Saturday, and sold at fourpence a stone. This is not an extravagant price, though a fraction over threepence always pinches the poor man; but in the present dearth of employment any price at all must distress him. Of the scarcity of money you may judge from this fact, of which I can assure you from personal observation, that at Loughrea, in this county, when the famishing people were riotously assembled to oppose the forestallers in the potato market, eggs were offered for sale at five for a penny, and chickens, quite fit for the pot, were sold for sevenpence a couple.

After a long drought we have been visited with seasonable and refreshing rain, which only seemed wanting to confirm our anticipation of an abundant and early harvest.

DUBLIN, JUNE 20.

GOVERNMENT PROSECUTION AGAINST THE PRESS.—COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, THIS DAY.

THE QUEEN v. DUFFY, PROPRIETOR OF THE BELFAST VINDICATOR.—[Before Chief Justice Pennefather.]—This morning the Court of Queen's Bench was very much crowded by persons anxious to hear this trial. The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Sergeant Green, Sergeant Warren, Mr. Brewster, Q.C., and Mr. Crawford, appeared for the prosecution. For the defendant, Messrs. O'Hagen and O'Loghlen. The declaration contained four counts, charging the defendant with publishing a malicious, wicked, and seditious libel in the Belfast Vindicator, of the 8th of March, 1842. The jury returned a verdict of guilty.

In another case of a kindred species, "The Queen v. Dowdal, proprietor of the Newry Examiner, it is understood that the traverser has withdrawn his plea of "Not guilty." Mr. O'Connell was expected over to defend the traverser, but he did not make his appearance.

All the élite of the city and surrounding country attended the ball and supper given on Friday night by the General Commanding the Forces and his Lady, in commemoration of the battle of Waterloo. Their Excellencies the Lord Lieutenant and the Countess de Grey honoured the festivities by their presence, and remained till an advanced hour.

REVIEW IN THE PHŒNIX PARK.—There was the usual military display in the Phœnix park on Saturday, in celebration of the battle of Waterloo. Although the day was dark and some showers of rain fell, the city was, nevertheless, almost deserted after one o'clock, up to which time the equipages of all shapes and sizes formed a continuous stream along the line of quays leading to the military road and park.

THE MARQUIS OF WATERFORD AND HIS BRIDE.—Saturday this distinguished couple arrived here by the Osprey steamer. The moment the vessel came in view, decked in her gayest flags in honour of the distinguished freight she bore, crowds of people assembled on the quay and parade to welcome the Marquis and his lovely bride to Ireland's shore, and mingled with the feeling of gratulation was one of anxiety to see the distinguished stranger. The quarter-deck was full of passengers, amongst whom the Marquis did not appear, as he and his lady were partaking of a déjeûner in the cabin to which no one else was admitted. In about a quarter of an hour the noble pair ascended to the quarter-deck, where they were warmly greeted by the respectable company standing there, and as they walked along the stage, they were loudly cheered by the people on the parade, which testimonies of joy they gracefully acknowledged. The happy couple immediately got into their carriage and drove off to the princely demesne of Curraghmore amidst the hearty cheers of the hundreds present. The people seemed quite satisfied that fame had not exaggerated the personal charms of Lady Waterford. The Cathedral joy-bells rang forth merry peals on their arrival and during the day, and the steamers had their colours flying from the mast-heads. It was expected their reception would be equally enthusiastic along their progress to their family mansion.—Waterford Mirror.

The marriage of the Honourable Miss Preston, only daughter of the Right Honourable Lord Viscount Gormanstown, with the new honourable member for Meath, Matthew B. Corbally, Esq., was celebrated at Gormanstown Castle on Thursday week. The parties are Roman Catholic.

On Friday, 17th inst., a large quantity of foreign grain entered the port of Drogheda, a consignment to St. George Smith, Esq. This is the fifth cargo which now lies in the Queen's stores of that town, waiting for the reduction of duty. The duty on wheat in the penultimate week fell from 12s. to 11s. a quarter, and it will certainly continue diminishing. It appears that every shilling's decline in the duty makes a difference of about 50,000*l.* on the stock now in bond; of course we shall have little or nothing liberated at present.

The Mayor of Cork presided at a meeting last week to establish a lace manufactory in that city, when some very elegant specimens of the local manufacture by young girls were exhibited.

The general Court-Martial which assembled at Athlone, on Friday, the 10th inst., for trial of Second-Lieutenant Piers Geale, of the 5th Fusiliers, on several charges, has terminated. The result has not yet transpired.

A gentleman named M'Carthy, of Loughrea, swam across the lake of that town, at the broadest part, a distance of three miles, on Monday last—a feat almost unparalleled in aquatics, since the famed one "o'er Helle's wave," in modern times, accomplished by the late Lord Byron.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

A numerous meeting of the Statistical Society of London was held on Monday evening, at their rooms, 4, St. Martin's-place; the Marquis of Lansdowne, president, in the chair, supported by others of its most distinguished members. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the patron of the society, attended by the Marquis of Exeter and Sir Edward Bowater, honoured the meeting with his presence. A paper, by Joseph Fletcher, Esq., was read, on the origin and history of the municipal institutions of the English towns. A discussion ensued upon some of the most curious facts adduced, in which his Royal Highness was pleased to take an active interest.

ROYAL SEA-BATHING INFIRMARY, MARGATE.—On Tuesday afternoon, a meeting of the highest respectability was held at Willis's-rooms, to make more generally known the nature of the above institution, and to make a public appeal on behalf of its exhausted funds. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury presided, supported by the Lord Bishop of London, the Earl of Grosvenor, the Rev. W. F. Baylay, Vicar of Margate, the Rev. Drs. Spry and Russell, the Rev. J. Hodgson, the Rev. R. G. Baker, Vicar of Fulham, Sir H. Halford, Sir J. Croft, Mr. Plumptre, M.P., Mr. Alderman Gibbs, J. A. Warre, Esq., &c. The Rev. J. Hodgson read the report of the committee, by which it appeared that the Royal Seabathing Infirmary had been in existence for about half a century, principally for the relief and cure of scrofula among the poorer classes, and that since the foundation of the infirmary, 16,405 patients had been admitted. In August, last year, there were 426 persons receiving the benefit of the institution. The report went into a detailed statement of the funds, by which there appeared to be a deficit of 200*l.*; and it also mentioned various improvements that had been made in the establishment. A certificate commendatory of the institution, signed by Sir H. Halford, Messrs. Guthrie, Liston, Sir B. Brodie, and all the chief physicians and surgeons of London, was annexed to the report. The Right Rev. the Bishop of London moved the first resolution, which was seconded by Sir Henry Halford. Several other resolutions in support of the institution, were passed, and after a most cordial vote of thanks to the chairman, which his Grace kindly responded to, the meeting separated.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S ORPHAN ASYLUM.—On Tuesday, the anniversary festival of this institution took place at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, and was attended by a great number of gentlemen connected with the shipping interest and commercial prosperity of the country. The chair was taken at six o'clock by Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P. Messrs. Fitzwilliam, Hobbs, and Chapman were in attendance for the vocal department, and the whole arrangements were on the best and most liberal scale. The children were, as usual, introduced after the removal of the cloth. They were all in the best health, and in the apparent enjoyment of content and happiness. Mr. Alderman Thompson addressed them in an appropriate speech. The secretary announced the amount of subscriptions as nearly 600*l.* The meeting did not break up till late in the evening.

"THE TIMES' SCHOLARSHIPS."—At a court of the governors of Christ's Hospital, held on Tuesday, Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P., the President, in the chair, a report having been received from the committee of almoners, recommending that the proposition of the committee of "The Times' Testimonial," for establishing one of "The Times' Scholarships," in connexion with that hospital, be accepted, upon the condition annexed, and that the hospital's seal be affixed to a deed for declaring the trust in relation thereto, Mr. Weeding, the East India proprietor, in an eloquent speech, introduced, and Mr. Pigeon, treasurer to the hospital, seconded, the resolution, which, after a few words from Mr. Samuel Mills, and Mr. Daroy, M.P., was unanimously agreed to.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—Last week, a deputation from the Metropolitan Improvement Society, headed by Lord Robert Grosvenor, had an interview with Sir Robert Peel, in Downing-street, the Earl of Lincoln, Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, being also present. Their principal object was to obtain a better agency for future improvements than that which had hitherto been employed. They wished as a basis for future legislation on this subject, that Government should cause to be prepared an official scientific report upon the general character of the improvements required in the metropolis, in reference to new thoroughfares and open spaces, roads connecting the railroad termini, the most practicable means of throwing open the banks of the Thames, and the steps to be taken for the drainage of unhealthy districts. The deputation did not propose a commission in the ordinary sense of the word; they did not wish to see the subject entrusted to a board of virtuosi, of amateur architects, or of parties who might be interested in any of the plans which had been discussed by the committee of the House of Commons. They desired to see a report from parties possessing the special qualifications required in the highest degree, and upon which two or three of our first civil engineers and architects, or surveyors, of equal ability to those who had been employed in the Irish survey, would stake their professional character. Sir R. Peel said, that without troubling the deputation to enter into any particular explanation, he might at once say that the subject was one which had engaged his serious attention, and that with the general views expressed by the deputation his own opinion coincided. Without pledging himself to the exact course which he might deem it desirable to take relative to the appointment of any board, he certainly thought that the object would be promoted by taking a broad and comprehensive view of the whole subject, instead of legislating wholly upon detail; and that for this purpose a committee of the House of Commons—open, perhaps, to local influence—was not the most desirable body to whom such an inquiry should be entrusted. He might further add, that as the object appeared to him one of paramount importance, both in reference to the sanatory state of the poorer districts, and the greater facilities of communication required, he did not think the consideration of a merely trifling expense should stand in the way, and he should probably not hesitate to propose such a grant as would be sufficient to render the inquiry effectual. Some conversation then ensued relative to the character of the improvements now in progress, plans of which were produced; Lord Grosvenor especially urging the attention of Sir R. Peel to the fact, that if the formation of the new main thoroughfare streets were built of a width of 52 feet where 60 feet at least were required, and made crooked where they ought to be straight, the opportunity lost might be eternally regretted, but could never be recalled.—Mr. Mills, chairman of the commissioners of sewers for Finsbury, in adverting to the importance of drainage, expressed a hope for the speedy publication of the evidence which had been taken by the Poor Law Commissioners relative to sewerage, and the deputation took their leave; Lord Robert Grosvenor thanking Sir Robert Peel, in the name of every gentleman present and of the public, for the extremely satisfactory result of the interview.

ACCIDENTS AND SUICIDES IN FRANCE.—It appears by a recent statistical return, that the number of accidental deaths in France during the year 1840 was 6805, and that of suicides, 2752, being only five more than in 1839; whereas in that year the number of suicides was 161 more than in 1838. Of the 2752 suicides above mentioned, 712 were females; of the total number, 20 were under 88 years of age, 161 from 16 to 21, 450 from 21 to 30, 459 from 30 to 40, 610 from 40 to 50, 446 from 50 to 60, 332 from 60 to 70, 153 from 70 to 80, and 45 above 80 years.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

JUNE.

A varied tune—O ! month of June—
Thou singest to the crowd ;
Soft thy sweet breath—now whispereth—
Now riseth warm and loud.
Two battles grand by sea and land
To memory shout thy name :
Where rose Lord Howe, with laurelled brow,
To crown our ocean fame !
Where Glory's son —our Wellington—
Beneath thy skies of blue,
On land as wave bore Vict'ry's glaive,
And won at Waterloo !
But while around the triumph-sound
Of glory plays its part,
Thou sweepest by thy melody,
To calm the human heart.
Oh. June ! along thy murmur'd song
Doth like a river glide,
To tune thy breeze, and fill thy trees,
And serenade thy bride,
The glad young Earth, that now gives birth
Unto her Summer child !
Whose sunny eyes, from flow'rs and skies,
Shine over warm and mild.

TITLED LUBBERS.

About the year 1790, many young men of the first families followed the example of the Duke of Clarence. One ship in particular was remarkable for having a great many scions of nobility on its books. The youngsters were accustomed to reef and furl the mizen top-sail. One day, when aloft, the captain thus addressed them from the quarter-deck : "My lords and gentlemen, you right honourable lubbers on the mizen top-sail yard, roll that sail up, and come down."

An Irishman was once brought up before the magistrate for marrying six wives. The magistrate asked him "how he could be so hardened a villain ?" "Please your Worship," says Paddy, "I was trying to get a good one.

There is at present residing at Seaville a young girl who can boast of having four mothers living, viz., her own mother, her grandmother, her great grandmother, and her great great grandmother. Even the eldest of these mammas is in good health, and they all reside in the parish of Home Cultram.

THE MAYOR OF GARRETT.

Wednesday was the anniversary of the mock election of Garrett, the memory of which is so ludicrously preserved in Foote's diverting farce of the Mayor of Garrett.

Long as we live there'll be no more
Such scenes as these, in days of yore
When little folks deemed great ones less,
And aped their manners and address.
When, further still to counterfeit,
To mountebanks they gave a seat,
By virtue of a mobbing summons,
As members of the House of Commons.

ST. JOHN'S EVE.

Thursday was the anniversary of St. John's eve, which is remarkably celebrated in Ireland, where the custom is still preserved of lighting fires on the hills at midnight in honour of the sun. On this day the sun arrives at the summer solstice, or rather begins its retrograde motion. The eve of the summer solstice was a season of divination in early times.

A WIFE'S FORETHOUGHTS.

There never was a wiser maxim than that of Franklin, "Nothing is cheap that you do not want." Yet how perfectly insane people are on the subject of buying cheap things. "Do tell me why you have bought that cast-off door-plate ?" asked the husband of one of these notable bargainers. "Dear me," replied the wife, "you know it is always my plan to lay up things against time of need ; who knows but you may die, and I may marry a man with the same name as that on the door-plate !"

DEEP LOVE.

There is a gloom in deep love as in deep water, there is a silence in it which suspends the foot, and the folded arms and the dejected head are the images which it reflects. No voice shakes its surface ; the Muses themselves approach it with a tardy and a timid step, and with a low and tremulous and melancholy song.—Landor.

INVENTION AND IMPROVEMENT.

A Frenchman gasconading over the inventive genius of his country, said, "We invented lace ruffles !" "Ay," said John Bull, "and we added shirts to them."

The Maine editor says, that a pumpkin, somewhere in that state, grew so large, that eight men could stand round it. This is something like the man, who said he saw a flock of pigeons fly so low, that he could shake a stick at them.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD.

Determined beforehand, we gravely pretend
To ask the opinion and thoughts of a friend ;
Should his differ from ours on any pretence,
We blush for his want both of judgment and sense.
But should he come into and flatter our plan,
Why, really, we think him a "sensible man."

FILTERING WATER.

The following cheap and easy mode of filtering water, may not be unacceptable to the majority of our readers at this particular season of the year :—Take a bag of unbleached calico, in the form of an inverted cone, attached to a small wooden hoop. It is first saturated with water, afterwards pulverised charcoal is thinly spread over the inside of it with a dredging box used by cooks. At first a part of the charcoal will pass through the pores of the bag with the water, but by continuing to fill it full with the same water, and adding charcoal, in a few minutes it will become clear as spring water. To prevent the charcoal being washed from the pores of the bag in filling it, place another bag inside it, and dredge a small quantity of pulverised charcoal into it. The cost of both bags is under one shilling, and will cleanse from fifty to sixty gallons daily. If it be supplied with water from a pipe, and regulated by a stopcock, add more in proportion to the size of the bag ; but as their cost is little, they can be increased in size and in number as may be required.

MIDSUMMER-DAY.

Friday was Midsummer-Day, the festival of St. John the Baptist, which is celebrated in England by wrestling matches and feats of strength and agility ; and on the Continent by solemn religious pageants and observances. In Norway the fire worship is observed in the same manner as in Ireland. It is also the anniversary of a brilliant naval victory obtained in 1340, by Edward III., over the French on the coast of Flanders.

ADVENTURE AT AN INN.

At an inn in a market-town upon the road to Holyhead, a gentleman sat in the kitchen smoking his pipe, and watching with anxiety a fowl that was roasting for his supper. At length a tall, meagre figure stalked in, and after an earnest and melancholy look at the fowl, retired with a sigh. Repeating his visit, he exclaimed, "That fowl will never be done in time." "What do you mean ?" said the gentleman, "that fowl is for my supper, and you shan't touch a bit of it." "Oh !" replied the other, "you misunderstand me ; I don't want the fowl ; but I am to play Oroonoko this evening, and we cannot begin for want of the rack chain !"
